RESOLUTIONS to be proposed by the Chairman, read, as follows:—

"MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.

"1. THAT it has been proved to your Committee, that in the Municipal Elections of many Boroughs in England and Ireland, extensive corruption by bribery and treating exists.

"2. That the present law relating to Corrupt Practices at Municipal Elections may be in some respects beneficially amended.

"3. That, in the opinion of your Committee, no such amendment of the law will effectually check the above-mentioned corrupt practices.

"4. That

"4. That there is reason to believe that a system of Secret Voting would tend to check the above-mentioned corrupt practices; and your Committee recommend its adoption.

"PARLIAMENTARY ELECTIONS.

"1. THAT it has been proved to your Committee, that, in many Boroughs in England and Ireland, corruption by bribery and treating has largely prevailed in Parliamentary Elections.

"2. That it has not been proved to your Committee that corruption has prevailed in County Parliamentary Elections.

"3. That both in County and Borough Parliamentary Elections in the United Kingdom, undue influence in various forms, such as intimidation by landlords, by employers, and by mobs, and spiritual influence exercised by ministers of religion, has prevailed to a considerable extent.

"4. That the following are the principal remedies which have been proposed: the adoption of a system of secret voting; the use of voting papers, and the multiplication of polling places.

"5. That a large majority of the witnesses who have been examined have advocated the Ballot, on the ground that it would secure greater freedom, tranquillity, and purity at elections, and that it is proved to your Committee that a great number of voters of all political opinions desire its adoption.

"6. That it has been proved to your Committee that, both in the Colonies and in several continental States, systems of secret voting are in operation, which ensure the protection of absolute secrecy to such voters as desire it.

"7. That many of the above-mentioned systems appear to be sufficiently simple to be easily worked, and to be open to no objections on the ground of special liability to fraud, or the commission of any corrupt practices.

"8. That the adoption of the Ballot appears to tend greatly to the tranquillity of elections.

"9. That the adoption of voting papers in County or Borough Parliamentary Elections is not desirable.

"10. That, in the opinion of your Committee, the multiplication of polling places would tend to the greater tranquillity of elections, and to the diminution of their expense.

"11. That, in the opinion of your Committee, public nominations are unnecessary, and may be dispensed with."

RESOLUTIONS to be proposed by Mr. Bright, read, as follows:—

"1. THAT the evidence given before this Committee shows that extensive corruption, in the form of bribery and treating, prevails in many municipal boroughs. That practically there is no remedy for illegal elections to town councils, as there is no tribunal for the trial of election petitions; and that punishment for corruption is rarely inflicted. That the character of town councils is thus greatly damaged, and the objects of the Municipal Act are in part frustrated.

"2. That from the Reports of Parliamentary Committees, from the declarations of the judges appointed to try election petitions, and from evidence given before this Committee, it is proved that bribery and treating are practised in many Parliamentary boroughs. That intimidation of voters is common in many individual cases, and that the free exercise of the franchise is interfered with by mobs organised for the purpose. That elections are often accompanied by violence and tumult, and that riots of a serious character occur at elections in very many boroughs, especially in England and Ireland.

"3. That the nomination of candidates is frequently attended with riot, and that the object of a public nomination is often defeated or interrupted by the tumult which arises from the assembling of large crowds of excited and angry partisans; that drunkenness and violence on these occasions bring discredit on our electoral system, and prevent the free expression of the opinion of the constituencies.

"4. That from evidence given before this Committee it is proved that undue influence prevails in many counties, interfering with the just rights and liberties of electors. That the cost of elections in counties is excessive and burdensome, partly from the scarcity of polling-places, causing great expense in the conveyance of voters, and partly from fees paid to legal agents scarcely distinguishable from bribery and other forms of corruption.

"5. That in the opinion of this Committee these grievances demand the early and earnest attention of Parliament; and that it would tend greatly to promote the freedom and purity and tranquillity of elections if the following changes were made in our electoral system:—

"1st. That, with regard to municipal elections, a simple and speedy mode of trial of election petitions should be established by law, and a more summary mode of punishment enacted for bribery and treating at such elections.

"2nd. That the preliminary election for counties and boroughs by public nomination should be abolished, as no longer necessary for the purpose for which such nominations have hitherto been held and practised.

"3rd. That, in order to prevent disorder at elections, whether in municipal boroughs or at Parliamentary elections in counties and boroughs, there is much evidence to show that the discontinuance of open voting, and the substitution for it of secret voting, or vote by ballot, would be of great advantage. That the great weight of evidence given before this Committee leads to the conclusion that this change in the mode of voting would not only promote the tranquillity of elections, but would also secure the voters from undue influence and intimidation, and introduce into elections a freedom and a purity which it is difficult, if not impossible, to secure under the present system of open voting.

"4th. That the hiring of rooms in public-houses for committee-rooms during elections is a fruitful source of expense and of corruption, and should be discountenanced and forbidden by law."

RESOLUTION to be proposed by Mr. Hardy, read, as follows:—

"That it has been proved to the Committee, there is no sufficient remedy at present for the recovery of compensation for damage inflicted by mobs upon property; and it is desirable to improve the law on that subject."

RESOLUTIONS to be proposed by Mr. Hunt, read, as follows:—

"1. That, in order to prevent disorder at elections, whether in municipal boroughs or at Parliamentary elections in counties and boroughs, the weight of the evidence given before this Committee leads to the conclusion, that the discontinuance of open voting and the substitution for it of secret voting would be of great advantage.

"2. But, with a view to remedy existing abuses, your Committee attach much more importance to the preservation of secrecy during the election, and particularly during the polling day, than to any attempt to preserve it when the election is over, which, to judge by the experience of other countries, would hardly ever be attended with success.

"3. That, in case of a system of ballot being adopted, it would be desirable, in order to secure the detection of bribery, and to prevent any suspicion attaching to the officers charged with the custody of the ballot-box and to the returning officer, that means should be devised for allowing proof of the vote of each elector, in the event of the election being challenged on petition.

"4. That the principle hitherto maintained by the supporters of open voting, that the franchise is a trust rather than a right, might, without prejudice to any substantial advantages to be derived from the adoption of the ballot, be asserted by the publication of the poll, or by the deposit of the same at some public office for reference, at some sufficient interval of time after the election, when all excitement arising out of it had passed away."

"1. That it seems to your Committee that it will tend to the purity of Parliamentary elections, and to the economical conducting of them, if the necessary expenses of them be borne by local rates, due precaution being taken to discourage fictitious candidature.

"2. That your Committee is of opinion that the employment of paid canvassers and agents should be prohibited."

RESOLUTIONS to be proposed by Mr. James, read, as follows:—

"1. That it appears to this Committee, that it will be expedient that every candidate should, previous to the election, make a declaration on oath that he has not been, and will not be, a party to any corrupt practice in relation to such election.

"2. That it is desirable that severer penalties than now exist should be imposed, and readier means of enforcing them provided, for the purpose of checking corrupt practices at Municipal elections.

"3. That the time for presenting election petitions should be extended."

RESOLUTIONS to be proposed by Mr. Howes, instead of Nos. 4, 7, 8, 9, of those to be proposed by the Chairman, or of No. 3, to be proposed by Mr. Bright, read, as follows:

"1. That publication of the state of the poll during the time of taking the votes at any election be discontinued and prevented.

"2. That much evidence has been adduced before the Committee in favour of the Ballot, or some other method of secret voting.

"3. Your Committee are not prepared to recommend any such method, not being satisfied that the cases in which the Ballot is alleged to have succeeded are parallel with that of the United Kingdom, or that its introduction into the electoral system of this country would effectually remove all the now existing evils, and would not introduce other and more serious evils."

RESOLUTIONS to be proposed by Sir Frederick W. Heygate, read as follows:—

"1. THAT bribery and treating at contested elections principally occur during the last few hours, and in the excitement existing before the close of the poll.

"2. That the ballot as practised in America and France is not secret voting, nor pretended to be so. That in America it does not ensure freedom and purity of election, nor obviate the evils of bribery, treating, and especially of intimidation.

"3. That in France and many continental countries the electors have never been accustomed to the open exercise of the franchise, or to the responsibility of a public avowal of their opinions.

"4. That in the Colonies, and especially in South Australia (the system of ballot in which Colony appears to your Committee to be the best of all laid before them) the ballot seems to be principally valued as a protection to the intelligent and independent voter against the pressure of trade unions.

"5. It was also shown to your Committee, that owing to a variety of peculiar circumstances, the political condition of the Colonies bears little or no analogy to that of Great Britain.

"6. That the evils proved to exist in contested elections may be largely, if not entirely, cured by the non-publication of the hourly state of the poll during the day of election, by the abolition of public nominations, by prohibiting the hire of rooms at public-houses during elections, and by a large multiplication of the number of polling-places.

"7. That it is matter of regret that Her Majesty's troops should ever be employed at Irish elections. So long, however, as strong political and religious feelings exist in Ireland, it is obvious that the peaceful access to and conduct at the poll, with the present limited number of polling-places, can only be secured by a large force of constabulary, assisted when necessary by the military; but the Committee strongly recommend the constant presence of a stipendiary magistrate with the military, whenever so employed."

DRAFT REPORT, prepared by the Chairman, read, as follows:—

"MUNICIPAL ELECTIONS.

"IT has been proved to the Committee, that in many boroughs in England and Ireland great corruption prevails. In some boroughs, it appears that a considerable class of voters will not vote unless they are paid; that this fact is so well known that the pure portion of the constituency, aware that the corrupt element is large enough to be able to turn the election, holds aloof altogther. Treating is also practised at municipal elections to a great extent. In some instances the bribery takes the form of payment by drink tickets instead of money; and more frequently the election is accompanied by an amount of drinking which is described as demoralizing to the town.

"Other corrupt practices prevail, but apparently to a minor extent. In some cases rioting takes place on the polling day, and the voters are prevented from reaching the polling-booths. There is no evidence to show that intimidation of individual voters is practised. In some cases it seems that the corrupt influences which are at work in a Municipal Election are carried on with a view of influencing the Parliamentary Elections. which, in the case of the last General Election, followed the former almost immediately, The fear of invalidating the return of a Member, on account of the illegal practices of his agent, has had the effect of turning the attention of unscrupulous partisans to the Borough Election, as safer ground on which to build up a corrupt influence among the lower classes of voters. In many cases, however, party spirit, without any ulterior object, appears sufficient to cause an extensive use of the corrupt practices above referred to.

"A feeling exists, though not a sufficiently strong feeling to lead to any active proceedings, that this state of things is discreditable; and the educated and respectable inhabitants would gladly see measures adopted which would put a stop to it.

"Under the existing law, civil proceedings may be taken in the county court against persons for corrupt practices at Municipal Elections.

"Such corrupt practices, however, unless committed by the person returned as a member of the council, do not invalidate the election; and there appears to be a want of a sufficient stimulus or motive to induce any one to incur the odium which would result from an attempt to put the law in operation.

"At any rate, it may be safely asserted that in many boroughs the existence of corrupt practices is notorious; but the cases in which proceedings under the Act have been taken are very rare, and the result of such proceedings has not been such as to encourage their more general adoption. Suggestions have been made for remedying this evil.

"1st. By the enactment of some more simple form of procedure.

"2nd. By the appointment of a public prosecutor.

"3rd. By the assimilation of the law relating to corrupt practices at a Municipal Election, and that relating to the same practices at Parliamentary Elections, and the adoption of a procedure by which a member of the council, owing his election to corrupt practices on the part of his agent, should lose his seat.

"4th. By the adoption of secret voting.

"With regard to the 1st, it is difficult to find any more simple or inexpensive tribunal before which such cases could be tried than the county court. The constitution of the borough bench is admitted, in many cases, not to be such as would provide an impartial tribunal. In boroughs where there is a stipendiary magistrate, the objection which have been urged against the trial of election petitions by the judges would apply with greater force to the employment of this officer in the trial of municipal petitions.

"As to the 2nd, the institution of a public prosecutor would be an innovation of doubtful expediency. The difficulty of obtaining evidence, on account of the unpopularity attaching to the raking up of charges made in the excitement of an election when that excitment had passed away would not be diminished by the appointment of a public prosecutor; and as the costs of a public prosecutor would fall upon the borough, the unpopularity of any party coming forward to give evidence in its support would be increased.

"The 3rd suggestion does not appear to be objectionable; and we see no reason why power to take proceedings in the nature of a petition against the return of a town councillor before the judge of county court should not be given; the penalties, &c. against the person proved guilty of corrupt practices now recoverable being retained.

"4th. There appears to be a very general concurrence of opinion that a system of secret voting would be a great improvement on the present one. It is generally admitted that nothing can be worse than the present system, which affords the very largest facilities for bribery, intimidation, tampering with voting papers, and, in short, for every conceivable corrupt practice.

"Whether secret voting would altogether put an end to bribery at these elections cannot be positively asserted until the experiment has been tried, but it can hardly be doubted that the uncertainty in the mind of the briber, as to the receipt of the vote for which he had paid, would exercise a powerful deterring effect upon him. The chief argument which has usually been employed against secret voting can scarcely be held to be applicable in this case. A municipal vote cannot be considered as a trust held by the voter for others. The municipal franchise is in the possession of almost all who have an interest in the prosperity of the borough, and the chief object now to be attained appears to be that the privilege should be exercised without the intervention of any improper external influence, and without exposing the voter to any unnecessary temptation to make a corrupt use of it."

"Parliamentary Elections.

"Boroughs.

"With regard to Parliamentary Elections in Boroughs the Committee have examined many witnesses, but have elicited no facts which had not been frequently established before Committees of the House and before the Judges who have been engaged during the present Session in the trial of Election Petitions. The returns in the Appendix to this Report show that both in former and in the last Elections various corrupt practices, of which bribery and treating were the chief, have prevailed, and to such an extent as to invalidate many Elections. It cannot be supposed that either now or formerly have the whole of such practices been brought to light, and it is therefore certain that a very considerable amount of corruption in its grossest forms has existed and now exists. It has been stated by witnesses that in some instances rioting has occurred on the nomination and polling days to such an extent as to interfere with the freedom of the Election. In a much larger class of cases it is asserted that an Election is invariably accompanied by a great a great amount of drinking, followed by disorder, which, if not serious, is at least discreditable to the town, and most offensive to the great majority of the inhabitants.

"It is difficult to arrive at the truth in the matter of the allegations of intimidation of workmen by masters, of tenants by landlords, of tradesmen by customers, and of working men by each other. That such intimidation is not extensively practised in a mode capable of legal proof is evident from the rarity of cases when a return has been set aside on this ground. But that it is practised in some slightly disguised forms and in a manner difficult of proof before a legal tribunal, cannot be doubted. We have examined many witnesses who have alleged the existence in the boroughs with which they were acquainted of intimidation of each kind above described. As soon as this evidence has been published in the local papers, applications have been received that witnesses on the other side should be examined, who have denied all the changes brought against themselves, but have usually attributed precisely the same or similar practices to their opponents. It is certain, at least, that whether intimidation is extensively practised or not, the fear of it widely prevails among that class of voters who are liable to its influence. The system of canvassing which notoriously prevails in many if not most boroughs, especially in the smaller constituencies, is a system of working upon voters through private considerations, whether of interest, hope, or fear, for political purposes, and is thus a system in which undue influence in a modified form is almost invariably practised.

"Counties.

"The Committee have had much less evidence relating to County Elections. The returns above referred to show that as compared with Borough Elections, a very small number have been called in question before Committees or the Judges. This fact proves, in the opinion of the Committee, that they have been in the main free from bribery or corrupt treating, for we know of no reason why, if the law had in these respects been habitually broken, attempts should not have been made to set aside the election by means of petitions.

"It is, however, alleged that intimidation and undue influence are very largely practised in county elections, and evidence from Wales and Scotland, to the effect that tenants have been actually turned out of their farms on account of their votes, has been brought before us to substantiate the allegation. It is difficult for a Committee examining witnesses, not upon oath, and without the services of any persons who act in the character of counsel for the prosecution or defence, to form an opinion worth much, on disputed matters of fact; and contradictions more or less specific, have generally been advanced against the charges which have been made. The Committee have endeavoured to investigate one or two of these cases, but they have found themselves involved in inquiries, which unduly protracted their proceedings, and did not promise to lead to any thoroughly satisfactory result. In a few instances, the allegations have not been contradicted, and although we are not in a position to assert that direct coercion by landlords is general, there can be no doubt that it does to a certain extent exist. But it is equally certain that an influence, exceeding in a greater or less degree the legitimate influence which a popular and respected landlord must always exercise in his neighbourhood, is very generally brought to bear on tenant farmers, and other dependent voters in agricultural districts. The agent frequently holds language which the landlord would shrink from using, but which the latter does not think it necessary to disown. An instance was given by Mr. Latham in his evidence, where tenants who had signed the requisition to a candidate, all voted with their landlord against that candidate; another, where no tenant on the estate would promise the same candidate a vote until they had received an assurance from their landlord that they might vote as they pleased, on receiving which they all both promised and voted for the candidate opposed to the landlord's politics. We believe that similar cases are to be found in every county; and it is, in fact, notorious that political agents or canvassers scarcely take the trouble to inquire about the politics of tenant farmers, but count them at once as so many votes on the side to which the landlord belongs. The inducement to vote with the landlord may frequently proceed rather from the hope of future advantages to be conferred than from the fear of injury to be inflicted; but of whichever character the inducement may be, we think that the influence so exercised comes under the description of undue influence, and, as such, ought, if possible, to be checked.

"The different political and social conditions existing in England, Scotland, and Ireland, produce some differences in the character of their elections, and of the influences at work in them, which ought to be noticed. In England and Ireland it has been already stated, that the Borough Elections, both Municipal and Parliamentary, are often extremely corrupt. In Scotland, it is stated, without contradiction, that bribery is almost unknown. This is attributed partly to the superior education of the Scotch people; partly to the fact that the constituencies being comparatively new, there exists no corrupt class, such as in many English and Irish boroughs, long familiar with the traditions of bribery, has not only preserved in itself, but spread through the whole constituency the desire for a large and corrupt expenditure.

"In each of the three countries it is alleged that intimidation by landlords prevails. In England the tenants either do not desire or do not dare to vote against the wishes of their landlords, and except in individual cases comply with their wishes. In Scotland the former have in many instances voted almost in a body against their landlords. This independence has been attributed partly to the nature of the relations between landlord and tenant in Scotland, which are of a more strictly commercial character than in England, partly to the fact that the Scotch tenant farmers have recently taken a very warm interest in certain questions in which they consider that their own and their landlord's interests are not identical.

"In Ireland, again, the influence of the landlord is by no means undisputed. It is opposed by the equally powerful influence of the Roman Catholic clergy. Organized mobs also appear to be an almost generally recognised part of the system of conducting an Irish election. The object of their employment is either to intimidate an unwilling voter, or one who is supposed to be under coercion, so as to force him to vote on the side of the popular party, or to prevent, by physical force, the voters of the opposite side from reaching the poll. To so great an extent is this system carried, that the employment of troops at elections, which in England or Scotland is almost unknown, is the ordinary rule at an Irish election. The military force in the country is disposed before a general election with a view to that event, and not only are the troops employed to preserve order at the polling places, but escorts are frequently given on the requisition of candidates or their agents, for the purpose of protecting voters coming from a distance. Notwithstanding these precautions, scenes of violence, including loss of life, are not unfrequent. Mr. Justice Keogh, in his judgment on the Drogheda Election Petition, has given a most vivid description of the events which took place on the polling day, and of the utter absence of freedom of election in that case.

"As might be expected, the views of this state of things taken by Irish witnesses whom the Committee have examined, were extremely divergent.

"One party contends that Roman Catholic tenants would frequently, from conviction, or from feelings of attachment to a good landlord, desire to record their votes on his side; that in so doing they are exposed to spiritual intimidation from the clergy, and to the risk of violence from the mobs assembled by the influence of the priests, and directed by them; that these influences entirely destroy the freedom of action of the voter, and give an excuse for some amount of pressure on the part of the landlord. The other party maintains that the influence of the priests is only for the purpose of strengthening the determination of the voters to vote according to their convictions, notwithstanding the pressure which may be brought to bear on them; that Roman Catholic voters would never willingly oppose the cause espoused by the great majority of their countrymen and by their clergy; and that often the mob intimidation—the existence of which is admitted—is desired and invited by the supposed victims as an excuse for escaping from coercion of another character.

"The Committee cannot doubt that there is some truth in the assertions made by both parties; but looking to the fact that the landlords and tenants generally profess different religions, and that recent elections have frequently turned much on religious questions, we can hardly doubt that the influence which is first exercised, and which provokes, if it does not justify, the counter influences set in motion, is that of landlords and their agents. However this may be, the Committee are convinced that, under the present system of conducting elections, there exists in many boroughs and counties of Ireland no such thing as freedom of election, and they consider that some change is urgently required."

"Proposed Remedies.

"We now come to the consideration of the remedies which have been proposed for the evils and inconveniences, the existence of which is alleged.

"Of these, the abolition of public nominations, the prohibition of the employment of paid canvassers, the closing of public-houses on the nomination and polling days, the multiplication of polling places, voting papers, and secret voting are the chief. The opinion seems to be very general that public nominations, as they are now generally conducted, are both useless and mischievous. The addresses which are delivered are generally inaudible on account of the noise and tumult, and disturbances frequently commence on the nomination day which continued throughout the election. There is some slight convenience in the present practice, which in the case of an uncontested election, allows the proceedings to be gone through with as little delay and trouble to all concerned as is possible, but we think that the advantage of putting an end to many serious inconveniences and evils which have their origin on these occasions, would more than compensate for any trifling inconveniences which might be incurred by the change.

"So far as the tranquillity and purity of elections are concerned, we can feel no doubt that the closing of public-houses on the days of nomination and polling would be an unmixed advantage.

"The

" The witnesses whom we have examined have naturally looked upon the question almost entirely from this point of view, and we are unable to form an opinion whether the inconvenience to the public generally of such a measure would be great enough to outweigh its undoubted advantages. We think that there would be great difficulty in framing an enactment for the purpose of abolishing the use of paid canvassers. An election can scarcely be conducted without paid agents of some kind; and we know of no definition which would satisfactorily prescribe the limits within which such an agent should confine his exertions. Nor does there appear to be any good reason why candidates, or their agents, should not be permitted to canvass the electors privately at their homes as well as publicly at meetings. It is true—as we have stated above—that personal canvassing is generally accompanied by the use of considerable undue influence; but it is against the improper means employed to influence them, and not against the mere act of endeavouring to influence the electors that the efforts of the Legislature ought to be directed.

" A few witnesses have recommended the system of voting-papers. Their sole recommendation appears to be that the risk of riot on the polling day would be diminished. In our opinion, they would prevent none of the other evils of the present system, while they would tend to aggravate others by the facilities which they would give for bribery, for fraud, and for certain forms of intimidation.

" The adoption of secret voting or, as it is usually called, the Ballot, has been advocated by a large majority of the witnesses whom we have examined, and by witnesses not exclusively confined to either political party. It is recommended by some as a cure for all the evils of our electoral system, but it is admitted by others that some of them, such as bribery and treating, would be only indirectly affected by it.

" We have endeavoured to extend our inquiry beyond the theoretical arguments which are usually employed by the advocates and opponents of the ballot, and to ascertain how it has worked in the British Colonies, and in Foreign States where it has been adopted.

" With this view, we have examined witnesses from Victoria, New South Wales, South Australia, and Tasmania, and have also received evidence as to the systems in use in France, Italy, and Greece.

" The effect of this evidence has been to prove that where the ballot has been in operation, elections have been entirely free from intimidation, riot or disorder.

" It has also been proved that bribery and treating have been reduced to a minimum, that personal canvassing has been discouraged, and that the expense of elections has been diminished.

" The witnesses have been carefully examined in order to discover any defects which may exist in any of the various systems of balloting, or any abuses or disadvantages which may be inherent in any system of secret voting. We have failed to discover any defects which cannot be easily remedied, or any abuses to which open voting is not equally obnoxious.

" It remains to be considered, whether there are any special circumstances affecting our own elections, which make it probable that the ballot would either fail to secure the advantages which it offers in other countries, or would increase any of the existing evils.

" The principal objections which have been advanced against the ballot as applied to our own elections are—(1.) That it will do little to restrain the practice of treating: (2.) That it will increase bribery, by making it more difficult to detect: (3.) That it will be wholly inoperative in the case of spiritual intimidation such as that which is alleged to exist so extensively in Ireland.

" With regard to the 1st, we think that although the ballot might not effect much, an important check upon gross or extravagant treating might be placed by a more stringent enactment enforcing the publication of the real expenses of each candidate.

" As to the 2nd, it is true that in small constituencies a system of bribery, contingent upon the result of the election, might be successfully carried on; but, on the whole, we believe that the uncertainty of obtaining any return for a corrupt expenditure would tend to check bribery more than the difficulty of detection would decrease it.

" With regard to the 3rd objection, in the case of spiritual intimidation, we have the evidence of Roman Catholic clergymen to the effect that the confessional could not be used, directly, for the purpose of extracting from a parishioner an avowal of the way in which he had voted; and that if such knowledge was obtained by the priest, it would be impossible for him to make use of it to the disadvantage of the voter. We have also been told by witnesses, that although the Roman Catholic clergy may possess some influence, spiritual intimidation is not believed to exist among the Irish Roman Catholic voters in Australia, and that in Italy the influence of the priests on elections is supposed to be slight. If the opinion which we have expressed in the former part of this Report, as to the general state of the case in Irish elections, be correct, it is probable that the Roman Catholic clergy would, under the ballot, cease to take so active a part as they now do in elections.

" The Committee have no reason to think that there is any special peculiarity in the character or condition of the populations by whom the ballot has been adopted which would lead us to infer that its introduction at elections in this country would be attended by results less beneficial than those which have attended it elsewhere.

" We have referred above to the extensive employment of troops at Irish elections. It would probably be impossible to discontinue it under the present system, but we must express our conviction that no freedom of election can exist where so large a part in the proceedings is taken by a military force. In our opinion, the ballot offers the only means which can enable the Government to put an end to the practice.

" On the whole, then, we believe that the ballot possesses many great advantages; that it would put an end to some of the evils of our electoral system, and that it would tend to mitigate rather than to aggravate those which it would not entirely remove.

" The multiplication of polling-places in counties has been recommended as a means of promoting the convenience of voters, of increasing the tranquillity and diminishing the cost of elections. We think that in combination with the ballot, and with the prohibition of the conveyance of voters by the candidate or his friends, these objects would be secured by the proposed change; but we apprehend that in combination with a system of open voting, the facilities for intimidation and undue influence would be considerably increased."

THE Committee deliberated:—Motion made, and Question proposed, " That the evidence be reported to the House, with a recommendation that the Committee be re-appointed next Session, for the purpose only of considering their Report with a view to early legislation "—(Sir M. Hicks Beach).—Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word " That " to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, " That although evidence has been tendered that the discontinuance of open voting, and the substitution for it of secret voting by ballot might be of advantage in preventing disorder at elections within Municipal or at Parliamentary elections in counties or boroughs, yet so much of the time of the Committee has been necessarily taken up in hearing evidence as to bribery, treating, &c. at both Municipal and Parliamentary elections, that it has not been possible to give that consideration to this branch of the inquiry which its importance demands.—1st. As to the precise nature and effect of the ballot in other countries.—2nd. As to how far the circumstances of those countries are the same as our own. And with a view to obtaining further evidence upon these points, the Committee recommends that the inquiry be resumed next Session, but so as to report in time for legislation if thought necessary "—(Mr. Cross)—instead thereof.—Question, That the words " the evidence be reported to the House, with a recommendation that the Committee be re-appointed next Session," stand part of the Question,—put, and agreed to.

Another Amendment proposed, to leave out the word " only," and at the end of the Question to add the words " taking further evidence if necessary "—(Mr. Graves).—Question, That the word " only " stand part of the Question,—put, and agreed to.—Main Question put, and agreed to.—Resolved, " That the evidence be reported to the House, with a recommendation that the Committee be re-appointed next Session, for the purpose only of considering their Report with a view to early legislation."

Report, in accordance with the above Resolution, agreed to.

Ordered, To Report, together with the Minutes of Evidence and an Appendix.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JOHN BARBER, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Barber.
6 April 1869.

1. Chairman.] I BELIEVE you are the Mayor of Nottingham?—I am, and I was also mayor last year.

2. Will you be so good as to tell the Committee the number of wards in the borough of Nottingham?—There are seven wards.

3. And the number of municipal electors in each?—In St. Ann's Ward there are 1,977; in Byron Ward, 1,330; in St. Mary's Ward, 639; in Exchange Ward, 1,008; in Castle Ward, 678; in Park Ward, 582; and in Sherwood Ward, 1,475: making a total of 7,689.

4. Can you also tell the Committee the number of Parliamentary voters?—14,168.

5. The limits of the Parliamentary and municipal borough being the same?—Yes; they are the same.

6. Is it a matter of notoriety, or general knowledge, that any portion of the municipal voters require payment?—It is perfectly notorious to everyone.

8. That is based, is it, upon particulars which you obtained from each ward?—Yes; the wards vary. In some wards, according to circumstances, the numbers are greater or less. I have taken the number in each ward, and I have got the total number as 2,320 that require money. Of course, if the amount of money given is small, there are a less number of persons who will take it, and the higher the price the larger the number.

9. Can you state to the Committee the number of voters who require money in each ward?—Yes. From information which I have received, and upon which I can thoroughly rely, having had communication with parties who have had the management of those matters for years in each ward, I have put down that, in St. Ann's Ward, there are 600 who would require money out of 1,977; in Byron Ward 500 out of 1,330. One of my informants said 600; but I prefer to put it at the lower amount. In St. Mary's Ward 250 out of 639; in Exchange Ward 300 out of 1,008; in Castle Ward 170 out of 678; in Park Ward, which is rather towards the west end of the town, 100 out of 582. One of my informants put the number at 150; but I think 100 is nearer the correct amount; and in Sherwood Ward 300 out of 1,475.

10. Is the corruption confined, in your opinion, to one particular class of voters, or does it extend throughout all classes?—If the payment is very small, it is the lowest class of people who take it; but when it gets higher up, then the better class of people take it; for instance, small shopkeepers and persons of that description.

11. What sort of sums are usually given at the municipal elections?—I will give an illustration of two elections in Byron Ward, and I have those facts from a party having the entire management of it, and knowing all about it; in 1867, that is last November but one, an election was tried on purity principles; the poll commenced at nine, and at 12 o'clock one side had polled less than 100 votes, and the other under 40; there being 1,330 voters in the whole ward; at 12 o'clock the 40 party offered 3 s. 6 d.; this caused a run, and the other side then offered 5 s.; which won the election. The following November, which was last November, in the same ward, not more than 200 had polled at 12 o'clock; 2 s. 6 d. was then offered, the place was at once besieged, the price rose to 5 s., and at four o'clock 900 had polled; the effect of this is, that a great many of the respectable voters will not poll at all; they consider that the results of those contests is simply this, that those who give the most money win, and therefore they abstain from voting.

12. In the last election to which you referred, did both sides bribe?—Yes.

13. Giving the same price?—Yes, in all the cases pretty nearly the price one side was as high as on the other; I should explain that 2 s. 6 d. was first offered, and that the price then rose to 5 s.; which would be in consequence of course of the other side offering perhaps more than 2 s. 6 d.

14. Have you known larger sums than those given in municipal elections?—Yes; in 1844, from peculiar circumstances which caused the contest at that time, it was notorious that in one ward upwards of 2,000 l. was spent, but that produced a sort of re-action, and for some time the price was not so very large; but since then the state of things has been gradually getting bad again.

15. Which ward was that?—In 1844, it was the case in almost all the wards, but in Exchange Ward, particularly at that time, there was the largest amount of money spent.

16. Are there not a considerable number of voters who would not take 5 s. or 2 s. 6 d.?—Yes; of course the majority of the voters are not corrupt, but it is those bought voters that turn the election always, because, supposing there are 600 voters in the ward, and there are 200 of them that are corrupt, and that take money, they turn the poll either one way or the other.

17. I think I understand you to say, that if the price is raised, a very much larger number will then take the money?—Yes, that is the case; persons would take 10 s. or 1 l.; the temptation would be more than they could resist.

18. Do you think that a larger proportion would take 5 l.?—Yes, as the price rose, I believe the numbers taking would increase; and that has been proved to be the case.

19. Mr. Villiers.] Are we to understand that everybody has his price?—Just so; as before stated, in Castle Ward, at the last November election, the contest began by 5 s. being freely offered, and 25 s. to a very large extent was given before the close of the poll; in the contest in Exchange Ward in 1865, above 600 l. was spent, and I had that from one of the candidates; that is on one side only.

20. Chairman.] Does treating as well as bribery prevail to a great extent in the municipal elections in Nottingham?—Yes; the committee rooms, generally speaking, are at public-houses, and drinking to a very large extent prevails.

21. Do you mean previously to the election, or on the day of the poll?—To some extent, previously; but chiefly on the day of election, I think.

22. Are the elections managed by the candidates themselves, or by agents?—Generally by committees, and the managers of the ward, and frequently by the candidates themselves interfering, it depends very much upon who it is; there is no rule I think.

23. Is there any attempt to conceal the payment to voters?—Not the slightest; in the more glaring instances, the more unblushingly it is done, the less the attempt to conceal it; of course, when it is done moderately, it is done quietly, but there have been cases in which money has been paid in the street of the town.

24. In your opinion, has this system of corruption any considerable influence in deterring a respectable person from standing for the council?—Yes, very much so.

25. Has this system of bribery always existed within your recollection?—Yes, I think it has, more or less; before the Municipal Act was passed, there was a contest for a member of the town council, in which a very large sum of money was spent; the electors were then simply the freemen.

26. And the numbers were much smaller, were they not?—The numbers then would be in the town, very much what they are in one ward now.

27. Were they of the same class?—Perhaps not so many of the respectable class, inasmuch as there are more persons in the humble walk of life among the freemen than there are in the general community.

29. Will you state to the Committee what is the system of nomination for a town councillor?—The plan is this; that on a certain day, I think it is three clear days before the day of polling, which is the 1st of November; supposing it is the November election, a nomination paper must be applied for, and sent in to the town clerk before 12 o'clock of that third day; I think great abuse exists from that system. It is a common practice at Nottingham, that persons will assemble in the evening of the day at a public-house, to talk over these matters, and they will send down for a lot of nomination papers, and for the sake of either a lark, or if there is not likely to be an opposition, to get up an opposition, they will nominate persons without their consent; the effect is, that if there is no opposition, all the apparatus must be got ready, and the arrangements made for polling just the same as if there was an opposition, and frequently opposition arises from that fact.

30. In fact, a gentleman may be put in nomination, and the poll may be opened without his consent?

consent?—Yes, quite without his consent; and if he is nominated, even if he advertises that he has not consented, the poll must be opened, and voting papers by the candidates that are really standing, must be sent out just as if there was a boná fide election.

31. The nomination of persons without their consent is not infrequent?—Constant; there is never a year without such cases, I think, and latterly especially. I have known half-a-dozen papers to be sent for to one public-house, and as many nominations sent out from that same room.

32. Would that be for one ward?—For different wards. They might send for seven papers, and make a nomination paper for each ward.

33. Do you think that this bribery which goes on in the municipal elections is ever resorted to with a view to the Parliamentary election?—I do not think it is very much in Nottingham. The question is the man's political party; it seldom turns upon local matters, or anything of that kind; all the elections almost turn upon political matters, as to whether the candidates are Liberal or Conservative, but I do not think it has much effect, or rather that I have seen anything done with a direct view to the Parliamentary election.

35. Would you recommend that the consent of a person should be necessary in order to a nomination?—Yes, I think it would be desirable.

36. Mr. Villiers.] Must there be a contest if the person is named?—Yes; all the arrangements are made; the poll must be kept open one hour, and if any person in that hour chooses to come and vote for any particular party who may have been named without his consent, it must be open another hour, and must be open the whole day, so long as a person votes within the hour.

37. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is a man who is nominated against his consent liable for expenses?—No, the expenses of the contest fall upon the town; that is, the expenses of the polling places; but the expense of sending the voting papers out, and all expenses of that kind rests upon the candidate.

38. Chairman.] Do you recommend any changes in the mode of voting?—There cannot be a worse plan than the present; I believe it was originally intended to be secret.

40. Do each party prepare their own voting papers?—Yes, each party prepare their own voting papers. If a fictitious nomination is sent in, and I will suppose that a fictitious nomination is sent in against me, I should be compelled, or my committee would, to send out voting papers to the whole of the ward, not knowing whether the others would do so or not, therefore there would be the expense of printing and sending out voting papers, even though there was no real contest.

41. By a fictitious nomination, you mean the nominations which you have described, which are made without the parties consent?—Yes, and the whole thing is made rediculous by the kind of persons who are nominated. It is not that those people meet together and select suitable persons to be town councillors, but they select persons in such positions in the town as brings perfect ridicule upon the whole matter, and they are often nominated for that purpose.

42. Do you recommend any change in the mode of polling?—I have never myself been, till very lately, in favour of the ballot, but I am perfectly convinced now, that there is nothing that will check this thing, if secret voting can be established.

43. Has any consideration induced you to come to that opinion lately?—I have seen no other way to put a stop to this present system of things, and more especially since so very large a number of persons have been admitted into the Parliamentary register, I think it is necessary for the protection of the working men themselves from their own shopmates.

44. But that consideration does not apply particularly to the municipal elections now, more than it has done for the last two years?—No, the municipal elections have never been made a matter of question in the shops, as the Parliamentary elections have, there is not the same anxiety excited in the municipal election as to principle, it is simply a question of money.

45. Do you recommend any change in the law, with regard to the municipal elections?—It would be most desirable, if there could be some simple and speedy mode of bringing those matters, in case of bribery, to trial. I believe the present law is very inefficient for that purpose, inasmuch as no instances have occurred in Nottingham, and I do not remember having read or heard of any instance having occurred elsewhere, where the present law has been applied to the punishment of bribery. I think if there could be some clear and simple law, by which all those cases could be treated, it would be most desirable, and very much calculated to stop bribery.

46. I understand you to say that you have never known the provisions of the Act of 1859, against bribery at municipal elections attempted to be put in force?—Never, neither that nor the one of 1835, I think it is.

47. Are you aware of the provisions of the Act of 1859?—I think they can recover 40 s.; I cannot quote the Act at this moment, although I have read it, but I do not think there is anything that convicts the person for whom the bribing is done, unless he does it personally himself.

48. This is the clause in the 22nd of Victoria, chapter 35, section 11: "If any person at any election of mayor, councillors, auditors, or assessors for any borough, shall be guilty of bribery, he shall, for every such offence, forfeit the sum of 40 s. to any person who shall sue for the same in the county court, with full costs of suit; and any person offending in any case in which, under the Act or Acts for the time being in force with respect to the election of Members to serve in Parliament for boroughs in England and Wales, the name of the offender may be expunged from the list of voters, being lawfully convicted thereof, shall, for the term of six years, be disabled to vote in any election in such borough or in any municipal or Parliamentary election whatever, in any part of the United Kingdom; and shall, for such term, be disabled to hold, exercise, or enjoy any office or franchise to which he then shall, or at any time afterwards may be entitled as a burgess of such borough, as if such person were naturally dead"?—I think the person is not unseated under that Act of Parliament; if he is even proved guilty, he retains his seat.

49. It appears, under that clause, that he would be disqualified; but it appears, also, that he must be guilty of bribery himself; do you recommend that if it could be proved that an election has been influenced by bribery, the election should be held void?—I think so. I have thought something about it, and though it is with very great diffidence that I should venture to give a suggestion to the Committee, I think it would be very desirable if those matters were tried before the recorder in the town, by some simple process, and if the expenses of the prosecution were put upon the town, and not upon the individuals prosecuting; and in cases where parties presented a vexatious petition, I would throw the costs upon them. At present there is no one to prosecute; if it is taken up, it must be at the expense of the individual doing it; and I think that at present there is no sufficient court by which it can be tried.

50. Would you recommend that any additional penalties should be inflicted upon either the briber or the bribed person?—I think if the law which is established for Parliamentary elections in that respect were made applicable, according to local circumstances, to municipal elections, it would be very effective.

51. Have you any other suggestion to make with regard to the polling at municipal elections; for instance, with regard to the conveyance of voters, which at present is allowed?—Yes; I think that that should be done away with entirely. I think it works extremely well in not allowing it in the Parliamentary elections, and I think it would work equally well in the municipal elections.

52. Are cabs frequently employed at the municipal elections?—Yes, very much.

53. Are you aware whether any personation takes place at those elections?—Yes, constantly. Many persons were taken up last November for personation.

54. Were they prosecuted?—No, they were not prosecuted; they would have been, but the way in which they were given into custody was somewhat illegal, and it was felt, in consequence of this that the prosecution would not hold water and so it was abandoned; but I have known very extensive cases of personation.

55. Have you ever known any one prosecuted or convicted?—No, I have not; I think that the equal guilt of each party almost prevents a case being prosecuted very much.

56. Of what description is the personation which is practised?—The way would be this. Supposing a man is out of town, or is known to have died since the registration was made, the voting paper would be prepared, and another man somewhat like him would he found, and he would simply take that voting paper up and deliver it.

57. Are there any duplicates on the register?—Yes, and any person can get a copy of the register for 1 s.

58. Are there any duplicate qualifications?—A person may be rated in different parishes, and therefore, he would be on the register in each of those parishes.

59. Is that made use of for the purpose of personation?—That is not often made use of for personation, because, generally speaking, they are persons who are in such a position in life, that they would not personate persons having three or four properties in three or four parishes; but it requires all the arrangements to be made to prevent it, in case it was done. You are obliged to have scrutators and everything, to prevent persons voting in different wards. A man by law can only vote once in one election.

60. Do you think that any other evils, besides bribery and treating, prevails at the municipal elections?—I do not think so to any great extent; there is very little intimidation or anything of that sort, I think. The public-houses are open, and a great amount of intoxication prevails; and if it could be done, I think it would be a very good thing, if the public-houses could be closed on all the days of election.

61. Can you explain the entire absence of intimidation at the municipal elections?—I do not think that the questions which are involved in a municipal election, are such as to make it worth the while of any one, large employers for instance, intimidating their men; and I do not think it is carried on to any great extent, at least I have never heard of it.

62. Is it generally understood, that a municipal vote is worth so much money?—Yes, there is no doubt about that.

63. But it is merely a question of money?—Yes, merely a question of money.

64. Mr. Villiers.] I think you stated that the practice of bribery has been very long in existence in Nottingham?—Yes.

65. And the respectable classes are perfectly well aware of it?—Yes, it is perfectly patent.

66. And there is no shame attaching to it?—No, we are ashamed of it; every gentleman in the town is ashamed of it; but there is not the shame attaching to it in the sense in which you put the question to me.

67. But nobody is thought the worse of because he has received this 2 s. 6 d. or 5 s. which you say is usual?—Yes, I think he is, but I do not think that those who pay it are thought the worse of.

68. Is any man ever reproached for having received a bribe for his vote in a municipal election?—I could

—I could not say that; amongst the population it is not considered any disgrace at all, but it is very possible that there may be persons who, if they knew individuals, in their employ for instance who had received bribes, would reproach them with it.

69. Is it desired to put a stop to the system in Nottingham?—Yes, very much so.

70. Is it complained of by respectable people?—Yes; it is not desired of course by the people who receive the money, and very probably a man would be unpopular who took any steps to prosecute a case among the class who receive the money, but the whole town is ashamed of it; the two-thirds of the electors who are not corrupt are ashamed of it.

71. I thought I understood you to say, that the extent of the corruption varied with the amount offered for the vote?—Yes, to a certain extent it does; I have given in the total number of those who, under any circumstances would receive money, and there are some of those who would not receive 1 s., but who would receive 10 s.

72. I think you stated that about one-third of the whole number are corrupt?—Yes, one-third of the whole number are corrupt.

73. But you do not go so far as to say that the two-thirds remaining are pure?—They are.

74. But they have never been tempted within your knowledge?—I think they would be above it.

75. Has there been any attempt to stop it on the part of the respectable portion of the community at Nottingham?—There have been two or three attempts to conduct elections on principles of purity, but they have always failed.

76. They have broken down before the election was over, I presume?—Yes, they have.

77. What particular evil follows from this system which is so common in Nottingham?—In the first place, it is difficult now to get respectable men to stand for the council, because they do not like to submit themselves to what no doubt is a very disagreeable thing; even if a man does not care about spending the money, he does not like to spend it in that way.

78. But has the council much power, or any patronage?—The council has an enormous deal of influence.

79. Then is the position of councillor much sought after?—It is considered a post of respectability and of respect, when a man is properly elected.

80. The electors seem to be numerous, and a large number receive the money; is it the candidate that pays them?—The candidates pay the money; sometimes, when there has been a very valuable man desired to be retained in the council, I have known of subscriptions raised to pay his expenses, supposing he would not pay them himself, or to assist in paying them.

81. Generally speaking, are the candidates men of substance?—Yes, I should say that there is no town where the large ratepayers have been more represented in the council, than the town of Nottingham.

82. How do they demean themselves when they have been elected in this fashion?—I do not think there is any place where the business of the town is better conducted than the town of Nottingham; I have never known an instance where politics have made any difference after a man has once been elected.

83. Do you think that if the elections were pure you would get as good men as councillors?—I think so; I see no reason why we should not believe it.

84. Do you mean that the people who present themselves as candidates are people that are of some station and are wealthy, because they know that it must cost them something to be elected?—They do not mind the amount of money that it costs, but they disapprove thoroughly of the principle of buying those votes, and many of those gentlemen are in the council because they are requested to stand by their fellow townsmen for the sake of having in the council men of intelligence and standing.

85. But those bribed electors, I presume, do not exercise their judgment much upon the merits of the candidates, but upon their ability to pay them?—Yes, as regards those people who receive the money it does not matter to them at all who are the candidates; the candidates are really selected by those who do not receive money.

86. Supposing that the elections were conducted upon pure principles, do you think that electors, exercising their judgment freely, would make a good choice?—Yes; I think so.

87. Are you of opinion that the people of Nottingham would know who were the fittest persons, and would then choose them?—Yes; I think so.

88. Is it the opinion at Nottingham that the system is getting worse than it was?—Yes; I think it is, I think it is more spread; more people take money than did formerly.

89. Do you infer from that, that the people are getting more corrupt generally at Nottingham than they were?—No, I think it is a sort of contagion that has increased; a woman perhaps sees that her neighbour's husband has received 3 s. or a sovereign for his vote, and I have known an instance where a woman has threatened her husband that if he voted without bringing her something home he might expect something warm when he got home.

90. You have alluded to some change in your opinion as to the means of preventing this bribery, and you thought that if there was secret voting that might prevent it?—I have thought of these things for many years, and I certainly have never been in favour of the ballot till lately; I have thought very much about this bribery, and as to the best means of checking it, and I do not think there is any system by which it could be stopped except a system which would prevent any one knowing how a man voted.

91. Do you think that that change of opinion has extended at all lately in Nottingham?—Yes, very much.

92. Do you believe that the respectable classes would be willing to make the experiment of the ballot?—I think that a great many more persons would wish for it now, than would have done five years ago.

93. Is there any riot upon the occasion of these municipal elections?—No, there is a little drunkenness and that sort of thing, but nothing that could be called a disturbance.

94. But you are sure that there is much discredit attaching to this system of bribery that it would not be favoured by respectable people, supposing they had the ballot?—I think not; every respectable person is annoyed by it.

95. You think that they would not favour any evasion evasion of the ballot, if the ballot was established?—No, I think not.

96. Have you any instance in which votes are taken by the ballot in Nottingham?—Only at the clubs and the hospitals, and things of that sort; there is no ballot at any of the legal elections.

97. You express, do you not, some doubt as to whether secrecy could be maintained?—It is not a doubt, because I have not studied the question thoroughly; but it is merely because I have heard it so constantly said, that secrecy could not be maintained. I have not given the subject sufficient attention to be able to judge whether it would be possible to have a system of open voting, which would be free from the evils at present existing.

98. Do you think that corruption has reached that point both at the municipal and the Parliamentary elections, that it would be worth while making the experiment of the ballot?—It is not a question of principle, but a question of money, carrying any election in Nottingham.

99. You think it is worth while to try something to prevent it?—Yes.

100. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Do you think that secret voting would check bribery at these municipal elections?—I fancy that it would be very difficult to find persons to give money, unless there were some means of knowing how the party voted.

101. And bribery is the special evil, which you think it would check?—Yes, I think so; I wish to be understood, that I have never been till lately an advocate very much for the ballot; and I have not given it that consideration as to all its technicalities, which would justify my giving an opinion to the Committee, as to the possibility of conducting an election under the ballot secretly; I do not consider myself an authority upon that in any way.

102. Supposing it were possible to conduct an election secretly so far, that the secresy might be optional at least, on the part of the voter, do you think that that would check bribery?—I think so.

103. Are not those people you have spoken of, anxious to receive bribes?—Yes; they are very anxious to receive them, or else they would not be paid.

104. If they cannot show in the process of giving their vote, whether they have voted as they have been bribed, do not you think that they would wish to do so in some other way?—A man might say how he had voted, but the party having to pay him, would exercise his own option whether he would believe it or not; I do not think that a man's saying how he voted, would go for very much with that class who would receive a bribe.

105. Do not you think that it would be possible by some organisation, to secure the return of any particular candidate?—I cannot offer an opinion upon that, because I have not given the question sufficient consideration.

106. Would the candidates themselves, who are now not ashamed of bribing openly, be less inclined to bribe secretly, if their return could be secured in that way?—I believe that a man who would give money openly, would do it the other way, only there would be a difficulty in getting to know how the people voted. People do not give money, because they are particularly fond of parting with it.

107. It would be possible, would it not, for a man to say, "On condition that I am returned, I will pay you a certain sum"?—I do not think that that would carry water much, and it would be very much more easily detected; whether secret voting or not, I would have penalties, and if there were bribery wholesale in that way, it would be much more easily detected.

108. Do you think that secret voting would stop treating?—A man might treat for the sake of popularity; but I do not think he would do very much in that way.

109. Is not treating a very great evil at the Parliamentary elections at Nottingham, as well as at the municipal?—Yes, it has been; I look much more to good laws for the prevention of bribery, than to secret voting; I merely speak of that as one of the things; there has been no law hitherto that would do it, and therefore I fall back upon secret voting.

110. You wish to try secret voting as better than nothing at all; is that your feeling?—Just so; nothing can be worse than the present system.

111. If you could stop bribery, what proportion of the electors do you think would vote in these municipal elections?—I think that if there were no bribery, there would be a larger number of electors vote who are not corrupt; and they would take more interest in the matter; but it is known to everyone, that if there is a contest pretty evenly balanced, the turn of the election entirely depends upon the bought votes.

113. You do not wish the Committee to infer that all those who held back till after two o'clock were waiting for bribes?—No.

114. With regard to personation, do you think that that would be rendered more easy or more difficult by a system of secret voting?—I do not think it would make any difference; I imagine, that before a man passed in to vote, his qualification would be tested outside just the same as his qualification is tested now when he goes up.

115. Have you ever given your attention, in any instance, to the possibility of determining afterwards whether personation had taken place or not?—No, I have not.

116. If you did not know how a man had voted, you would scarcely be able to find out whether he had been personated?—It would be possible, I think.

117. Personation is a very great evil, is it not, in the municipal elections at Nottingham?—It exists to a considerable extent; I do not think so much as to influence the elections materially, but still it does exist to a considerable extent.

118. Of course, if a man is rated in several parishes, and thus has several separate qualifications, other people may be ready enough to personate him, although he might not wish to personate nate other people?—But those are not the people who are generally personated.

119. Would not it be known if the man is dead?—Yes; but if he is dead they would send another party for him; or if it is known that he is a man who never votes, or will not come to the poll, another man would be sent for him; or if he is known to be out of town; but I never knew of a case of the personation of a person who would be likely to have three qualifications; they are men too well known to have it attempted.

120. Such a person would be a man of property and some considerable station in the town?—Yes; I once saw a man personated while he was himself in the room.

121. Was it a connivance between the two men?—No; he was a man who always thought that he had an important thing to part with when he voted, and he generally came into the room half-an-hour before he voted, and he was personated while he was in the room.

122. Was it detected?—No, it was not detected.

123. Sir George Grey.] With the great desire that exists in Nottingham to check this open and notorious bribery, can you explain why no attempt has been made to put in force the provisions of the Act, which imposes heavy penalties and disqualifications upon persons guilty of bribery, the suit being in the County Court, which is very accessible to everybody?—I have frequently talked to our town clerk about it, who deplores the thing very much indeed, and he considers the Act altogether too difficult and too cumbrous for working.

124. Where is the difficulty, or the cumbrousness of the process in the County Court, to prove a fact which is notorious, and which is known to all the inhabitants of Nottingham?—But the question is, who is to be the prosecutor under the Act.

125. I assume that you have been conversant with those practices for a long time in Nottingham; has it never occurred to you to put the Act in force?—I think it right to say for myself that I have been 21 years in the council, and the whole of my elections have not cost me 50 l.

126. But has it never occurred to you, knowing the general desire which exists among the respectable part of the community of Nottingham to check those practices, to put in force this Act yourself against notorious offenders?—It has been considered very difficult, and it would be a very unpopular thing, and the expense would fall upon the prosecuting party.

127. Do you believe that your popularity would be less if the law were made more simple, as you propose, and if such a case were tried before the recorder, in the town of Nottingham?—Yes, as they would put the expense of trying it upon the town, unless it were a vexatious petition, and then I would put it upon the petitioner. I must say that I have had no reason personally to complain about this thing, because I have never been opposed since I was first elected.

128. Is not this the real reason why the Act has not been put in force, that it would be extremely unpopular to do it?—It would be unpopular, but I do not think that that is the only reason.

129. Chairman.] Is it not the fact that there is no inducement to institute the inquiry, because the election would not be voided?—Just so: there is another reason, I think, which is, that both sides are pretty equally guilty, and it is generally considered, when the election is over, that it is best to let everything drop.

130. Sir George Grey.] You attribute it to that cause rather than to any inefficiency in the existing law; but if it was desired to do it, and if it was a popular thing, the law might be put in force?—I have frequently spoken to our town clerk about it, and he sees great difficulties in putting the law in force.

131. But it has never been attempted?—I do not remember a case where it has been attempted.

132. Mr. Locke.] Have the borough justices never required it?—If the borough justices had the matter brought before them, they might, but they are not public prosecutors.

133. They might make themselves so, might they not?—I think they would be stepping out of their place if they did.

134. Sir George Grey.] Your evidence, thus far, has reference to the election of councillors; does the same system of bribery, or bribery to any extent, exist in the election of auditors and assessors and the mayor?—No, the mayor is elected by the council.

135. And the council is not open to this bribery?—No.

136. How is it with regard to assessors and auditors?—There is never any opposition. I have never known a case where there has been opposition. Each side sends in a nomination for one, and there is never any opposition.

137. If the motive of pecuniary profit were taken away from those elections, what do you suppose would be the motive which would influence the electors in the choice of councillors?—I think, most probably, local matters, and questions arising within the council.

138. As distinct from political matters?—Yes; I think that is likely to be the case.

139. At present, I understand you to say, that political reasons do exist to a considerable extent, and that there is a contest between the two parties in Nottingham as to who shall obtain the majority in the council?—Yes.

140. And you think that that will still exist if the money motive were taken away?—That would still exist, I think.

141. What is the object of obtaining a majority in the council for either political party; does the political character of the council bear at all upon the Parliamentary election?—I do not think that it does now; it did formerly. Traditions have been handed down in Nottingham; we are all Liberals or Conservatives, and it is Liberal and Conservative in everything.

142. Then it is still supposed to operate owing to this tradition upon Parliamentary elections?—I do not know whether it is really supposed so; however, that fact exists. I think the thing is breaking up rather more now; it is gradually getting less.

143. How did it operate formerly upon the Parliamentary elections, in a way that it does not now; has any power been taken from the council with regard to acting politically?—No; generally speaking formerly, and to some extent now, the leading men in the town were in the council, and they took an active part in the general Parliamentary elections, much more so than now.

6 April 1869.

144. Are ward meetings held by the candidates for seats in the council?—Yes.

145. Are those meetings at which the candidates address the people?—Yes, just the same as at the Parliamentary elections.

146. Are there declarations of opinion in favour of one candidate against another?—Yes.

147. How would the ballot operate upon those meetings; would it prevent that expression of opinion which is supposed generally amongst honest men, to pledge a man to a particular course of conduct when the election comes?—I think that the meetings would be held just as usual.

148. And resolutions passed in favour of particular candidates?—I expect that would be so.

149. Then, if the ballot were adopted, do you think that a man who had held up his hand in favour of a resolution to support a particular candidate would, under the shelter of the ballot, go and vote against him?—I do not value much the holding up of hands at public meetings.

150. Do you think that the fact of the ballot would preclude the expression of opinion, on the part of individual electors generally, in favour of particular candidates?—No, I think not; they would express their opinions just the same.

151. You think it would only operate with regard to those who choose to abstain from expressing an opinion?—No.

152. Do you think it would operate upon the large mass of the electors, or upon those individuals who might fear the consequence of giving their votes?—I do not look upon the ballot so much to cover persons who are afraid of the consequence of their vote, as to prevent the candidate knowing how they did vote, and therefore I think he would not pay them, or his agent would not.

153. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] What proportion of voters generally vote at an election when there is a real contest; you say, for instance, that in one ward there are 1,300 voters; how many of those take part in the election?—I should think that out of 1,300, 1,000 would vote; but there is a gentleman from Nottingham who can tell you more than I can about that.

154. And the greater part of them do you say voted for money?—One third.

155. And those persons, in your opinion, would vote for no other reason but money?—I do not think they would, the major part of them.

156. Practically, what causes this corruption at present; is not there a want of interest in the municipal elections in that class?—Yes, in the lower class quite so; and I think the same thing exists in the Parliamentary elections.

157. How do you account for the want of interest in the municipal elections?—There are no topics perhaps before the public which excite those people at all, or which they care about.

158. Does the question of rating affect them?—It would affect them no doubt; if they considered that the corporation were lavishly and foolishly spending money, that would very likely rouse them up, but then they pay very little rates.

159. Supposing you adopted some process of voting by which you would secure that those persons would not get any money, in your opinion would they take any part in the election at all?—I think for a long time they would not, but when they had become unaccustomed to receive money, they might gradually come to take more interest in things and vote, but at first they would not, and I think that is shown by those two instances which I have given, where there were only 200 voted before 12 o'clock.

160. Then I suppose you would assume that that 200 had none of them received money at that time?—Just so.

161. Then there began to be a payment?—Yes.

162. You say that one-third were open to the offer of money; what brought up the rest after 12 o'clock?—It would probably be in this way: in consequence of the bribery being so great many persons held aloof a good deal from it, but still a party might say, you will have sufficient without me, I see you are at the head of the poll; but after a time they would come and vote if they found that their friend was losing and required their support.

164. What I want to get at is not the indifference, because those people became active partisans after 12 o'clock when 200 had voted; after that time 700 voted, and of those, you say, some 200 or 300 were bribed; what made the 400 come up at that time; why would not they come up before?—I can hardly answer that question; many persons seldom vote till the latter part of the day; I do not think there is any special reason.

165. Those would, in your opinion, have come up whether the other people had been bribed or not?—Yes, I think so.

166. In all the wards almost you put it that there are at least two-thirds free from this corruption?—Yes; and in some wards much less.

167. The contests in all those wards probably were political?—Yes; I do not think that politics influence them very strongly, but there are local things which affect those elections.

168. But when they get into the council their politics, as you inform us, become quiescent?—There is a right and left of the chair, the Conservatives take one side, and the Liberals the other, but I have never known the business in any committee of the town affected in any way, or politics introduced.

169. Could not this corruption be very easily put down by the two-thirds if they chose to select the best man in each ward, and voted together for him, irrespective of politics?—That is a hopeless case.

170. But you think that that does not affect their united action in the council?—Just so.

171. Are you of opinion that it does not affect either side?—I do not think it does at all.

172. What is the sort of object that persons have in view, who will expend this money to get into the council?—The objects are various; there are certain persons in a ward who take an active part in these matters, and they select some person who they think would be a suitable person for the council, and they request him to become a candidate, and perhaps he is persuaded into it; a man may have some time, and may be willing to devote himself to some extent to the good of the town or the service of the town, and he consents to stand; we all know very well when a man once consents to become a candidate, the temptations to not lose his election are very great.

173. How

174. Sums as small as 10 s.?—Yes.

175. Then, as I understand, you come to the conclusion that the ballot would be the remedy, not because you have studied the question of the ballot, but because you cannot think of anything else?—I have not studied the ballot sufficiently to give an opinion to the Committee about it.

176. But you have failed to think of anything else that would cure the evil?—Just so.

177. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Of what number does the town council of Nottingham consist?—Of 56.

178. How are they divided with respect to politics?—I think about two-thirds are Liberal, and one-third are Conservative.

179. Have you found that the existence of those corrupt practices at the municipal elections has deterred many on both sides from allowing themselves to be candidates?—I think it has.

180. Has there been no public demonstration on the part of both sides to put down what has existed for many years?—No; there have been chiefly addresses against it, but there has been no consideration of the act.

181. As I understand you, your evidence shows that those are not exceptional cases of corruption, but that they are only part of a general systematic bribery?—Yes, quite so.

182. You referred to a case in the year 1844, when 2,000 l. was spent in one ward, and you said that there were special circumstances connected with that case; what were those special circumstances?—At that election the Liberal party had a majority in the council for a long time, but it had gradually gone down till the election in that ward would have given over the balance to the other side. It was the year for the election of aldermen, and if the one party had lost the election in that ward, the other party would have gained the election of the aldermen for the year, and it would have given them a large preponderance.

183. And then to get that preponderance in the council, the sum of 2,000 l. was incurred by one candidate?—I think it cost more than that.

184. Did that lead to a remonstrance by the inhabitants of Nottingham?—A great many were disgusted.

185. Was there a public meeting held?—No.

186. The excitement all subsided into acquiescence with this state of things?—Yes.

187. Will you tell the Committee exactly what are the circumstances attending the nomination of a man against his consent?—Supposing a dozen people are sitting in a public-house; if they choose to nominate a sweep, they send down to the town clerk's office of Nottingham for a nomination paper, and nominate him.

188. In the event of it going on, who pays the expenses of conveyances and so on?—He would not have conveyances in that case, and very likely the sweep would never put in an appearance, but the candidate against whom this nomination was, would be compelled to get ready for any expenses.

189. Upon whom would the expenses fall, in the event of a man being nominated without his consent?—Upon the town; his voting papers would not be sent out, but there would be the expense of hiring rooms and all the apparatus for carrying on the contest, just the same as if there was a bonâ fide nomination.

190. The voting papers are in the hands of the mayor, are they not?—No; every candidate has his voting papers, but all the nomination papers are in the hands of the town clerk.

191. Are they sent round to the individuals' houses?—Every man has to vote by a voting paper, which is supplied by the candidates.

192. Where does he return it?—To the polling places appointed. There is a presiding alderman, and the whole apparatus for the election.

193. Except between himself and the person to whom he delivers the paper, the voting is secret, is it not; the voting paper is handed in by the person who brings it to the clerk at the table?—A man walks up to the desk, and hands to the presiding alderman the voting paper.

194. Then you have the element of secrecy in the mind of the voter?—Yes, but each side takes care to have their voting papers printed, so that they can always see which way the vote is given.

195. If a man puts it into a ballot box, do not you think you could see into which box he puts his hand?—I say, if secret voting could be established; I do not give any opinion whether it can be or not.

196. Last year, was there much bribery at the municipal elections?—There were fewer contests then than usual.

197. The canvassing for the Parliamentary elections was going on at the same time, was it not?—Yes.

198. Do you think that the fact of the Parliamentary election going on at the same time had any influence upon the municipal election, in increasing bribery?—Not the slightest in the world in Nottingham; last year there were fewer contests than usual; the parties returned on either side were not particularly political men.

199. But you had a contest more than usually severe going on in the Parliamentary borough?—Yes.

200. But you do not think that the bribery in the one election was connected with the other?—Not in the slightest degree.

201. Sir George Grey.] Is it usual for municipal voters, who are also on the Parliamentary register, to vote for a candidate of one political character at the municipal election, and for a candidate of the opposite political character at the Parliamentary election, or do they generally vote the same way?—Unless there is any special influence, they would generally vote the same way at both elections.

202. Is there any such special influence often operating as to induce them to vote different ways?—I believe those men who would take money would vote different ways, if they would pay them on one side at the one election, and on the other side at the other.

203. Is it the fact that they often do vote different ways for the municipal and the Parliamentary mentary elections?—I could not answer that question precisely, but I have not the slightest doubt about it.

204. Mr. Locke.] You stated that the peculiar circumstances of 1844 were in consequence of there being a preponderance on one side on the part of the Conservatives; or has that existed since?—I did not say the Conservatives, but I said on the one side.

205. And in consequence of that, a great deal of money was spent?—Yes.

206. By whom was it spent; was it by subscription, or how?—No, I do not think there was any subscription; it was spent by individuals; there was one gentleman, a very strong political partizan in the town at the time, and he spent a very large sum of money; he is since dead.

207. And money was spent by the other side likewise?—Yes, and by the other side likewise; there was a very strong feeling about it at that time.

208. What is the advantage to either party of having a preponderance in the town council?—I do not think there is any.

209. Then it is a mistake on their part to spend their money to get in?—There is no earthly good in it, but a man wishes to be in the council, and it is the only way he can get in.

210. Supposing that is the only way he can get in, is it material to give a preponderance to one side or the other, unless there is some advantage to be gained by it?—No, I do not see how it can make any difference to him, only a man who is known to be a Liberal in the town, if he is returned, is returned as a Liberal candidate.

211. You stated, did you not, that this large sum of money was expended upon that occasion to obtain the preponderance in the town council for the Liberal side?—For the one side or the other.

212. I ask you what advantage is it to either side having the preponderance in the town council?—I do not think there is any political advantage, beyond the fact, and that must be in a very slight degree, that the influence of the town council is mainly Liberal.

213. In the Parliamentary elections, does the town council take any part?—Not as a council at all.

214. But individuals in the council I presume do?—Yes.

215. Have they an opportunity of bringing to bear the patronage or whatever it may be of the town council to any extent?—That never is done; and I do not think there is any opportunity of doing it.

216. You consider then that the Nottingham town council does not interfere, as a body, or individual members of it, in the Parliamentary elections?—Not as a council at all; not as a body; individuals in the council do of course.

217. What is the reason why it is considered material whether the members of the town council should be Liberal or Conservative?—That has been the course of the municipal elections always; a man puts up on the Liberal side, or is put up by the party, and the council must be Liberal or Conservative as the case may be.

218. But the reason why you cannot tell?—There is no particular reason.

219. Chairman.] Is it the effect of party spirit; is it a desire to see the party which they belong to having the upper hand?—Yes, that is it very much.

220. Mr. Locke.] But it is not connected with the Parliamentary election?—No; it is not connected with the Parliamentary election. There is no doubt if there was a strong contest municipally, and partisans of the one side or the other were elected, the success of that party might have an indirect influence in that way, but it could have no direct influence.

221. You stated that a voting paper was left at the house of each of the electors; is it absolutely necessary that that elector shall vote by the voting paper that has been left at his house?—No, he may write it out if he likes; the Act of Parliament merely prescribes the form that it shall be in.

222. But I do not think the Act of Parliament prescribes that it shall be left at his house?—No, it does not.

223. That is done by the candidates in the same way that a polling-card is sent out by a candidate at a Parliamentary election?—Only a polling-card is of no use to vote with except to remind the voter of his number, whereas the polling paper that is sent out is the thing he would vote with.

224. But that polling paper contains the names of all the candidates, does it not?—No, each gentleman sends out a voting paper complete, even with the persons name written in it.

225. You say it is not necessary he should vote with this paper which is sent him?—Not with the identical paper.

226. Is it not the case at an election, when the polling is going on, that papers are furnished by either side?—By both sides; in a contested election papers will be supplied by both sides, each side supplying a paper with only the name of their candidates on it.

227. Therefore it is not necessary for a person to strike out the names of those for whom he does not intend to vote?—No; the object of the committee who conduct the election is to give the voter the smallest possible trouble, so that he has nothing to do but to take the voting paper of the party for whom he votes and go up with it.

228. Does it frequently occur at an election that voters are very drunk, and papers are put into their hands, and they do not know exactly which side they are voting for?—No, I do not think that does frequently occur at Nottingham.

229. But papers are put into their hands exactly at the time they are going to vote?—Yes, frequently, I have no doubt, and I think voting papers are frequently altered by the persons who go round with them; they alter them at the voter's house, and they take the other voting paper away constantly.

230. Is there not a great deal of difficulty attendant upon those voting papers; do you think that they make the polling more correct than if a man went up to the poll and he were asked his name, and asked for whom he intended to vote?—I think that is better than the polling papers; the paper has no pretence to secrecy; I have no doubt that originally it was the idea that it was a sort of secret voting, but there is no pretence to secrecy about it now; the votes as they are polled in the committee-room are ticked off with the same regularity as at a Parliamentary election.

231. It has no effect as secret voting?—Not the slightest.

232. Has any plan been suggested to you, or struck you, as to any mode which could be adopted adopted of secret voting?—No; I have not considered that question at all; I have never been very much in favour of it, and never given it much thought.

233. With regard to bribery, I asked you just now whether the borough justices might not check it by prosecuting in the case of bribery; they have a clerk, have they not?—Yes.

234. Do not the borough justices very frequently direct their clerk to prosecute persons?—I think not; I do not think it is their province.

235. I mean for ordinary offences?—Yes, for an offence against property, for instance, for felony, or anything of that sort.

236. Or for misdemeanour, or for any offence that is committed by a person?—Yes.

237. The borough justices do frequently give direction to their clerk to prosecute, do they not?—No, not very frequently; in boroughs it is chiefly done by the chief constable, or under the direction of the watch committee.

238. Who is the person that conducts the prosecution?—The clerk to the justices, or the town clerk if it is under the watch committee. If it was a proceeding by the watch committee or by the sanitary committee, it would be done by the town clerk.

239. If direction were given to those officers, they might initiate those prosecutions for bribery, might they not?—Yes; I do not think that that would be the best source from which it could come. Those committees are made up of persons elected by those people of different sides, and I think it would have a tendency to introduce politics.

240. You are aware that some of the justices, or, in fact, all the justices, are appointed by the Lord Chancellor?—Yes.

241. Are they not independent?—I believe they are independent, but I do not see how the justices could set in motion any resolution of this sort; as the law stands at present, it would be very exceptional. I speak with very great diffidence, to the Committee, but I doubt it.

242. Might they not do it for the municipal election, although they might not, perhaps, like to interfere in the Parliamentary election?—I think if it is to be placed upon the justices to do it, it should be by special Act of Parliament, compelling them to do so; I should doubt very much the policy of the proceeding.

243. Do you think that it might make the justices uncomfortable and unpopular?—I do not think the justices would care much about the unpopularity. They would not object if they felt it was their duty; but the justices have never yet felt that it was their duty. I have never known a case in England, where the justices have attempted such a thing. I never knew a case where it was suggested that it should be done by the justices.

244. Mr. Brand.] Is the state of the poll published at the municipal elections?—Yes; constantly, not invariably, but constantly.

245. Then it is quite notorious how every voter has voted?—Yes; what are called tick sheets are left in the committee rooms of each side, and if it is a closely contested election, canvassers go out in all directions to fetch parties to get them to the poll precisely the same as in a Parliamentary election.

246. Do you think it desirable that there should be no publication of the state of the poll?—Very desirable.

247. For what reason?—Towards the close of the poll it increases bribery, and I think there would not be that tendency to bribe, if the state of the poll were not known.

248. Mr. Whitbread.] You told us just now that voting papers were supplied by each side; did it ever happen in your knowledge that a voter voted for some names upon one list, and some names upon another?—Yes.

249. Then he must have altered the paper himself?—The voter must have altered the paper himself, or have got some one to alter it for him.

250. Have you ever heard, in Nottingham, of a subscription being made towards the expenses of those municipal contests, on the part of any Parliamentary representative for Nottingham, either by himself or his agent?—I think not. I have no knowledge of any such thing, and I do not think it has occurred. I have not heard of it.

251. You told us just now that you looked more to the effect of good laws to stop bribery than to secret voting; can you suggest any direction which legislation should take to check bribery?—I think if there was a clearly defined law by which those cases could be discovered and punished without very much expense; if a candidate, for instance, who had been returned to the council, lost his seat, and was prohibited again from serving in the council, being struck off both the Parliamentary and the municipal registers, I think it would have a great tendency to prevent persons running the risk.

252. You would impose more severe penalties upon the side which resorted to bribery?—Yes; and I would, also, in order to encourage prosecution, not put the expense upon the prosecutors; I would put the expense upon the town.

253. Supposing that you had a system of secret voting such as you have advocated, and the winning side has been guilty of gross bribery, who, on the part of the losing side, is to put the machinery in motion to prosecute?—You want a public prosecutor for that.

254. Do you think that the losing side would feel it to be to their advantage, looking to future contests, to put the machinery in force?—I think not.

255. They have not done it hitherto, and would not do it, you think?—They had not done it hitherto, and I think that is, in answer to the question put by the honourable gentleman, the reason why prosecutions have not taken place in Nottingham.

256. Who would supply the public prosecutor with evidence; have you ever considered that subject?—I think it would be just as easy, and the same mode might be acted upon as in a Parliamentary contest; I do not see why it should not.

257. But is there a public prosecutor in Parliamentary contests in Nottingham?—No; there is not a public prosecutor in Nottingham; but there would be no difficulty in getting the evidence, if you got the machinery.

258. Mr. Henry Smith.] You spoke of a person whom you called the manager of the ward; are there managers on both sides in conducting a contest?—Generally speaking, in every ward there are persons who take an active part; very often often the candidate does not take an active part in it himself.

259. Is the manager the person by whom the bribery is conducted?—Very often, I expect; not by himself personally, but it would be through his hands that the money went.

261. Then there is a perfect understanding between the manager and his clients, so to speak?—Perfectly so, if he is a good manager.

262. In your opinion, the ballot or any mode of secret voting would do away with that understanding altogether?—I do not see if there were secret voting, what the manager would have to go upon; he would not know whether the man voted or not.

263. He would know by the result of the poll, would he not?—Yes; it would of course be just possible that the manager might say to those people, if my candidate wins I shall give you so much.

264. Would it not be probable that he would say so; if those people have such perfect confidence in the manager that they are willing to vote upon the assurance that they will be paid in the afternoon the sum that may then be fixed as the proper sum to be paid, would they not also vote under any system of secret voting upon the assurance that they will get paid if the candidate is returned?—I think that the managers of the class of persons that I speak of are rather the exception; I do not think it is universal in all wards that there are persons who stand in that relation.

265. I understand you to say that elections are conducted by committees and the manager of the ward, speaking of him as a person who exists in each ward?—Just so; but it is not all of them that would be trusted by the men that voted before they received the money.

266. But as a rule there are such persons who are trusted in each ward?—There are such persons who are trusted, but I do not know if it is so in every ward.

267. And the relation is one of perfect confidence between the voter and the manager?—Yes; that does not apply to all the voters, but to a large number it would apply.

268. It applies, does it not, to those who are bribed?—Not to the whole of them, but to a considerable number of them.

269. Mr. Fawcett.] Do you think that any Act to be passed against corruption would produce much effect unless there were a public prosecutor?—I think it would produce a good effect if a person could be got to prosecute.

270. But you do not think that unless a public prosecutor were appointed, anyone would take upon himself the responsibility?—I doubt whether any person would be found to do so.

271. Have you any suggestion to make as to who should be the public prosecutor?—I have not considered that matter sufficiently to justify me in making any recommendation to this Committee.

272. You spoke just now of the possibility of there being fictitious nominations for the town council; have many of those fictitious nominations occurred in Nottingham?—Yes; I have known six or eight names sent in in one November. Perhaps I may be allowed to say that the word "fictitious" is scarcely correct; they are real nominations, because the persons nominated are on the register.

273. But they are involuntary nominations?—Yes.

274. Do you think that those involuntary nominations would be discouraged, if the person nominated, or those who nominated him, had to bear a certain portion of the expenses?—Yes.

275. You think that that would prevent them?—Yes; no doubt it would not prevent in every case, a person being nominated against his will, but it would prevent a person being nominated merely as a lark.

276. Is there any dissatisfaction existing in your borough, from the fact, that the ratepayers have to pay the expenses of the municipal elections?—No; I have never heard of it.

277. The only case in which they would be at all dissatisfied I presume is, when they would have to pay the expense of those fictitious nominations?—The expense is not sufficiently large to call for a remark of that sort.

278. Is the necessary expense of conducting a municipal election very much smaller than the necessary expense of conducting a Parliamentary election?—I would state that, in the course of 21 years, I have been elected six times, and the total of my expenditure for the whole time has been under 50 l.

279. I am not referring to personal expenditure, but to the necessary expense of conducting the election?—I think that that will give you an idea of it, when I say that my necessary expenditure for 21 years has been under 50 l.

280. That is what you had to pay yourself?—Yes.

281. But the point that I wish to put to you is this: there are two classes of expenses, are there not; the one the expenses which the candidate voluntarily incurs, which I am not referring to; and the other the necessary expenses of conducting the election which are thrown upon the town?—Yes; such as the hiring of rooms for polling places, and the whole paraphernalia of the election; those expenses are borne by the town.

282. And you say that they are so small, that the town does not object to have to pay for them?—The expense has not been so great as to create observation; the town would object to anything that was not proper expenditure, but it does not come to an amount which leads to observation.

283. Are the necessary expenses of conducting a Parliamentary election very much larger than the necessary expenses of conducting a municipal election?—Yes, very much larger.

284. What need is there for their being larger?—They need be larger, inasmuch as the room required for a polling booth at the Parliamentary election is much larger than the room required for the municipal election; and inasmuch as we have 14,000 on the register for the Parliamentary election, and only 7,000 for the municipal, they require additional room for the additional number of voters.

285. But are not municipal boundaries coterminous with those of the Parliamentary borough?—They are in Nottingham; but a person must be on the rate-book three years to be on the municipal register, and only one year for the Parliamentary.

286. But, except that there are more Parliamentary voters than municipal voters, there is no reason why the necessary expenses of conducting the Parliamentary election should be larger than the necessary expenses of conducting the municipal election?—No; I think not. It requires a rather more expensive kind of booths for the Parliamentary election; generally, rooms are hired, and that sort of thing, for the municipal; and they would require more accommodation for the Parliamentary election.

287. But is there any reason why, if a room suffices for the conduct of the municipal election, a room should not suffice for the conduct of the Parliamentary election, except that there are more voters at the Parliamentary election than at the municipal election?—Certainly not.

288. Therefore, if you double the number of rooms at the Parliamentary election, you can conduct the Parliamentary election in rooms as well as in booths?—Yes; there is frequently more excitement in the Parliamentary election, and more accommodation is needed for getting the voters in and out, which necessarily renders it more expensive than the municipal; but only on that ground.

289. Do you think that, if the town were interested in the economic management of the Parliamentary election, the necessary expenses of conducting it could be made only proportionately larger to the number of voters that are on the Parliamentary, compared with the municipal register?—I am very much afraid that, if the expense of the Parliamentary election were placed on the town, or the county, we should have far more candidates than we have now, and that we should never have an election without a contest.

290. Mr. Leatham.] You were asked some question with regard to personation, and you seemed to think, did you not, that it would be almost impossible to detect personation, unless it was detected at the time the vote was given?—It would be very difficult to say; it is not a matter that I have sufficiently thought over. If a man votes for a person who is dead, or away, and it could be proved who voted for him, it would be detected.

291. You are only a recent convert to the ballot, I believe?—Only a recent convert.

292. Your attention has probably not been drawn to the various forms of the ballot?—No.

293. You are not aware of the forms of the ballot, under which a scrutiny is perfectly possible after the election has taken place, and under which, it may be found out how each voter has voted?—I do not feel at all justified in giving any opinion about the ballot before this Committee.

294. The Right Honourable Member asked you with regard to those preliminary meetings at which resolutions were passed, and you stated, I think, that persons held up their hands at those meetings, and passed resolutions in favour of particular candidates; are the people that attend those meetings merely partizans, or do they belong to the corrupt class?—I think a considerable number of them are partizans, and I have no doubt that persons who receive money are always anxious to encourage the candidates on both sides, and therefore, they do not mind very much which side they shout for.

295. And they are present at those meetings?—Yes.

296. Mr. Staveley Hill.] Do you think that there could be any simpler mode of punishing those people than that any person either promising, giving, or receiving any money, or giving a glass of beer corruptly, or giving 1 s. for a cab, should have to pay the full costs of the suit in the county court, and 40 s. to any informer or any person who would sue for it?—I know that many gentlemen have been very anxious to do something about this matter, and I have had conferences myself with the town clerk, but we have always seen a difficulty about it.

297. Would taking it into the recorder's court make it more popular?—I do not think that 40 s. is any punishment for it; what does it signify to a man if he has spent a couple of hundred pounds?

298. But if the penalty were to be inflicted upon any person giving or receiving, would not that be effectual?—I think that the law does not touch the candidate, supposing the candidate does not do it himself personally. I have an impression that that is the operation of the Act of Parliament, that if it is done by an agent, it does not affect the candidate. But my attention has not been sufficiently called to the subject to enable me to give any positive opinion.

299. You spoke of having received this information from your informants; who are your informants, in what class of life?—There is generally a very decent person in each ward, who has the confidence of the party, and he manages those matters.

300. It is in fact from the ward agents that your information comes?—Yes.

301. Sir Frederick Heygate.] What is the effect of unpopularity in Nottingham?—Supposing any person took a very active part in putting a stop to the payment of this money, the probability is that the parties who are in the habit of receiving it would, at another election when there was no money, vote against him.

302. In the case of a public officer prosecuting, for instance the mayor, would the unpopularity go so far as to render your life unsafe?—No, if it was an Act of Parliament which made it my duty to institute enquiries into these things, I should do it without the slightest hesitation, and I should not be unpopular if the public felt it was my duty, but under the present Act of Parliament it is nobody's duty.

303. If so large a proportion as one third of the constituency were bribed, would not public opinion be strongly against you?—I do not think so, if they knew that it was my duty in virtue of my office; that is one thing, and a person stepping out of his position, and becoming a prosecutor is another thing.

304. Then it would not have the effect of making your life disagreeable, or making you very unpopular?—I do not think so.

305. You state that so large a proportion as one third of the constituency were bribed, and a great many of them by very small sums?—Yes, I think there is a number in whose case if there were nothing else, a pint of ale would do it.

306. Many of those persons so bribed you stated, stated, did you not, were tradesmen in easy circumstances?—No, not in easy circumstances, but the small tradesmen; when I say small tradesmen I mean provision dealers, tailors, blacksmiths, and so forth; I do not mean that because they are of that particular trade they are open to bribery.

307. What would be the amount of the bribes at municipal elections in the average of a number of years?—I cannot tell you; I suppose it would be any price from 2 s. 6 d. to 5 l., but I think that the committee will obtain some information upon this point from the gentleman who will follow me.

308. Then it can hardly be a love of money to people in that position, but it must be indifference to the result of the election?—I am afraid I have given a rather wrong view with respect to tradesmen; they would be persons in humble circumstances as tradesmen.

309. Do you mean to say that 2 s. 6 d. would bribe a 10 l. householder who would vote at the municipal election?—Yes, a great many, but there are a vast number among the working classes who are unable to be bribed.

310. Still you say that the effect upon the municipal council is not very bad?—I know as a fact that in our council we have some of the most respectable men in the town.

311. Politics are not carried into municipal affairs?—I have never known an instance in which politics have affected the decision of any question.

312. As to the neighbouring towns, can you say the same for other towns, such as Leicester and Derby?—I cannot say for those towns.

313. In fact, Nottingham stands by itself in that respect?—I have not inquired into the position of other places, and am not prepared to speak to that.

314. Mr. Howes.] You have described the character of the managers of the wards; those are not the persons, you say, who actually bribe, are they?—I have my information from them, but I do not know personally so much about the details; I think that they are not.

315. Is it not pretty well known who are the persons who actually do bribe in each ward?—I daresay there are persons in each ward who do know, but I do not know.

316. Do you think it is not generally known amongst respectable people?—It is not generally known, I think.

317. Not known in each ward?—I expect that the canvassers in each ward would know whom to send a man to when they called upon him.

318. If not actually known, it could very easily be ascertained?—Yes.

319. When you mentioned canvassers, is it usual in municipal elections to employ canvassers?—Yes, very extensively.

320. Are they paid canvassers?—Not generally paid canvassers to any extent.

321. Do you think anything could be done in the way of stopping bribery, by altering the law as to the employment of canvassers?—I think that it would be a very good thing to make a law to stop it, but I do not see how it could be done. It is a very bad thing, and if there were no canvassing there would be very little bribery, because they would not find out the men who wanted money.

322. Is it not often the case that the same person who is bribed at the municipal election is bribed at the Parliamentary election?—Yes, I think so.

323. Is it not generally supposed that those persons who actually bribe have influence, and have an interest in keeping up that influence?—I think there is nothing in that; the man who has got 100 l. to give away will have double the influence in an election that the man who has 50 l. possesses.

324. Do generally the same persons act from year to year in the municipal elections, and in the Parliamentary elections?—Yes.

325. They necessarily acquire by that means considerable personal influence in a ward?—Yes, I think they do.

326. And they are interested in keeping up that influence, are they not?—I think that has generally arisen in this way; a man has had strong political opinions, or has sided strongly with his party and has taken an active part in the election, and has gradually subsided into that position.

327. You do not see any way, do you, to altering the law, so as to improve it with regard to the employment of canvassers?—If there could be a law to stop canvassing altogether it would be a very good thing; but I fancy it is a law very difficult to make.

328. Chairman.] I understand you to say that you thought that, if the Act were altered so that the election should be invalidated by the illegal acts of the agent of any candidate, it would have some effect?—I think it would.

329. Do you think that if it were so altered, prosecutions would be instituted under the Act?—I think it likely that it would be more difficult to find persons who would be willing to furnish the money, and place themselves at the risk of parties who might act indiscreetly.

330. It is now a certainty, is it not, that if a man spend money enough, he will get in?—Yes.

331. And having once got in he is safe?—He is safe for three years.

332. But if there was the risk that, after that expenditure of money he might be unseated like a Member of Parliament, he would be chary of incurring such an expenditure?—He would be more chary of parting with his money.

333. Mr. Locke.] Are you aware that a quo warranto might be issued by the Court of Queen's Bench to him, supposing he obtained his election by bribery?—Yes, when it is proved.

334. Would he not have to put in an answer to it?—Yes.

335. If it were proved against him that he had obtained his election by bribery, would not his election be void?—Yes, I suppose so, if they had the means of proving the bribery.

6 April 1869.

337. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] You state, do you not, that you wish to put an end to canvassing?—Yes.

338. Will you be kind enough to explain to the Committee what kind of canvassing you mean by that?—I mean going from door to door with a book in your hand, and soliciting votes; I do not see how that could be done away with, but it would be a very good thing if it could.

339. You would stop persons who do that systematically; but how could you distinguish that from the ordinary canvassing which everybody would carry on?—It could not be done, I am aware; I wish to say that there is a very large proportion of working men who never receive bribes and would not; and my observations do not at all refer to working men as a class, but simply to individuals of them.

340. Mr. Fawcett.] You stated that if the plan of throwing the expenses of Parliamentary elections on the towns, in the same way as is now done in the municipal elections, were adopted, contests would be increased; do you think that that would be the case if the person who did not poll a certain number of votes had to pay a share of the expenses?—I think it would, unless the proportion was put pretty high.

341. But supposing he had to pay his own share, as he now has to pay under the present system, do you think it would be a larger number of candidates then than now?—The amount varies so very much that I can scarcely express an opinion.

342. If the necessary expenses of Parliamentary elections were thrown upon the towns, in the same way as is now done with regard to the municipal elections, and if the candidate did not poll a certain proportion of votes, say one-fifth of the number polled, had to pay his share of expenses in the same way as he now has, do you think that the contests would be greatly multiplied?—I think they would be, unless he paid some equivalent to what his expenses are now.

343. Then in that case you do not think they would be multiplied?—No, I do not think they would be then.

344. You always have a contest at Nottingham, have you not, under the present system?—No, not always; we have had latterly, very frequently, but we have had many elections without contests.

345. During the last 20 years, how many elections have you had without a contest?—Several; I cannot call to mind just now how many, but there have been several.

Mr. Job Bradshaw, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Bradshaw.

346. Sir George Grey.] Are you a town councillor of Nottingham?—Not at the present time.

347. Have you been for any length of time?—I have been, at different times, 15 years since the Municipal Act was passed.

348. Have you heard the evidence of the last witness?—I have.

349. Have you anything to add to what he stated with regard to the mode of conducting municipal elections in Nottingham?—I differ from some of the statements which the mayor has made; I think the proportion of corrupt electors is much larger than he stated it to be.

350. Does that observation apply to the whole, as a body, or to each ward?—To the whole as a body, At the last election, in one of the wards, on one side there were 490 electors polled, and 400 of them received 2 s. 6 d. apiece for their votes.

351. Are you stating this fact from your own knowledge?—I did not pay it, and I did not see it paid, but a person in the service of my son paid the money.

352. What ward was that?—That was in Byron Ward.

353. What is the largest sum you have ever known paid in any one ward for a municipal election?—£20 a vote.

354. What was the description of voter that received that sum?—They were tradesmen, what we should call respectable tradesmen.

356. Did that give rise to the great bribery that took place in the election that year?—It was the struggle on that particular occasion which gave rise to that amount of bribery. In one ward there was 4,000 l. expended by the candidates, and in two other wards in the town the contest was almost equally severe. I should think probably, on the whole, there was 7,000 l. or 8,000 l. expended upon that contest, for the purpose of obtaining the mastery in the council.

357. Since the year 1844, when those circumstances occurred, has the practice of bribery continued with or without any intermission?—The unsuccessful party on that occasion have never never since attempted to obtain the mastery in the council; but still the system of bribery has continued up to the present time. There are contests, probably, in one or two wards every year, and whenever there is a contest there is always bribery.

358. Does the contest turn upon political questions?—The parties nominated are generally of opposing politics, but they are not persons of influence or position in the town, and the contests of late years have subsided into a struggle between persons in the lower rank of life who have accumulated a little property, and who wish to obtain a position in the town, and they think that by having a seat in the council they become more dignified and persons of more influence and authority; and those are the contests which principally take place now; that is the character of them for the last 15 or 20 years.

359. Are there any of those contests which are quite devoid of any political object?—Quite so.

360. Do they take place between members of the same political party in the borough?—Occasionally they do; for instance, I was myself elected for St. Mary's Ward in 1858 without a contest; I was re-elected in 1861, and again in 1864, and again I offered myself in 1867, which was my year for retiring. From personal pique, another gentleman offered himself in opposition to me, and he gave, I suppose, 1 l., 30 s., or 2 l., a vote. I did not give a farthing, and of course I polled 21 votes and he polled 300; but we were of the same political party. It frequently happens that the electors at one election elect a person of one political party, and at the next election they will elect a person of the opposite political party, because they get the money from the one side or the other.

361. Is the receipt of money the principal motive which induces people to vote at Nottingham at the municipal election?—It is the only motive, for the respectable people do not vote at all, or very few of them.

362. What is the feeling of the borough with regard to this notorious bribery?—Everybody, I believe, at least all respectable persons of both political parties, are very much ashamed, and very much disapprove of it.

363. Have any efforts been made within your knowledge to put it down or check it?—Not at all; and I think it would be a very bold man, indeed, who attempted to do so.

364. You mean that the unpopularity would be so great, that he would not like to incur it?—No doubt about it; and if our mayor, who preceded me, were to originate any proceeding of that kind, he would lose his seat in the council as a matter of course.

365. You think that is the reason why the law has never been attempted to be put in force?—I think that the principal reason has been the unpopularity which would attach to the person who would set it in motion.

367. You stated that the bribery began in 1844, since the Municipal Act passed, since the present system has been in existence?—No; the bribery began before 1844.

368. You said that the first election after the Municipal Act passed was a pure one?—Yes.

369. When did the bribery begin?—I think perhaps two or three years after the first election; three years, probably.

370. The motive being to obtain a preponderance for one political party in the council?—Yes, to get the preponderance; I was in hopes, and so were many other gentlemen elected in the first council, that it would be agreed to govern the town irrespective of party principles, and to select the best men.

371. Have you any suggestions to offer, with a view to cure this evil?—I do not see any other method, except that of making the punishment of bribery more easy of enforcement than it at present is.

372. Did you not state that the reason why the law at present was not enforced, was the extreme unpopularity which would attach to any person who attempted to enforce it; how would that objection be removed by making the law more simple?—It must be done by a person independent of local influence and authority, who would be perfectly indifferent to the feeling of the electors.

373. You mean a person in the character of a public prosecutor?—Yes, exactly so.

374. You do not believe that the law could be enforced either by the local authorities, or by any person unconnected with any local authority, if he was an inhabitant of the place?—I think not.

375. Have you any other suggestion to make?—I am not aware of any at present.

376. Mr. Villiers.] You have no doubt, have you, that you could get evidence if you had anybody of that independent character to put the law in motion to convict the persons who were bribed?—I think it might be obtained.

377. You did not mean to say that everybody who has a seat in that council, has paid for his seat when you referred to the universality of the bribery?—I should not like to say that, because I had a seat there myself without paying for it.

378. Then it has been since you have ceased to be in the council, that it has become more general?—No, I only retired in 1867, three years before the last election.

379. Perhaps it was going too far to say that nobody could sit in the council without paying?—I did not mean that.

380. You say the respectable people do not vote, and that the majority of those who do vote, are open to corruption?—Certainly, they have the election entirely in their own hands; it is the impression of the respectable voters that it is useless giving themselves any trouble about it, and the candidates generally are of such a class and character that they do not approve of them, and they decline to vote.

381. I suppose the great majority of those people that you have described, only vote for the sake of the money, and if they were not paid they would probably not vote at all?—Very likely not; and then the respectable parties would come and vote in time, and in time those corrupt voters or their successors would take an interest in individuals and town affairs and come in with the rest if you could put down bribery.

382 Do you agree with the mayor that if a man did not know whether he got the vote after he had paid the money he would not give the money?—I do not quite agree with that; in the contest by which I lost my seat, I think even if there had been the ballot I should have been defeated equally the same.

383. By corrupt influence?—Yes; but I think a person who obtains his seat by the ballot might be incapacitated from sitting, and prosecuted, and the parties who receive bribes, too, if he spent money corruptly or gave promises.

384. But if those people who are so corrupt would not get the money, supposing there was the ballot, they would not vote at all, would they?—I think many of those who have been in the habit of being paid for their votes would not vote at all, and I could give an instance of that, at the Parliamentary elections. There was an election in Nottingham in 1847, at which two gentlemen were candidates; one of them had been elected several times with a large majority, but with the influence of money; at that election in 1847, he would not pay any money, at least I do not say he, but there was no money forthcoming to buy votes at all, and that gentleman was at the bottom of the poll who had always been at the head of the poll before.

385. That looks as if money determined the elections at Nottingham?—Yes.

386. You infer, that if the people who received money did not expect it they would not vote, and then the respectable people who did not receive money would have it in their hands?—Yes; or the same class of people who had been in the habit of receiving bribes would come in and vote with their neighbours for the best qualified man.

387. What would be the inducement to a man to pay money if he was not sure of the vote?—It would be in this way: in the case of my election, if the party had said he would give 1 l. a-piece for a vote if he was elected, of course they would vote for him, because they would know, that if they did not vote for him they would not be paid another time; and therefore they would be honest to him for the purpose of being paid another time.

388. That would be the case where each party knows whether the bargain has been fulfilled or not; but I am talking of a system under which the person who paid the money would not know what he paid for, because the person voting by ballot might vote for you in that case, and not for the person who, you say, got in by paying?—If I had promised 300 persons 1 l. a-piece for their votes at the municipal election, and I was not elected, I should know that those parties had not been honest to me; and at the next election I should not give them money, and they would not get paid by anybody.

389. You mean that a man would say, "I will pay you if I win"?—He might say that.

390. You could not be certain of any man's vote, if he voted in secret?—Certainly not.

391. If those people only voted for money, they would not vote at all, if there was voting by ballot, would they?—If they were promised money to vote, they would vote.

392. Supposing, when a man came to claim the money, the person said, "How do I know that you voted for me"? he would not give him money merely because he said he had voted?—Of course not.

393. Do not you see in that one means of preventing corruption if the vote was made secret?—It is one means of course; I have hitherto, like the mayor, been opposed to the ballot; but I think it is desirable to adopt or try any plan which will check this corruption; I do not think that it is possible to extinguish it entirely, but I think it may be checked or discouraged.

394. Do you say that there is a very strong opinion in Nottingham against bribery and corruption?—Yes, there is amongst the respectable portion of the population.

395. But I am afraid it is further back than 1818 or 1820 that people have been bribed at Nottingham?—Yes.

396. It has always been a very corrupt place, has it not?—Mr. Birch contested the borough in 1802 against Mr. Parker Coke; he spent a great deal of money, and he was afterwards made a baronet for it; at least it was said so; and in 1812 there was a great contest, in which Mr. Arkwright was the candidate against Lord Radcliffe, and it was said that Mr. Arkwright spent 20,000 l. on that election, and was unsuccessful.

397. There always has been money spent at elections at Nottingham, has there not?—Ever since I recollect, and that is since 1818.

398. And the opinion of Nottingham is now, that that should be put a stop to?—Amongst respectable persons; not amongst those who receive the money.

399. They want some change in the law by which corruption may be prevented in future?—No doubt.

400. And you think secret voting is one way?—I think it is one way.

401. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] I understand you not to look hopefully towards secret voting?—I think it would be better than the present plan.

402. You mean if the secret voting stops corruption?—Yes.

403. But I understand you to be of opinion that a candidate might bribe, and a voter might accept a bribe, though secret voting was established?—Yes.

404. Your idea of stopping corruption is mainly through the instrumentality of the law as at present existing, is it not?—I would make the difficulty of corrupting the electors as great as possible, and I would make the punishment severe when it was detected.

405. How would you make the difficulty of corrupting the electors greater?—The ballot would be one method of making it difficult, because there would be the uncertainty whether the party who was corrupted had voted in the way he was paid, or promised to be paid, to vote.

406. Still you are of opinion that a man might promise to pay, and pay if he was returned?—Yes.

407. In that event the bribe would be just the same?

same?—Just the same, and the punishment the same.

408. With regard to the appointment of a public prosecutor, what is the way in which you would recommend the law to be enforced; have you ever considered how a man should be appointed to that office?—No, I have not.

409. Or what kind of man would take it?—No, not at all; I have not given my attention particularly to the mode in which it may be accomplished, but I think it is not an impracticable thing at all.

410. You think it would not be possible to appoint a local man?—It would not be desirable to do so.

411. If you did not appoint a local man, how could he know anything about the circumstances of the place in order to institute a prosecution?—The parties who were aggrieved by the result of the election would give him information or provide him with evidence to punish the parties.

412. You still leave the initiative to the parties aggrieved by the result of the election?—Yes, of course he must have evidence from the locality.

413. But the initiative would still remain with the parties aggrieved by the result of the election?—It does not follow that anyone is to know who initiates the matter at all; the public prosecutor would initiate it as far as the public are concerned.

414. Do you not think it would come out that the parties who lost the election gave such information to the public prosecutor as would induce him to prosecute?—I think probably there would be some risk attending persons giving evidence in cases of that kind, but I think if a public prosecutor were appointed, and there seemed to be an honest and sincere intention to put down this system, the system would gradually subside, and parties who gave evidence against it, and extinguished it, would not be liable or subject to the unpopularity which at first would arise from their taking action in the matter.

415. What do you mean by an honest and sincere intention; on whose part?—On the part of the Legislature.

416. Then you think that the mere fact that further measures were taken by the Legislature, such as the appointment of a public prosecutor, would be an earnest of their wish to put it down?—Yes, and the infliction of penalties upon parties acting in these corrupt matters.

417. In fact you would wish a more stringent measure passed with reference to municipal elections, similar to the more stringent measure that was passed last Session with reference to Parliamentary elections?—Yes; only as we have annual elections, it would hardly be fair to put the expense of prosecuting those annual cases upon the parties who moved in them; I think the expense ought to be borne by the public rates, except as the mayor stated, it was a mere frivolous and vexatious prosecution, and then the parties originating it should pay the expense of it.

418. It would be likely, would it not, to add to the unpopularity of the prosecution if the expense was borne by the public rates?—Perhaps it might, but I think it would ultimately lead so far to the extinction of it that the expense would seldom be incurred; we should get the elections much more pure, and, ultimately, there would be no public prosecutions, or as few as there are now, and that is none at all.

419. In fact you think that the determination of the Legislature would influence public opinion?—I think so

420. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Is not this the present state of Nottingham; that the people who get the money, and those who give it, are not ashamed of it, and do not treat it as involving any moral guilt?—That is so.

421. Do you think that with that, without some very severe measure, you can hope to influence the public feeling, either of those who give or those who take?—I think an alteration of the law in a case of this kind would produce a great moral effect upon the parties who have generally been acting in those things, and would deter them from continuing those practices.

422. As I understand you, at present there is a sort of freemasonry between the givers and the takers, and, in your opinion, no kind of voting would prevent their keeping faith when they had taken the money?—I think not.

423. Supposing the ballot were to be tried, and a man were to find that, having bribed, say 300 or 400 persons, it appeared, as far as he could see from the numbers, that they had all voted for him, would he not be safe in paying the next time in the same way?—Of course he would; but he would be open to prosecution.

424. And that he is now, is he not?—Yes.

425. But, as far as the ballot is concerned, if he found that the number he had bribed happened to vote, he would have the same security in giving them bribes as he had had before?—Exactly.

426. And more chance of secrecy?—I do not think he would have more chance of secrecy, or as much; perhaps he would have as much as at present; but that is very little.

427. Now, you say, it is done openly?—Yes.

428. That is because there is no reprobation in Nottingham against it?—Not at all.

429. As I understand you, in your own case, only 21 people were found to come up to vote in a case where principle alone was in view?—That is so.

430. And that even those who ought to take an interest in the election, and who are very much interested in rates in the town of Nottingham, will not take the trouble to come and take their part?—Because they know that the result of the election is entirely in the hands of those parties who sell themselves.

431. And, in your opinion, they form a very much larger proportion than the mayor spoke of?—Very much larger, I think.

432. Are you of opinion that one-half of the 7,000 municipal electors are open to this influence?—Quite.

433. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Did I understand you to say that you thought it was the existence of bribery at Parliamentary elections which led to the existence of bribery at municipal elections?—Yes; because many of the voters, under the old system of Parliamentary elections, became municipal electors under the new Act of Parliament.

434. In Nottingham are there a very large number of freemen?—They are a diminishing number, I think; but there are about 2,000, if I remember rightly.

435. In those earlier elections there were a larger number of freemen, were there not?—Yes, there were.

436. And

436. And you think it was the taint of the Parliamentary elections which brought about this municipal corruption? — A man who had been in the habit of taking money for his vote at the Parliamentary elections, when he became a municipal elector, would look for it upon that occasion especially.

437. Are you prepared to give the same evidence as the mayor did, that there has been no attempt on the part of the respectable inhabitants of Nottingham to put down this, which is such a great evil to the town?—There has not been any.

438. Are you also of opinion, with the mayor, that the fact of this corruption has prevented a great many of the most respectable men in the town from offering themselves at the municipal election?—No doubt about it; I believe that what the mayor has said is perfectly true; that there are in the council, I will not say a majority, but there is a fair proportion of highly respectable and influential men of business and talent and character, but there are a great number of persons who, I should say, are not fit; it is a delicate thing to say about one's townsmen, but I do not think that if the elections were conducted upon pure principles those would be the men selected by the electors to represent them.

439. Do the same men that you tell us abstain from taking any part in municipal elections on account of the corruption existing at those elections, also abstain from taking any part in the Parliamentary elections?—No.

440. They take their part on the one side or the other —Yes, generally they do.

441. Is it your opinion that the corruption now at the municipal elections is greater than what exists at the Parliamentary elections?—The last Act of Parliament has admitted into the Parliamentary constituency all the corrupt portion of the municipal constituency, and of course we had the municipal elections on the 1st of November last, and at those elections the parties were bribed where there was a contest; a fortnight afterwards came the Parliamentary election, and of course the same parties think that there is a difference between the Parliamentary election and the municipal election; but the difference is, that it is a higher kind of thing, and they ought to have a higher price.

442. The mayor told us that the influence of those municipal elections had no effect upon the Parliamentary elections; do you coincide with what the mayor said?—The municipal elections have no effect upon the Parliamentary elections.

443. You have come here to state that there is extensive corruption at the municipal elections, and we know as a fact, that last year the municipal and Parliamentary elections took place within a fortnight of one another; there being, as we all know, great corruption at the municipal election; was there also corruption at the Parliamentary election on the last occasion?—I have no doubt about it, and I will give an instance of it. In the ward in which I reside at present, a gentleman offered 400 electors half-a-crown a-piece at the municipal election, and a great number of them, probably the majority, of the very same persons voted on that occasion for what we call the Liberal candidates, but at the Parliamentary election they voted on the other side.

444. Sir George Grey.] And you believe they did it in consequence of being bribed to vote for the Parliamentary candidate?—That is my belief.

445. Mr. Locke.] Were there any instances where a sufficient sum of money was given for a bribe at the municipal election, to induce a voter to give his vote to the person on whose behalf he was bribed at both elections, either on the Liberal side or on the other side?—No, certainly not; it was fresh bribery, it was a different business altogether.

446. It was in the year 1835 that this Municipal Corporation Act was passed; how soon after that do you say, that bribery was introduced into the municipal elections?—I think in 1838 probably, or 1837.

447. It was almost immediately?—Yes, it was. It was in consequence I believe of that part of the council which had the majority, appointing all the aldermen from their own side.

448. It was in 1835 that the Act was passed, and the first election was a pure election, but those persons at Nottingham had been accustomed to return Members to Parliament, had they not, before the Municipal Corporation Act was passed?—Yes, that portion of the constituency who were freemen; the old Parliamentary constituency were freemen and freeholders in Nottingham.

449. Freeholders to what amount?—Forty shillings, the same as the county; it is a county of itself; the freeholders voted, and the freemen.

450. A great many of those freemen became voters did they not, in the municipal election?—Yes.

451. And they understood what bribery was, before the Municipal Corporation Act was passed?—Yes; I say that the municipal bribery was founded upon the Parliamentary bribery.

452. Was there no bribery in Nottingham before the Municipal Corporation Act passed?—Yes, in 1818, 1820, and in 1826, there was.

453. I understood you to say that at some particular election, after the Municipal Act passed, there was a great deal of bribery, and that that induced people to be bribed at the municipal election; was it not what had always taken place at Nottingham?—It had always taken place.

Mr. John Sanderson Butler, called in; and Examined.

454. Sir George Grey.] What are you?—I am a resident in Nottingham, and out of business.

455. What was your business when you were in it?—A lace manufacturer.

456. Have you been engaged professionally, or in any other way, in municipal elections, not as candidate, but as an agent?—Not professionally, but from an interest and desire to see the party that I felt inclined to support, obtain the ascendency, and remain in it.

Mr. J. S. Butler.

457. As an agent, not as a principal?—Not as an agent, but I am now a member of the council.

458. Have you been engaged in any capacity in the conduct of the elections on behalf of other persons who have been candidates?—For many years I have been making arrangements for the conduct of the elections.

459. Have you heard the evidence of the two previous witnesses?—Yes.

460. Do you concur with them as to the extent to which bribery has prevailed in the municipal elections at Nottingham, for many years past?—I do in a great measure; I have only actually known one ward, Sherwood Ward, and in that ward there is very little bribery, or not to the extent that has been represented in any other ward that I know.

461. What proportion of municipal voters in Sherwood Ward do you suppose receive bribes; I think the mayor gave the number as 300 out of 1,435?—I think that is about the number.

462. Have you yourself been actively engaged in canvassing those 300?—I never canvassed them myself, but I may say that I have not known a municipal contest in Nottingham for the last 25 years without bribery.

463. What do you do with regard to the election in any given year?—I should make all the arrangements for the polling staff. This is a voting paper (producing the same). It would be filled up, and delivered by the voter to the presiding alderman.

[The following Paper was delivered in:—]

BOROUGH OF NOTTINGHAM.

VOTING PAPER FOR TOWN COUNCILLORS FOR SHERWOOD WARD.

Christian Name and Surname of the Persons for whom I Vote.	Place of Abode.	And Description.
John Barber - -	Long-row, Nottingham.	Tea Dealer.
John Howitt - -	Hampden - street, Nottingham.	Bookseller and Stationer.

(Signed) (Qualification) (Situation of Property)

House,

Nottingham, 1st November 1866.

Polling Place, Room No. 1, Mechanics' Institution. Entrance in Burton-street.

464. Having arranged that the voters shall have the voting papers, do you assist in bringing them to the poll?—Not at all; the canvassers would fetch them to vote.

465. Had you anything to do with bribing those 300 people?—Not at all.

466. Did the money come from you?—It never came from me.

467. Did it pass through your hands?—It never passed through my hands; but parties would have the money, and I knew where the money was placed.

468. Did you know the persons who had the money, what they had it for, and to whom they gave it?—I should get to know afterwards.

469. Your knowledge is limited to that ward?—My knowledge is limited to that ward entirely. Knowing the class of voters that have received money for years, I have made a note of them.

470. You know, in fact, those voters who were open to bribes, and who would vote for the highest bidder?—I do; I know the class of voters.

471. What is the highest amount of money that has ever been given to any voter for his vote in that ward?—Not more than 10 s., and that would be an extreme case, near the close of the poll.

472. What is the class of voters?—If the bribe is 5 s., it would be the humbler class; but if it got up to 10 s., men of a more respectable class would come to receive it.

473. What would be their professions or employment?—I have known men of business, paying a rent of 40 l., come for a half-sovereign.

474. A very large proportion of the voters in that ward were not bribed?—A very large proportion.

475. But were they of the same class as those who were bribed?—Of the same position in life. There are plenty of working men in that ward who would never receive a bribe.

476. Were there many contests in that ward?—Not a great many; it has a Liberal tendency, and there has not been much opposition.

477. It was not worth while to bribe there as much as in some other wards?—I think that was the reason.

478. Have you any addition to make to the evidence which the Committee have heard from the other witnesses; first, information as to facts, and then suggestions?—I have only information with regard to the "balance of power" that some people call it, in the year 1843, in the council.

479. Do you concur in the statement which has been made with regard to the election of 1844, and the cause of the extensive bribery which took place then?—Yes, I do concur in that; and I have a suggestion to make, having had a great deal of experience in conducting the elections.

480. Have you any suggestions to make, with a view to checking the bribery?—Yes, I have; I would speak of the Parliamentary election in Nottingham; we have 14,168, names upon the Parliamentary register, consisting of freeholders, freemen, and occupiers; an occupier may be at the same time a freeholder and a freeman, and he may have an occupation in two parishes, so that he would be on the register four times, and numbers are on the register three times, and we often find it difficult to prevent some of those men from voting more than once. My impression is, that no man's name should appear on the register more than once.

481. That rather turns upon the question of registration, but have you any suggestions to make with a view to checking bribery?—I have my own notions of conducting elections.

482. We have had evidence to show, that bribery to a very large extent exists in the municipal elections at Nottingham; have you any suggestions to make with a view to check bribery at the municipal elections?—I would have the Parliamentary register divided into wards in boroughs and corporate towns, and polling districts in the counties, and the names alphabetically arranged, the same as the municipal register; and I would only have them poll in those districts where their names are upon that district register, and that could be easily arranged. I would not allow canvassing, if canvassing could be stopped; it is a great cause of all the bribery, and all the evils that are consequent upon the elections. House-to-house canvassing is the great cause of all the evil. I would also not allow the state of the poll to be made known during the time of the voting. I would not allow any voters to be conveyed to or from the poll by either public or private conveyances, especially in boroughs; and I would have all nominations for candidates by nomination papers, to be signed by two electors, and a form signed by the person nominated accepting such nomination, and to be delivered before four o'clock in the afternoon, and a sum of money deposited for his share of the election expenses. The returning officer would make known a certain time by which the nomination papers must be delivered in. I would not have the election take place in less than two days after that, and I would not allow any check clerks to write down the names. There would be no necessity to have any expense. Those ward registers are district registers, and the poll could be taken from them. The candidate's agent could stand with them in his hand, and see that the party's name was on the register when he came to vote. That would simplify the conducting of the election.

483. How does all this bear upon bribery?—I would not allow canvassing, and I would not make known the state of the poll till the final close of the poll, because the moment it is known that a candidate is in the minority, if he is a popular man, his friends begin to bribe and exert themselves to get him up in the poll.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. HENRY DARVILL, called in; and Examined.

Mr. H. Darvill.
9 April 1869.

484. Chairman.] YOU are Town Clerk of Windsor, are you?—I am.

485. Have you had much experience of municipal elections and of the mode in which they are conducted?—I have had considerable experience of municipal elections, having witnessed them for something like 30 years.

486. Have you formed any opinion as to whether they have been conducted purely, or the contrary?—I think that a practice prevails, I may say in most boroughs, of paying some men for their day's work for voting.

487. Does your experience relate to any other borough besides Windsor?—Not personal experience; but I apprehend that all boroughs are very much alike.

488. And this practice has prevailed in Windsor?—I presume it has; I have reason to believe it has.

489. Is it a matter of common notoriety?—There is no doubt that people are paid their day's work. I do not mean to say universally, because there are a great many respectable people, of course, who would not take anything of that kind; but many of the burgesses receive money in the shape of their day's work for voting at the municipal elections.

490. Is that, in your opinion, the extent to which bribery prevails in the municipal elections in Windsor?—I do not think it extends beyond that; it may sometimes come to more than the day's work; but I do not think that it extends much beyond that.

491. Does the sum of money which is paid vary in different elections, or is it usually about the same sum?—About the same sum; the voters go to the agent of the party, who is generally the agent of one of the political parties, and they receive the money.

492. But is about the same sum paid to any man who wants it, by each side?—No; I do not think it is. I think the majority at Windsor is essentially of one complexion, and that is altered by means of the payment of those moneys.

493. Do you mean one political complexion?—Yes, I believe that there is a particular political complexion, which if uninfluenced would be in a particular direction, and I think the alteration is made by means of those payments that I refer to.

494. Do any other evils prevail in the municipal election besides this payment of a day's wages?—Men are frequently intimidated and compelled by their masters to vote one way, when they would wish to vote another way, and I think, also, that the voting papers are very objectionable.

495. In what way?—I think they are repeatedly tampered with; in short, I know they are. As men come to the poll, persons will give them something to drink, and put in another name into the paper, and then take them up to the poll.

496. You allude to drink being given, does treating prevail to any great extent?—Not to any great extent, there is not much of it.

497. Are the elections peaceably conducted generally, or is there any rioting?—Very peaceably conducted.

498. Can you form any opinion of the proportion of electors in the borough of Windsor, who would expect to be paid a day's wages for their vote?—Enough to turn the election, I should think about 50 or 60.

499. What is the total number of voters in the municipal election?—The burgesses for the Out Ward are, 516; and for the In Ward, 298; in the year 1863, for the two wards there were only 660.

500. Are there any freemen on the register?—There are no freemen, I am happy to say.

501. Is there, in your opinion, any connection between the municipal and the Parliamentary election?—The same persons who act in the one, are always partisans in the other, on the same sides; and therefore the influence operating upon a man in one, will run into the other.

502. Is

502. Is it within your knowledge that the municipal election has ever been worked with a view to the ensuing Parliamentary election?—No; I do not think in the borough of Windsor, it has; but at the same time, as in the recent case, where the Parliamentary election immediately succeeded the municipal election, I think that the one did affect the other; but in the ordinary way, supposing the municipal election to take place on the 1st of November, and the Parliamentary election not to take place till the month of June or July in the following year, I do not think that the municipal election in November, would affect the Parliamentary election in the subsequent July; but if it takes place in the same year, practically it might be made available for the purpose of influencing the borough Parliamentary election with very great ease.

503. Have you ever known any attempt made to put the existing law in force to check bribery?—I have never heard of any attempt of the kind, and I think it would be thought an uncivil thing to do.

504. Is there any feeling amongst the most respectable part of the inhabitants of Windsor that this system of bribery or payment of voters is a disgraceful and discreditable one?—I have heard many strong observations made by candidates who have not succeeded, and who have informed me that they had promises given to them equivalent to a very large majority, and that, when they went to the poll, they were defeated by a considerable majority, which they attributed entirely to that system which I have referred to, and of course they were strong in their reprobation of such conduct.

505. How do you account for the fact that no attempt has been made to put the law in force?—Simply because when they have fought the battles they wish to end them there is no malignant feeling, I think, generally in our town.

506. But if it were generally felt to be a discreditable system, would not some attempts have been made to both sides to put a stop to it?—Men look rather to their personal interests than to high motives in matters of this description, and do not wish to perpetuate ill-feeling.

508. Sir George Grey.] What is the number of the Parliamentary electors at Windsor?—1,777.

509. What is the number of municipal electors?—The number of municipal electors is about 814.

510. Would not your suggestion raise the number of municipal electors to the same number as the Parliamentary roll, or nearly so?—No, not at all; the borough boundaries are not conterminous.

511. Do you think that increasing the number of electors would diminish bribery?—Yes; I think it would.

512. Is there more or less bribing at the Parliamentary elections than there is at the municipal elections?—I think that 100 people were bribed at the last Parliamentary election for Windsor.

513. Chairman.] Have you some suggestion to make with regard to voting papers?—Yes; I think that voting papers are objectionable, and that personal voting would be better; I think that the papers lead to considerable abuse.

514. Is it necessary under the existing law that they should vote by voting papers, or is it only optional?—It is compulsory; they must deliver in the papers with the names of the persons for whom they vote, to the alderman presiding in the ward.

515. And what system do you recommend should be adopted instead?—The same system as is now adopted in the Parliamentary election, namely, open voting, unless you adopt the alternative of secret voting, which is another thing.

516. Have you formed any opinion on the relative merits of those two systems?—My impression is, that the only thing that will ever put down bribery, corruption, and intimidation, is voting by ballot, and I am sorry to be obliged to come to that conclusion; I have opposed it all my life time, but I am bound to say I am convinced against my will.

517. What do you consider the great evils of the existing system of voting papers?—I think that they get altered and tampered with, and to ignorant people they are absolutely useless; a man does not know what names are upon them, many of them can neither read nor write.

518. Do they afford greater facilities for bribery?—I do not know that the voting papers themselves would give any greater facilities for bribery than open voting.

520. Under the present law, any person may be disqualified from being a town councillor who has been guilty of bribery, may he not?—I do not recollect.

521. Will you read section 11 of the Act of the 22 Vict. c. 35?—"If any person at any election of mayor, councillors, auditors, or assessors for any borough shall be guilty of bribery, he shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of 40 s. to any person who shall sue for the same in the county court, with full costs of suit; and any person offending in any case in which, under the Act or Acts for the time being in force with respect to the election of Members to serve in Parliament for boroughs in England and Wales, the name of the offender may be expunged from the list of voters, being lawfully convicted thereof, shall for the term of six years be disabled to vote in any election in such borough, or in any municipal or Parliamentary election whatever, in any part of the United Kingdom, and shall for such term be disabled to hold, exercise, or enjoy any office or franchise to which he then shall or at any time afterwards may be entitled as a burgess of such borough, as if such person were naturally dead." I now recollect that Act of Parliament, but I do not think that is enough.

Mr. H. Darvill, Esq.

522. Under that Act, a town councillor having obtained his election by improper practices might be disqualified, might he not?—He might be, if a conviction took place; but it is a very difficult thing to get a conviction of that kind. I have never known an instance of the kind.

523. But I think you said that you have never known it tried?—No, I have never known it tried, and I do not think it easy to get a person convicted of bribery.

524. He cannot be convicted, unless an attempt is made, can he?—It is a very difficult thing to convict a man of bribery before a jury.

526 Do you observe that, under that clause, a person in order to be disqualified must have been guilty of bribery himself?—Yes.

528. Would not that give great facilities for the employment of agents who were not openly recognised, and who might commit any breach of the law?—Then I should make them subject to a misdemeanour, and they would be punished. If any person canvassed other persons systematically without having got his authority from the candidate, I should say, "You have done an illegal act, for which you are responsible"; for he could get the authority if he desired it, in which case the candidate would be held responsible; but if the candidate was not responsible, and the man did it on his own authority, he should be punished for a misdemeanour; many candidates at Parliamentary elections have been unseated, simply because their friends have been over zealous.

529. Would you place treating at public-houses under the same law as bribery?—I would make it equally dangerous; I should further suggest that the voting should be by ballot, and I believe that that is the only way in which you would be able to get the true honest opinion of the men themselves who are voters.

530. Have you some suggestion to make with regard to the account of the expenses?—I think that it would be an excellent plan if the councillors and the agents that they employed should make a return, and make that return, both of them, upon oath, that no sums had been paid, or would be paid, beyond the amount specified in that return; and I would also include in that return, for the purpose of avoiding any question, all claims and liabilities, because, at Parliamentary elections now the only figures that are returned are of those sums which have been paid; and I have no hesitation in saying, and I say it most deliberately, that I am confident that many of those returns made by agents for Parliamentary expenses, are a farce; and that the expenditure is far in excess of the amount returned where there is a contest; I would suggest that all candidates, in the case of municipal elections, should be compelled to make a return, and to make it upon oath in the way I have mentioned.

531. Is it within your knowledge what sums have been spent upon municipal elections?—I never interfere with the municipal elections myself in any way, but I should say that a municipal election might cost perhaps 50 l. to a candidate; in some boroughs it is much more.

532. You do not believe that more has been spent by a candidate in Windsor?—I do not think so. But I believe that you will never get a fair return of the payments, unless the return is made upon oath; and I do not think that you will be able to get men to vote free from either corruption or intimidation without the ballot, either at the Parliamentary or the municipal elections.

533. Mr. Villiers.] Have you come deliberately to that conclusion with respect to the ballot?—I have, indeed, deliberately and against my personal feelings, and therefore it is an honest conclusion.

534. Have you considered all the consequences of adopting the ballot in lieu of the present system?—Yes, I have.

535. I mean with respect to liabilities and expenses; do you think that it might be the means of diminishing many of those expenses?—I think that elections would be much more quietly conducted.

536. But there are payments made, because a man is certain of the return that he will receive; payments to voters, and payments on account of voters, which, if he were not certain (which he would not be if there was vote by ballot), would not be made?—No; if you did away with the public-house system, which prevails now, it would relieve all municipal candidates, and Parliamentary candidates also, from considerable expenses.

537. Would not candidates be careful not to incur expense where they were not certain of getting the votes?—In the excitement of an election, those prudent considerations do not always regulate men.

538. Do you think that people would open public-houses, or go to expense in carrying voters, if they were to vote by ballot?—I do not think they would so much, because they would not be certain that the beer or the money would secure the votes; they might give the beer, but not get the vote.

539. But one of the consequences of adopting the ballot would be to diminish the expenses of election, would it not?—I think it would.

541. From your residence in Windsor, knowing pretty well the character of the townspeople, that is your conclusion, that the working men would not go to the poll or would not vote, unless they were compensated for their time, and that that compensation amounts to a day's wages?—I should not libel the whole of the working men in that way. I should say, that about 60 of them were in that condition.

542. Sixty out of 600?—Yes, about that number I should say.

543. I think you stated, did you not, that a great majority of them are of one complexion?—If you were to ask me what I think of it, I think that the borough of Windsor is decidedly of one political complexion if left alone.

544. But the result of the election does not correspond with the complexion, does it?—No.

545. And that is determined by irregular influences that are used at the time of the election?—That is my opinion.

546. I think you also stated, that after the election is over nobody makes any remark upon the mode in which it had been carried?—Only those candidates who have lost, and their friends for a short time; the anger evaporates very rapidly.

547. But the more respectable townspeople, either despairing of the law, or not wishing to continue any ill-will, never put the law in motion, and there is no penalty for the corruption?—It might be proved very easily indeed, but I have never known an instance of the law having been put in force.

548. What do you think would be the effect, if it were the duty of any person in Windsor to put the law in force. Some person quite independent of the opinions and feelings of the electors?—If there were a public prosecutor, he would be very useful indeed.

549. As far as I understood you, you said that you would have no hopes from a jury, if anybody proceeded against a voter who had been bribed; but if you went before a county court judge, you thought that his independence would enable him to apply the law strictly?—I do think so.

550. If there was any person in the character of a public prosecutor, do you think that he would have plenty to do, and if the court, in which the party would be proceeded against, were the county court, do you think that there would be many convictions?—I think there might be; but I would put into the hands of the county court judge greater powers; whether the people would like it I do not know.

551. What would be the effect if voters knew that they would be convicted if they took those bribes; would they vote at all?—I suppose they would do pretty much the same then as they do now, if there was no ballot.

552. They are perfectly sure of impunity now, are they not?—I do not know; persons will risk these sort of things; if it were accompanied with considerable expense in the way of petitioning as I suggest, and a county court judge were to try the petition, I think it would be an effective way of preventing bribery, because immediately the election is passed the anger of the people induces them at once to present a petition, and the thing would go on of course.

553. What I want to learn from you is, whether those great facilities of being corrupt does not lead to corruption, and if there were sufficient motive to avoid it, whether the people would act purely?—I do not know; these motives are very difficult things; as long as there is a man willing to give a bribe there are always plenty of people to receive it.

554. You do not mean to say that of the whole town, that personal interest was stronger than political feeling?—My impression is that self-interest is a very potent lever with human nature amongst certain classes; they have principles that they would carry out, if they could carry them out, and still get the benefit of the bribe.

555. Do not they appreciate at all this privilege of voting for the municipal officers?—I do not think they care much about it; I do not think there is any vast amount of enthusiasm about it; it is personal chiefly.

556. What is the object of candidates making the payment; do they get much patronage or power by filling the office?—They get a little dignity by it.

557. Are they men of substance generally, who can afford to pay for being elected?—There are some of them tradesmen in the town of great respectability, and I daresay they would find the money very easily.

558. As the thing goes on now you have no doubt that the corruption will continue, and you think, do you not, that you have come to a time when it ought to be stopped?—I have no doubt whatever that that is so.

559. You think that some experiment ought to be made, and you think that the present state of things is a disgrace to the town?—I think it is a disgrace to any constituency.

560. Do you think that the respectable people in the town would be ready now to try some thing to stop that system of corruption?—I have no no doubt whatever that they would be desirous of doing so; they are anxious only that those persons should be returned who are respectable, and that they should be returned honestly.

561. Have other people changed their opinion, as far as you know, like yourself with respect to the ballot being the best experiment now to make?—I think myself that a vast majority of the people are strongly in favour of the ballot, who formerly were not so; I confess myself to be a convert to the ballot, I was not in favour of it formerly.

562. Is it the extent of the corruption, and the hopelessness of the means hitherto adopted to prevent it, that has lead to that change of opinion?—I think so; I think that a man cannot protect himself against intimidation, or corruption, without the ballot; if a man were not sure of getting a quid pro quo he would not bribe.

563. He would not be sure of getting a quid pro quo with much confidence if it was voting by ballot?—Not the least.

564. Do you think that candidates are looked at now, rather as to what their means of payment are than as to their merits personally?—No, I cannot say that that is so.

565. Those that can pay are thought respectable?—No; there are two cliques in every town, and one clique supports one faction and another the other, and they generally take it up in a personal rather than in a political way, although of course it does partake of a strong political complexion, yet it is a composite motive that actuates them.

566. But then that would be the rule rather than any real opinion of the character of the candidate?—A man of good character, wealth and great respectability would stand a much better chance than a man of no character, or a disreputable person.

567. Then, are you of opinion generally that all classes in Windsor would prefer, if they exercised their judgment freely, men of respectable character?—Undoubtedly.

568. You have no fear of secret voting in that respect?—I believe that persons of the best character and the greatest respectability are those persons that are appreciated by the masses much more than disreputable people; decidedly so.

569. Mr. Hunt.] I understand you to say that you think that the majority in Windsor is of one way of thinking politically?—I say that I believe a considerable majority is of one way of thinking politically, if left alone.

570. But you say that at the municipal elections that majority is turned by some of the voters receiving pay?—I think so; but there have been other instruments at work besides that which have acted upon the municipal as well as the Parliamentary elections, and which I have not been examined upon; but I referred to this fact, I knew Windsor 35 years ago, and at that time it was the purest borough in England; the present Lord Derby was returned for it in the Liberal interest for nothing; all his expenses being paid; and Mr. Ramsbottom was returned free of expense, and for many many years, to my certain knowledge, the expense of an election in Windsor only amounted to 250 l. each candidate. Then there grew up a system of this kind which operated upon the municipal as well as upon the Parliamentary elections. One of the candidates at the Parliamentary election adopted the plan of giving about 200 people in the borough grocery and meat and other things, to the value of from 1 l. to 30 s., every year; and the effect of that was thoroughly to demoralise the constituency. It was an honest, upright constituency till that took place, and from that time there has been, I say, a deterioration in political morality.

571. Did the giving of those presents by the candidate at the Parliamentary election retain all the recipients of the presents to vote on his side of politics at the municipal election?—Yes, certainly; the very same men who would go and serve out gifts and dole out those largesses were the very people who were employed to get those votes at the municipal elections in consequence of those donations at Christmas. I know that to be the fact.

572. Is that system still in force?—I do not think it is in force just now.

573. Has the system then, so fatally introduced into the borough of Windsor, of giving presents once a year by Parliamentary candidates to which you ascribe the corruption of the constituency, been maintained?—I do not think, since the gentleman I referred to retired from Windsor, that any of those monies have been given, although candidates have promised to adopt his system.

574. However the system of giving gratuities once a year has, till a recent period, been maintained?—It did continue until the gentleman ceased to be Member for Windsor, and then it ceased altogether; that gentleman did not continue those gifts to the people when he ceased to be a Member.

575. And you know nothing about whether the system has been maintained since by other candidates?—I do not think it has; I never heard of it prevailing.

576. Or any substitute for it?—No, I know of no substitute for it; I may observe this, that another plan has been adopted in the borough of Windsor, for obtaining votes, which perhaps may be equally efficacious, but then it would not be grounded upon bribery, but the instrument then would be intimidation; the plan is that of buying up a large number of small cottages. One person that I know has bought up about 130 cottages, and has ejected, in consequence of the way they voted at the last election, six, and given notice to quit 20; those houses, I do not hesitate to say, were bought simply for electioneering purposes, either to bribe or intimidate the people; I know that they were so, because they were offered to a friend of mine for that very purpose, and they were bought, as I also know, by the present owner for the very same purpose.

577. You consider that the purchase of those houses conduces to the voters at the municipal elections voting in favour of the politics of the owner of the property?—Yes, undoubtedly; and they can only protect themselves, as I say, by the ballot.

578. With respect to a day's pay to the voters at the municipal elections, as I understand you, without any pay at all, the majority would be decidedly one way of thinking and voting?—Yes, if not influenced by intimidation.

579. To put it in this way, without any undue influence, they would be decidedly one way of thinking?—Without mincing the matter, they would be what are called Liberal.

580. They would probably be of your way of thinking?—I am of that way of thinking, although I am

I am no agent for any party; I have no hesitation in saying, that that is my decided opinion.

581. Is this system of paying the municipal voters for their day's work, that is for voting, confined to one party, or is it resorted to by both? I have never heard of but the one party using it.

582. Your position is this, is it not, that the majority at the municipal elections is entirely turned by the day's pay?—That is my opinion.

583. I suppose it is the object of each political party in Windsor, to obtain the predominance at municipal elections?—Yes, I daresay it is, but I never interfere in those elections.

584. If the majority is entirely turned by the system of payment of a day's work for voting, how is it that the party who is defeated by that process has not used the power given them by law, to ensure the expunging from the register of those who so defeat them?—For this simple reason, that when the fight is over they wish the animosity to cease, and it is out of a kind of neighbourly feeling that it is not done.

585. So that having the power to take proceedings under the part of the Act which you have read, and so expunge from the register those by whose votes they are defeated, they have, out of kindness and neighbourly feeling, abstained from any such action?—Yes, it is not every person's business to be called upon to prosecute a person for this offence, and to run the risk of not succeeding.

586. You think, then, that it is not attributable so much to neighbourly feeling, as the prospect of not succeeding in the proceedings?—I did not say so; it might be both.

587. You stated, did you not, that the persons who are put up for those municipal offices are persons of respectability in the town, and they have no difficulty in finding the money?—Just so.

588. Do you consider that their finding the money for such a purpose at all detracts from their respectability?—That is a question of opinion, and men take different views of ethics. Some persons think nothing of bribery, and some think a very great deal of it; therefore, it depends upon a man's individual convictions.

589. But would a person lose his character for respectability in your borough, if he were known to have spent 50 l. to secure his election at the municipal election?—I do not think he would, any more than a Member of Parliament would.

590. Then, there is no moral sense amongst the majority of the community against corrupting the electors?—I do not see that that conclusion is to be drawn from those premises, I cannot say that a man may have a very strong objection to bribery; I have a very strong objection to bribery, and many hundreds in the borough have a very strong objection to it, and yet if they knew or suspected that a town councillor had been guilty of bribing the people, they would not taboo that man and stand aloof from him, and say they would not speak to him.

591. A man does not lose caste in Windsor society by being known to have bribed?—I do not think he does, nor in any other society, as far as I can see.

592. You have given us your views with regard to agency, and you think that no person should be permitted to canvass unless he has a formal document from a candidate, authorising him to do so?—I really think that that would put an end to this question of agency altogether.

593. Do not you think that if your views were adopted, though it might guard the candidate from the consequences of bribery by agents unauthorised in the way you have mentioned, it would not at all prevent the elector being corrupted by unauthorised agents?—That exists now.

594. But with the possible consequence of the candidate being defeated?—It is a very difficult thing to set up an infallible mode of preventing bribery.

595. You are looking at the matter from the point of view of the protection of the candidate from the acts of unauthorised agents?—Yes, if the candidate is sincere in wishing to be pure, he would wish that no person should act for him without his authority so as to commit him; for instance, supposing a municipal candidate were to go round and canvass a borough, and he had a person with him who canvassed with him, that man would be an agent; and supposing that person to corrupt the constituency I presume if the law were properly made, that man would be liable for the acts of his agent, and he ought to be unseated; but I do not think you can unseat a municipal candidate now for the acts of his agents.

596. Have you read the accounts in the reports of the evidence given before Commissions and Committees, of the way in which corruption has been carried on at Parliamentary elections in some of the worst constituencies in the kingdom?—I have read a great deal of it.

597. And have you not found out that the worst bribery is committed by persons whom the candidate professes to know nothing of, and deposes on oath he knows nothing of?—I admit that he professes to know nothing of them.

598. But still your belief is, that those persons are acting in the interest of the candidate, even if unknown to him?—In the interest of the candidate there are subsidiary agents whose names do not transpire and are not known, but the money is paid for by the candidate in every instance, I believe.

599. You still think that candidates should be allowed to have canvassers, provided they duly authorised them?—Yes; certainly.

600. What is the object of canvassers?—The object of a canvasser is to ascertain the views of the electors on behalf of any particular person, and to induce, if he is a fair canvasser, by reasonable arguments, a voter to vote for his friend.

601. No person could discharge the duty of canvassing without ascertaining, or endeavouring to ascertain, the political opinions and the probable votes of the persons canvassed?—Exactly so.

602. If canvassing goes on, and the political opinions and probable votes of the persons canvassed are ascertained, how could secret voting be maintained?—If canvassing goes on it enables each candidate, at the end of his canvass, to make up his balance-sheet, so to speak, and then he knows exactly how he stands; that is the object of the ultimate canvass; and if you ask me what I would wish, I would say, I would have no canvassing at all, as far as I am concerned; but if you are to have canvassing, then, I say, the effect of that canvassing is to make up a balance sheet, and that system of canvassing and making up a balance sheet is that which induces the corruption. For instance, supposing posing a constituency consists, we will say of 1,500 electors, and there are two candidates, one on each side, they make up their accounts, one has 800 and the other has 700 promises, and they know exactly how they stand. If the man with the 700 promises to his canvassers found himself that he must be beaten, and he did not mind spending money, he might say, "Very well, I must buy 60 men of the other side, and then I shall get a majority;" and he would arrive at that from the canvass.

603. That I quite understand, but that was not quite the point of my question. What I wanted to know was this, how could secret voting be maintained, provided you allowed the canvassers to ascertain beforehand how a person promised to vote?—Inasmuch as a man canvasses in the interest of one or the other of the parties, I have no doubt the effect of the canvass would be this: Supposing I, as a Liberal, canvassed one of the voters, a Liberal artizan, he would say to me this, "We will say nothing at all about it; I mean to be with you on the day;" when the other party canvassed him he would say to them, "Oh, I shall consider it over; I dare say it will be all right on the day." If he was afraid of the other person, I have no doubt he would rather throw the man off his guard, but he would tell his own friend what he would do; it is very likely he would say nothing about it to the other party; I think that would be about the course that the thing would take.

604. I will take the case that you mention in the borough of Windsor, where some persons have bought a large number of houses with the view of influencing the tenants at the elections; if the system of secret voting were adopted, would you prohibit that person asking any question of his tenants, either personally or through an agent, as to how they were going to vote?—As far as I am personally concerned, I would, but I daresay the House of Commons would not do it, therefore I must submit to the logic of facts.

605. I want to know your opinion, first of all, as to whether it ought to be done, and then as to whether it could be done?—As regards personal canvassing, I admit that there is a certain moral pressure put upon every man that is canvassed.

606. If you are to have entirely secret voting you must not allow canvassing at all; is that not so?—I do not know that; I cannot arrive at that conclusion.

607. I will put it in this way: if the owner of those houses that were bought for political purposes in Windsor asks the tenants how they were going to vote, and they say they are going to vote in a particular way, either for or against him, what is the use of their afterwards going and voting in secret, because he knows how they are going to vote?—I very strongly suspect that he would not know. We will suppose that the owner of the houses is a Conservative, and he canvassed the tenants; if a man was a Liberal, he would say, "I shall be all right on the day of the election;" he would evade the question, and vote against the candidate that his landlord supported.

609. If an evasive answer or no answer were given to the person who thought he had a right to command the vote, according to the views of those people, would he not assume that the voter was going to vote against the principles that he supported?—That depends upon the nature of the evasive answer. I think I could give an answer myself which would lead him to believe I was going to vote for him.

610. Taking the average voter, and not a person of your dialectical skill, what would you say?—There is a deal of shrewdness amongst those men.

611. We will take it that there may be men shrewd enough, without telling an absolute lie, to deceive the questioner, but, taking it as a rule, would not the person canvassing be able to ascertain the manner in which the voter would probably vote?—I think each side would be able to ascertain its relative strength by the canvass, and its absolute strength to a certain extent.

612. Canvassing does not only consist of formally going round and ticking off promises in a book, but canvassing is done in many ways in English life. If you were dining with me, and I said, over a glass of wine, "Now, Mr. Darvill, I hope you will vote for So-and-so," you, perhaps, might not call that canvassing, but still it would be something very like it, would it not?—It is canvassing in a sense, undoubtedly, but it is not a systematic canvass.

613. Is not our whole system of political life in this country discussing public matters and disclosing our political opinions, and does not that run through all our intercourse with each other?—Yes.

615. Supposing that one of the tenants of those houses that have been referred to has been canvassed, and has given an evasive answer, or is intending to vote for A, and has told the person who endeavoured to influence him that he is going to vote for B; that is to say, has given a promise which he does not mean to keep, and he afterwards votes in secret, do you think that his comrades and the persons with whom he associates in everyday life would not know after his vote has been given how the man has voted?—I do not think they would; I think the man would keep his own counsel; and if he has told a lie, depend upon it he will not let anyone know that he has told a lie.

616. Do you think that 50 voters who may have voted against their promise by the system of ballot, would afterwards keep their vote secret during the next month?—I think they would; a man would look at it in this way: Mr. So-and-so has come to me, and he says, I am his tenant, and he wants me to vote for So-and-so; I do not want to vote for So-and-so, but I will tell him that I will, just the same as Gallileo when he said the sun goes round the earth; but the man would say so, and would not perform his promise, and very likely he would make it out to his own conscience science just the same as if he was robbed by a highwayman.

617. No doubt a man may apply any salve to his conscience, but supposing his conscience was at ease, and his vote had been given in accordance with his political opinions, but against those of a person who thought he had a right to influence him, do not you think that in course of time it would come to the knowledge of that person that there was reason to believe that So-and-so had voted not in accordance with his promise?—I do not think it would.

618. We will take the case you have put: the books had been made up, and the majority of the promises appeared to be in favour of a particular candidate, but the result of the ballot was that that candidate was signally defeated, do not you think that such a person as we have been mentioning would have a shrewd suspicion that some of his tenants had not voted according to promise?—No, because he cannot earmark them.

619. But he would have a shrewd suspicion, would he not?—They all would say, "I voted for you, sir."

620. Do not you think he might say to them, "I know the poll has not gone according to the promises, and I ask you as a man of honour, how did you vote"?—Of course the answer would be, "I voted for you, sir."

621. Do you think he would tell a lie and stick to it?—Yes, just the same as if he were stopped on the highway. The man has peculiar views of morals, and he would say this: "If I were stopped by a highwayman with a 1,000 l. note in one pocket and 5 s. in the other, and I gave up the 5 s. and said that was all the money I had got, there would be no great harm in it; and if a man comes to me about my vote, I consider I have as much right to my vote as to my money, and therefore I shall tell a lie." I believe that to be the morals of a great many people.

622. Do you think that a system which would induce such a practice of lying would be better than the present system of open voting?—But the present system creates a great deal of lying.

623. Not in that way?—Lying of all sorts. I have seen a great deal of lying under the present system; a person promising to vote for one person, and voting for another, which is practically lying.

624. But do not you think that the system of lying, with regard to votes, would be very much increased?—I do not know; I think evasion would be increased.

625. I want to go further into this question of the ballot; you are a gentleman who takes great interest in public questions, I believe?—I take an interest in everything that tends to the welfare of my country.

626. Political opinion is formed in this country by discussion, is it not?—I am happy to say it is.

627. And political opinion is expressed by public meetings?—Certainly.

628. Do you apprehend, if the system of ballot were introduced, that political discussion at public meetings, and taking the sense of public meetings on political questions, would continue?—I think it would.

630. I do not know whether I quite apprehend you; do you mean to say that a Radical will go and vote for a Tory proposition at a meeting, and vice versâ?—No, I did not say that. I thought you referred to the presence of those people at these meetings as an indication of how they intend to vote. Supposing Conservative voters were to be present at a Liberal meeting, they would not, from the fact of their being present at a Liberal meeting, be regarded as Liberals.

631. My question is this, whether a person who expresses an opinion upon a political question at a meeting, either by making a speech in favour of a particular view, or by holding up his hand if the question were put to the vote, would not identify himself with one political party, or one particular view, and therefore no secret voting could prevent its being known how he voted afterwards upon such a question, or in support of a candidate advocating such a view?—If a person got upon a public platform, and expressed his opinions, his opinions would of course be well known, and he need not be canvassed; but if a person attends a public meeting, and holds up his hand, it is a thousand to one that any one would take the slightest notice of a unit.

632. Supposing it was a question as to whether A or B was a fit candidate for the representation of Windsor, and a public meeting was held in support of one or other of the candidates, it would be the object, would it not, of his party to ascertain whether he was a candidate that was acceptable to the meeting?—Yes.

634. Then you admit this, that persons who were there, and gave expression to their opinion, either by a speech, or by holding up their hands, would give an indication of how they intended to vote?—By a speech, decidedly; but I think it is very unlikely that it would ever be discovered amongst the thousand hands, that any particular hand was held up; the man would say, "I was present, but I took no part in the meeting."

635. You, as I understand, have been opposed to the ballot all your life?—Yes.

636. And you now accept it reluctantly, as a preventative of corruption?—Yes, and of intimidation; I have seen so much intimidation, that I believe the ballot is absolutely necessary.

637. By intimidation you do not mean a threat of personal violence; you mean undue influence, do you not?—I mean personal injury in business, withdrawal of custom, ceasing to employ, turning out of doors of dwellings by ejectment, and things of that kind.

Mr. H. Darvill.

9 April 1869.

638. Let me call your attention to the ballot, as affecting the question of purity of election; what reason have you for thinking that the ballot would ensure greater purity of election?—I think upon the mercantile principle, that a man would not feel disposed to pay for a thing that he was not sure of receiving; therefore I do not think that a man would be very likely to give another man a bribe without he was certain that he would get the vote; if he went to election and was beaten, he would say the next time, "I threw away 1,000 l. at the last election and got nothing for it."

639. Have you ever heard of the principle of "No cure, no pay"?—I have heard of it in days that are gone by.

640. Do you think it possible that a candidate might come down promising to spend a certain sum of money amongst the lower orders of voters in Windsor, if he was elected?—No doubt that might be suggested; but that is a very difficult game to play.

641. Let us examine it; you have told the Committee to-day that the number of voters that you consider bribable at the municipal election is 50 or 60?—Yes.

642. And that you say will turn the balance?—Yes.

643. I presume that other persons in Windsor are aware that 50 or 60 municipal voters are bribable?—I daresay they are.

644. You have told the Committee that you believe that at the last Parliamentary election 100 voters were bribed?—I believe that is so.

645. And that, I suppose is known to other persons?—No doubt.

646. It would be possible, would it not, for an agent either authorised or unauthorised to get upon a sheet of paper the names of those persons who are known to be willing to receive bribes?—Yes, he might get them on a sheet of paper.

647. I suppose you, or your informant, or informants, could now put the names down on a piece of paper?—I daresay we could put them on paper.

649. Is it not the case that the money is very often not paid till afterwards?—Yes; and I was speaking some time ago of that practice to one of the most accomplished men. I said, "What would be the effect of voting by ballot?" and he said, "The fact is this, that if they went upon the principle of paying afterwards, you may depend upon it they would never get paid at all, and that evil would cure itself."

650. Is there not in political corruption what is commonly called honour amongst thieves?—I do not know.

651. Are there not many persons well known to the electors who could be thoroughly trusted to pay them a 5 l. note all round, if he promised he would do so?—I do not know that; I am not satisfied that you would find a man of that kind that would be trusted. He must be known, to begin with, and if he is known he would be detected.

652. Under the present system, you say that voters are unwilling to vote unless they actually get the money down?—Yes.

653. But supposing that the system of the ballot prevented their getting any money down, they might be willing, perhaps, to vote in respect of a promise to pay?—Yes, but it could be easily detected, I think.

654. Supposing what I may call a gangmaster gets the names of all the bribable voters in the borough on a sheet of paper, or if he merely carries them in his own head, and he either calls a meeting, or goes round to the different individuals and says, "If A is returned for this borough, you will each have 5 l.; but if B is returned, you will only have 4 l.;" do not you think it is likely, although their individual views will not be ascertained, that they will most of them take care to give their votes in such a way as to insure the return of the man who will give them the most at the end of the time?—I am not at all sure that that would be the result. I think that a man would be very likely to exercise his own political opinions, and leave the rest to the chapter of accidents, and if the candidate got in, he would go and claim the money, whether he voted for him or not.

655. You have heard, have you not, of the expression in some boroughs, that they do not care who they vote for, but they vote for Mr. Most?—I am not aware of it, but I daresay that may be so.

656. Supposing that such a system were possible and could be carried out, then the ballot would not ensure purity of election?—To say that it will is a difficult thing, but I say that it would very much mitigate the disgraceful practices at present existing; and I believe that it would very much mitigate, if not altogether destroy bribery; but I am afraid that that would be very difficult, and it would take some years before it eradicated the system altogether. It could only be eradicated altogether by a man finding that he did not get the value for his money.

657. With regard to candidates, candidates now very often spend very large sums of money, and then have the mortification of being defeated?—Yes.

658. Those are the persons who generally complain of corrupt practices, are they not?—I think that is so.

659. The complaints do not come from those who corrupt and have succeeded, but from those who corrupt and have failed?—Exactly.

660. Such a system as I have mentioned would secure the candidate, would it not, from paying any money unless he succeeded?—No doubt; but then I do not think that you will find the people are fond of trusting in cases of this kind; that would be found a very great difficulty.

661. You told us just now, did you not, that you were anxious that a declaration should be made by the candidates and by their agents, not only only as to what money they had spent, but as to what money they would spend; as to their future liabilities?—Yes, and to make oath of it.

662. But then that supposes that some money is to be paid afterwards and knocked down on the nail?—No, I do not mean that at all. For instance, there are things that come in to the candidate through the negligence of persons that the candidate knows nothing about, and the bill, an honest bill, comes in afterwards; and he says, "I have made up my accounts and given them in"; what I propose is, that he should supplement another affidavit, stating that it had come in afterwards, and return it to the returning officer.

663. I understood you to say this, that unauthorised agents very often bribe wholly unknown to the candidate, who took care not to know anything about it, but that afterwards the money so spent was paid by the candidate?—I am not aware of having said so, but I believe it is so frequently.

664. Then if that is so, you are of opinion that even in the present state of things people do trust to getting money afterwards from the candidates?—Yes, no doubt they do; there is a great deal of faith, no doubt, in electioneering; but I do not think that it would operate so largely, as the Right Honourable Member seems to imagine. I have seen a great deal of electioneering in my time, and I do not think people are so fond of trusting anybody, although no doubt there is a good deal of trust; for instance, persons are employed as agents repeatedly, and not returned as agents, and they are paid afterwards by the candidates; that is a positive and well-known fact.

665. If that system of trusting enabled unscrupulous persons to bribe voters on the principle of "no cure no pay," then the ballot would not ensure purity of election?—Those persons that I refer to as trusting the candidate, are persons generally in a better position of life than poor artizans; they are men who are agents, acting (if I may say so) on their own hook, so as not to commit the candidate, and when it is all over, they trust to be paid by the candidate; that is to say, he adopts them when the election is over, and their agency has answered, but if it does not answer, it is not known that they were his agents.

666. If you are well up in the literature of bribery, I think you will know that sometimes bribery is done in this way; a person enters a voter's house, the voter puts up so many fingers, and the person gives a wink and walks out of the house?—I have heard of that being done.

667. That is to say, he entered into an informal kind of promise, but you have heard perhaps that voters, even on the strength of that wink, do understand that if they vote for So-and-so they will get their 5 l. or 10 l.?—It is equivalent to a promise, no doubt; but I have heard it stated by some persons that those people will have the money down, and I believe they do.

668. In some boroughs, do not they trust promises by word of mouth, or by a wink in others?—I never heard of any; I do not believe many would do this.

669. That has been very much the system that you describe in Windsor, the money not being paid at the time of the elections, but at a certain period of the year gratuities have been given?—That is only a kind of standing retainer, or a renewal of the retainer every year.

670. There was a great deal of trust, was there not, on the one side or the other, when that system was in vogue?—There were articles delivered every year punctually; there was no trust at all.

671. As a retainer for a future vote?—Yes, certainly.

672. The person giving the gratuities fully trusted that the recipient would vote for him?—Yes, if he did not he would not have it the next Christmas; if a man under the system I refer to did not vote according to the card, he was struck off the list, and if he died his widow did not receive it.

673. Do not you think that a man of ingenuity who has devised that system in your borough, would devise a plan of getting at the voters under the ballot?—I think that they might attempt to bribe, but I do not think that they would succeed, I feel perfectly confident that if men were left alone they have honesty and integrity enough to carry them through.

674. The O'Conor Don.] The Right Honourable Member has asked you some questions with respect to the effect that the establishment of the ballot would have upon the tenants of those sort of cottages that you describe as having been bought for election purposes; do you think that if the ballot were established, any gentleman or any person would buy cottages for the purpose of having votes at an election?—No, and moreover I go beyond that; I am quite satisfied that if the vote by ballot passes, every one of those cottages will be in the market in less than 12 months.

675. You think that no person would buy property for the purpose of getting votes, the getting of which votes afterwards he would be uncertain of?—Certainly he would not; it is a very bad investment; cottage property is always objectionable, and it is very objectionable when you buy it and do not get the vote.

676. You were also asked whether the introduction of the ballot would not lead to a great deal of falsehood in the way of persons promising their landlords their votes, when they did not intend to give them, and also after the election telling a new lie, and stating that they had voted for the candidate of their landlord, when in reality they had voted the other way; do you think that if the ballot were established, the landlords would in most cases ask those questions of the tenants, when they would know that the answer they receive might either be true or false, and that it would lead to no positive information?—I think they would find it out to be a work of supererogation.

677. Therefore you think that the establishment of the ballot would not lead to a great increase of falsehood and lying throughout the country?—My opinion is, that the thing would cure itself by the force of the ballot.

678. At present there is a great deal of falsehood, is there not, at elections; persons do make promises, and do not keep them?—No doubt about that.

679. You do not think that the introduction of the ballot would lead to any increase of that evil?—I do not think that it would lead to any increase; but it would greatly mitigate the existing evil.

680. Canvassing you have described as consisting of two objects; first to discover how the two candidates relatively stand, and secondly for the purpose of inducing the voter to vote one way way or another, and having the effect upon his mind of persuading him to vote in favour of a particular candidate; do you think that the introduction of the ballot would interfere at all with the second object of canvassing, namely, the object of convincing a man that a certain candidate is a good one, and that a certain line of politics is right?—Not at all. I think that electioneering would partake of a higher character than at present. I think that the present domiciliary canvassing would go out, and that men would learn the opinions of their candidates from public meetings, and that, instead of a partial, there would be a free and open mode of ascertaining public opinion in the borough.

9 April 1869.

681. I presume you know something about clubs in this country?—Yes.

682. Are you aware that in most clubs election is by ballot?—Yes.

684. I do not put it to you in the way of an analogy in other respects, but with respect to that sort of canvassing, one man saying to another, "such a man is a good man, and suitable to be elected"?—We cannot avoid that, and that is what I call canvassing. If you canvassed for a friend in the club, and said, "So-and-so is going to blackball him, but I want you to come and help me to get him in, for he is a good fellow"; that is very natural, and that sort of canvassing would go on in a borough.

685. You spoke of a certain amount of landlord intimidation existing at the elections in Windsor, and you stated also, did you not, that bribery in the shape of giving money existed there?—Yes.

686. You also stated, in answer to a question, that you objected to the present system of voting papers in municipal elections, but that you did not consider that voting papers afforded any greater facility for bribery than open voting would?—I do not think they do.

688. Does not the system of voting papers also afford great facilities to a landlord to go round to his tenant, and go into his house, and say, "I wish you to enter upon your voting paper such a gentleman's name," and see it entered there before him?—He would do it himself very likely; but the papers are generally printed, and he would put in the names of the parties who were of his way of thinking, and he would say, "Mind you sign that, and go up and vote."

689. So that you do believe that the present system of voting papers affords greater facilities for the exercise of intimidation, though not for the exercise of bribery than open voting?—Yes, I think so; I think they are very objectionable in that respect.

690. Mr. Locke.] Do they likewise afford opportunities, as you say, of tampering?—I think they do a great deal.

691. You say you prefer the system of ballot; how would you have it carried out, because you object to papers?—I can describe to you how I think it could be carried out; I have thought over it a great deal; it has been a very difficult subject with me; I have thought of a variety of ways, and I will tell you how it might be carried out; there must be some place which has an entrance for all and every one of the electors; at that place the man must be seen, and he must be seen by the agents on both sides, so that he may be asked, "What is your name?" "John Snooks. Number so-and-so on the register." "Pass on." That man has then passed through the ordeal of his actual existence as a voter. He is certified as a man who is entitled to vote; you may have the number on the register where the people are to vote, from one to 300, from 300 to 600, and so on, posted up at the ballot places. Then let him go on into a long box, and at the end of that box let there be a ballot clerk, or call him what you please, with a box before him; I propose that there should be an assessor, so to speak, appointed by each candidate who should sit alongside of the ballot clerk to prevent tampering, but that they should neither of them reside or have resided within 10 miles of the borough, and they should take an oath not to reveal anything. They would not know anybody who came; and they would not know the man, because they would not know his name. One should represent one candidate and the other should represent the other candidate, and they should say, "Who do you wish to vote for?" Then the person who keeps the ballot box takes out a ticket for each, just like a railway ticket, and gives it to the voter, and he puts it in the box, and he passes on. There is no one to know how he voted but those two persons, and they do not know him; therefore, I do not see how it can affect him; then at the end of the day the number of tickets given by the person who keeps the ballot box can exactly be checked off, and sealed, and they ought to agree with the number that are put into the box.

692. But in that way there would be those three persons who would know for whom the man voted?—Yes, but you cannot arrange it otherwise, as far as I can see.

693. With regard to personation, do you think that a man coming to the first room and saying, "I am John Snooks," he would then be sure to be known?—Yes, certainly.

694. Who would you have there to identify him?—You would have persons living in the various districts that would know who he was; you may divide the ballot district into different sub-districts sub-districts if you like; there would be no difficulty in knowing the name.

695. How would you decide as to which compartment this man is to go into, would it be by taking the first letter of his name?—No, I find it is best to do it numerically; it is much easier.

696. Are you aware of the system which is in force now in Australia?—I have read about it.

697. Are you aware that in Australia a man comes into a room and is identified, and then a paper is given to him with the names of the candidates upon it and his number?—Yes.

698. He then goes into a second room and he strikes out on that paper the names of those for whom he does not intend to vote, and he puts the paper into an urn?—Yes; the only objection I have to that is this, there are a great many people in some constituencies who can neither read nor write, and if you put a piece of paper before them, and told them to strike out the names that they do not agree with, they would not know how to do it.

699. Chairman.] It is your opinion, is it not, that a system of ballot might be devised in which it would not be necessary for people to sign the paper?—Yes; if people were all educated you might give them those things, but unfortunately they are not so.

700. Mr. Locke.] You consider that the present system in municipal elections, of voting papers sent by the candidates and delivered by the voter when he votes, is objectionable?—I think it is objectionable.

701. In speaking about canvassing, you used the expression, did you not, that no systematic canvassing should be allowed?—The Right Honourable Member suggested just now to me, as to asking a man about voting at dinner. I should not call that systematic canvassing; but if you went round from house to house, I should call that systematic canvassing; that is the distinction; a systematic proceeding on the part of one person to solicit votes on behalf of another.

702. You also said, did you not, that no person should be permitted to canvass?—I would be glad, if that were the case, that no one were permitted; but I think it is impossible.

703. But still you proposed that a punishment should be inflicted upon a person who did canvass?—Who systematically canvassed without the consent and authority of the candidate himself.

704. Is "systematic" a legal term, or how would you define it; where would you draw the distinction between a man canvassing and systematically canvassing?—A legal definition is a very difficult thing, I admit. It is a very difficult thing to define first what canvassing is at all, and then what systematic canvassing is; because if I were to dine with you, and you were to ask me for a vote, that would be canvassing.

705. Suppose I gave a number of very large parties, and asked everybody, would you call that systematic canvassing?—No more than I should consider it canvassing if you spoke at a public meeting, and said, "I hope you will all come and vote for me."

706. If I held public meetings throughout the whole borough that would be systematic, would it not?—I do not think that would be systematic canvassing, because that would not be personal or individual—I mean a domiciliary canvass—a visiting from house to house; coming face to face with a man, and putting ugly questions to him sometimes, which might intimidate him.

707. I presume you would be decidedly opposed to paid canvassers?—I myself think that all paid canvassers are objectionable. Though I am a lawyer myself, I think the system is objectionable, and lawyers themselves admit it.

708. Did not you say that a person who was the recognised agent of the candidate, should be allowed to canvass?—Certainly he might. Supposing you were a candidate for a borough, and I were a friend of yours; I say, if I get your authority, after my application to canvass for you, then I have your authority, and then whatever I do you are compromised by; and so you ought to be. If you are to have the benefit of your friends' labour, you ought to bear the consequences if they act improperly.

709. Then you would consider that any other person who canvassed, and who had not the authority of the candidate to do so, should be punished?—Certainly, I think he ought. It places the candidate in this situation: he says, "I never canvassed with that person. I do not know that person; he is a volunteer, and he has compromised me." He would be very glad to take advantage of the compromise, if there was no petition; but when there is a petition, the agency is repudiated.

710. You stated, did you not, that no steps have ever been taken to punish bribery at the municipal elections in Windsor?—Not any.

711. Have there been any prosecutions for bribery at Parliamentary elections?—No; I wish there had.

712. When you speak of a public prosecutor, do you mean a public prosecutor specially for Windsor?—No.

713. What description of person do you suggest the public prosecutor to be?—The difficulty always is to get some one to take the initiative against crime, and to be the prosecutor; to hunt it out, so to speak. If it is no one's business, it is never done.

714. Do you mean that the public prosecutor should take the initiative?—Yes, if he had notice that there was a certain crime committed, he should take the initiative.

715. Would not the initiative be with the person who gave the notice; and would not that be the same thing as a man employing a solicitor or counsel?—A man does not like to involve himself in a prosecution of that kind. It is another question altogether, the benefit of a public prosecutor; but I think that a public prosecutor is more independent, and would be a very valuable officer.

716. In what way do you suppose that a public prosecutor would act?—I think, having notice of a crime, he would endeavour to detect it.

717. He would employ agents, would he, to detect crime?—He would set proper officers to work to detect crime.

718. And collect evidence?—Yes; he might employ the police if he liked, and if there were a theft, or a bribery, or a murder, I would put them all within his province.

719. Would he not be in the position of a clerk to the magistrates; for instance, when a charge has been made against anybody, and he is directed to prosecute?—But the present system fails in practice.

720. If a charge of bribery were made now, before the justices in the borough of Windsor, would not they at once direct a prosecution if they chose?—There is no doubt they might; but that would depend upon how many were on the bench on each side, I strongly suspect.

9 April 1869.

721. You want an entirely independent person, with no politics, and no feelings of any sort either one side or the other?—Yes; in a jury box or anywhere else, you cannot prevent a man's political feelings operating upon his mind however just and honest he may be.

722. A man of that description, who is liable to be influenced by political motives, would be an inefficient public prosecutor, would he not?—Yes; it is a very difficult thing to get such a person.

723. Mr. James.] Had you a municipal contest this last election in November?—Yes.

724. Did you find as a fact, that the first time that the constituency at the municipal election were, more or less, identical with the Parliamentary constituency, more attention was paid to the municipal election by parties than before?—I am inclined to think that there was a good deal of bribery at the last municipal election in last November.

727. You spoke of persons locally, who are now intimidated by landlords, employers and so forth; do you find, at Windsor, that there is a class of tradesmen, men in a respectable position, who will not vote at all, or if they vote, give a negative vote, for fear of injuring their position with their customers?—Yes; there are no doubt many persons prevented from taking any part in politics, or giving any vote at all, in consequence of the injury that they anticipate.

728. The Right honourable Gentleman has asked you about the "no cure no pay" principle, that a person would say, "I will pay you a certain sum for your vote if I succeed"; does it occur to you, that if that were so, the person making the promise would have no guarantee that the vote would be given, and the person giving the vote, would have no guarantee that the promise would be fulfilled?—Precisely so; I suggested that before.

729. If that were done, and candidate A said, "I will give a 100 people 5*l.* a-piece if I succeed," what would prevent candidate B saying, "I will give 100 people 5*l.* a-piece if I succeed," and the men promising their votes to both?—Nothing.

730. You think that neither of the candidates would know whether those voters had voted at all?—No.

731. Do you think that such a system would be satisfactory, either to the voter or the person promising?—I think, that if a man finds that he has those invitations from both sides, he will promise his vote to both sides, and vote as he thinks fit.

733. So that if the Member fulfilled his promise, he might pay 500*l.* to those who never voted for him?—The system of deferred payments for votes is a very unsatisfactory one. Both sides might go to the same men, and the men might agree to take 5*l.* or 10*l.* a-piece from both candidates, and then they would vote exactly as they pleased, because in that case they must get the money either way.

734. Mr. Hunt.] What I put to you was this, not that you should arrange with the voters that they should vote for you and receive 5*l.* a-piece, but you might arrange with the voters, that if you were returned utterly irrespective of how they voted, they should have 5*l.* or 10*l.*, not that the money was given as a consideration for their voting, but simply that a certain sum of money might be divided amongst a certain number of voters, if you, as a candidate, were returned?—Just so; but supposing there were two candidates for one place, and supposing both made a bargain with a man, "I will give you 5*l.* if I am returned," the man does not know how the poll stands or will stand, but he knows that if he makes a bargain with both sides, and votes just as he pleases, he must get the money from one or the other.

735. Mr. James.] He bargains with both candidates, under the idea that one of them must pay?—Yes, in that case it would be so.

736. What better position would the candidates be in if both of them made such promise, than if either of them made the promise?—They would be in exactly the same position if both promised.

737. If such promise were made it would have to be made systematically, would it not, so as to be of any use?—Yes, it must be an organised system of corruption.

738. The only guarantee that the voter would have that the promise would be fulfilled would be the respectability of the person making the promise?—A man may be a very respectable man in the ordinary sense of respectability, and yet his mind may have a kind of political twist as to what is morality with reference to elections.

739. Do you think you would find a person of a sufficiently responsible position, and known to the voters, upon whose promise the voters would rely if he went round and made a systematic promise of that kind?—No, there is the weakness of the whole proposition. If a man is to take a guarantee from anybody, he likes to know who the guarantor is. If a man is a man of respectability and a man of character, and a man of wealth, he will not enter into such a transaction, and if he is not a man of that kind the voter will not take his promise.

740. Is it not your experience that a good deal of bribery is done by means of strangers?—Yes; for instance, as we heard, by a man called the man in the moon; if the payment was deferred, you must know your man.

741. You think that the ballot would stop that kind of bribery?—Yes, certainly.

742. Mr. Villiers.] With regard to the men who made such promises if we had the ballot, they they would be liable to be punished by law?—Undoubtedly.

743. Mr. Raikes.] You admitted, did you not, the proposition that there might be some increase in personation, even under a system of secret voting, though not to any great extent?—There is under every system of voting just the possibility of personation; there is now, and there would be then; that is to say, a man might poll who had not a right to poll; but that is inherent in every system.

744. But do not you think it is likely that they would be rather more encouraged to commit the offence of personation, if they were confident that there would be no subsequent scrutiny, and no probability of their being detected?—I do not think they would; I do not believe there would be a bit more personation than at present. The difficulty about the matter would be that if you gave a man so much money to go and personate another, he might vote against you, and you cannot be certain of any benefit from running the risk of personation.

745. I presume it is not likely that all the men in a very large constituency would be known?—But the constituency do not all poll at one place; if they are a large number they poll at the particular place where the constituents live, and they are known in that locality.

746. Have you turned your attention at all to any means of preventing personation?—I am aware that some persons have a prejudice against the ballot; and as I have told the Committee, I have formed my opinion recently; but I do not believe that there would be a bit more personation under the ballot than under the present system.

747. Do not you think it would afford some guarantee against the increase of personation, if some means were found under secret voting, of polling the whole constituency and requiring every elector to vote?—I have not considered that subject; I do not see how you could compel men to do a thing of that kind; I am not able to arrive at a conclusion upon an abstract proposition of that description; I have not thought over the effect of the whole constituency being compelled to vote.

748. You do not then regard the franchise as a public duty, like the liability of a man to serve upon juries or anything of that sort?—I do not look at it in the same light; I think that a man has an option either to vote or not to vote, because it is quite possible that no person might represent as a candidate his particular political opinions, and then why should he vote? He must be voting for somebody that he does not agree with; if he does not agree with either, you compel him to vote contrary to his convictions. Therefore, I do not think that you have a right to compel a man to vote under all circumstances.

749. Mr. Edward Egerton.] I think you told us that 35 years ago the borough of Windsor was perfectly pure; at that time the Municipal Act was not in force; there were no municipal elections, in fact?—No, it was a corporation self elected; a close corporation; but I may say that after the Municipal Corporation Act came into operation the elections were equally pure.

750. Can you tell me the exact period when Parliamentary corruption and municipal corruption began at Windsor?—If I had Acland's book I could tell; but I cannot without.

751. You have been a resident in Windsor all your life, have you not?—For 35 years; but I forget the date when the system of giving presents began.

752. Can you tell me within a short time the date of the first municipal election when there was corruption?—I could not tell you.

753. Was it within five years of the Act passing?—I believe that Windsor was very pure until it was corrupted by the system which I refer to.

754. Was the system of corruption introduced for the purpose of one political party getting the predominance?—Certainly; I do not hesitate to say that I trace the whole political demoralisation, if it be so in our borough, entirely to that system affecting the virtue of the constituency.

755. I thought you told us also, that the opinions of the electors of the borough of Windsor were all one way?—No, I did not say all one way; I said that they preponderated in one direction.

756. Have you taken much part yourself in those municipal elections?—No; I have not voted for I should think 15 years in a municipal election.

757. Is that the case with many of the respectable inhabitants of Windsor; have they equally abstained?—Many of them have; I do not think it would be proper for me to vote.

758. Have many of the respetable inhabitants of Windsor abstained from voting?—Yes; some of them take no interest in it.

759. Is that from a feeling of disgust at the corruption?—Not at all; they do not care about the municipal election; there is no great principle involved in it; it is only whether A. B. or C. D. shall be in the town council.

760. It is a matter of notoriety in the borough, is it not, that there is this corruption going on?—It is a matter of notoriety among those who are personally interested, and who go and inquire into it.

761. Is it a matter of notoriety to the principal inhabitants of the town?—I do not think so.

762. How many election petitions have there been from the borough of Windsor of late years?—There was a petition from Sir John Ellis against Sir John De Beauvoir a good many years ago; there was an election petition by Mr. Sampson Ricardo against Lord Charles Wellesley; there was an election petition against Messrs. Hoare and Labouchere; and there was an election petition against Mr. Eykyn, the other day. I do not know of more than those.

763. I suppose the existence of this corruption was pretty well known to all the inhabitants, from the repetition of those petitions?—No; I do not think so at all.

764. There was some evidence of corruption in the borough, was there not?—There was never any evidence brought before a Committee of municipal corruption whatever.

765. But of Parliamentary corruption there has been?—It has been alleged, but it has never been proved against the constituency to have taken place.

766. Have any candidates been unseated?—No, except in the case of Labouchere and Hoare; but it did not arise in that way; that was upon a bye point.

767. How many election petitions have there been from the town of Windsor during your knowledge?—Four.

768. Have there been any steps taken by any of the respectable inhabitants of the town to put an end to what certainly was a slur upon the purity purity of the borough of Windsor?—No, there has never been any particular step taken, except one, which may be said to be the only strong step that I have known taken, and that was taken recently, when Mr. Richardson Gardner petitioned against the return of Mr. Eykyn; there was a petition got up by the Liberal party in Windsor, signed by, I believe, 500 or 600 Liberal electors, to ask for an inquiry before a Committee of the House of Commons into the last election, because of the corruption that had been practised by Mr. Gardner; but at the time when the judge had given his decision in favour of Mr. Eykyn, it was thought that they did not want to have any more fuss about it, and the thing was not prosecuted. That is the only instance that I know in which they really have taken any steps in the matter. I may say that I was strongly in favour in that case of prosecuting the whole thing myself, and offered to pay the money to do it with.

Mr. H. Darvill.

9 April 1869.

769. I think you told us that your opinions with reference to the ballot had recently changed?—Yes.

770. What was the principal reason for that change?—It arises from this: A man's mind must be thoroughly informed upon all the consequences of given acts, and I have thought over the matter and looked at all those consequences, and I find that people are injured in the expression of their political opinions; are coerced by their masters, are discharged by their masters, and are turned out of their premises, and if they are not intimidated they are attempted to be corrupted, and in many cases are corrupted; and I have come to the conclusion that the only way in which that can possibly be stopped is by having secret voting.

771. When did you arrive at that change of opinion?—I have been gradually coming to that opinion: in fact I have been desirous of not coming to that opinion, struggling against my own feelings.

772. Was it long before the appointment of this Committee?—Long before the appointment of this Committee I have been struggling with it; and I am convinced honestly that it is the only way; I would much rather have open voting if people could be free from those influences, but they are not, and no one can say they are.

773. You made use of the expressions just now, that all returns of election expenses were a farce?—I think they are.

774. Will you kindly tell the Committee upon what evidence you state that?—I do not hesitate to say that in all election returns, I believe, first, that the amounts paid are not sent in, and secondly that a large number of accounts are kept in suspense, and are afterwards discharged, and are never returned at all.

775. Have you ever acted as election agent?—Never, I think, in my life; I may have acted as agent for election expenses so many years ago, but I do not recollect it; I have not been engaged in any election matter for many years; I am quite sure of the point of the returns being as I say.

776. Are you sure of it from personal knowledge?—Yes, from personal knowledge; I am satisfied that the only way in which you can get those returns correct is by making the agents and candidates swear to their correctness, and that they embrace all claims and liabilities. The agent will take care not to give the candidate too much knowledge.

777. Have you any means of knowing what proportion of voters in Windsor can neither read nor write?—No, I have no means of knowing that.

778. Do you think that there are many voters who can neither read nor write?—I know there are many who can neither read nor write, because they are obliged to make their marks in the municipal elections.

779. Do I rightly understand you to say that is one of your objections to voting papers?—Yes; they do not know what they sign.

780. And there is the facility which their ignorance affords to anybody else to tamper with the voting paper?—Yes, they do not know what they put their cross to.

781. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] You were speaking of the ballot as a check to intimidation and to bribery as well: there is this difference, is there not, between intimidation and bribery, that the voter would dislike being intimidated, but he may very possibly like to be bribed?—It is possible that a man might have that feeling in his mind.

782. You admitted, I think, that persons in a higher position than an ordinary voter, such as agents who are nominally unauthorised, are willing to trust the candidate for payment after the election?—I think they are.

783. And I suppose they are persons who are more likely to have strong political feelings than the lower classes of voters would be?—I do not know that. I believe many men act as electioneering agents in absolute contradiction to their political opinions as agents; in fact I have known them do so.

784. You say that they are bribed, in fact, to act as agents?—No; they are solicitors who receive so much money, and they do their duty for it.

785. But at any rate they are men of better education, and of higher position, than an ordinary voter?—Yes, undoubtedly.

786. And therefore, men likely to have political opinions?—Yes, certainly; but their political opinions they would disregard in the agency.

787. There are a good many in Windsor, are there not, among the ordinary voters who have no real political opinions at all?—I should think there were some.

788. They are men, perhaps, who would not take the trouble to vote?—Yes. I always calculate that 10 per cent. will not vote in any constituency, and 20 per cent. in a county; that would be as nearly as possible the number. That would be so in the case of a moderate-sized borough; and in very large boroughs you may take the proportion as much larger.

789. Do such persons look upon an election as a means of obtaining money?—No, I think it is indifference.

790. You spoke, did you not, of 100 people who were known as being open to bribes?—I think that there are that number who would be open to corrupt influence.

791. But the sort of view that they would have of an election, would be as a means of obtaining money?—I suppose that they would like to have money.

792. Supposing it was possible by the ballot to prevent their obtaining money beforehand, I mean that the candidate not having any certainty of their vote, would not be inclined to pay them beforehand; do not you think that those men would would sooner trust the candidate than not have any promise of money at all?—I think they would go to both sides, and make the same investment.

793. How could they go to both sides?—They would give a promise to vote for both, and vote as they pleased, and inasmuch as the one side must get in, they would receive the money from one side; whereas if they were to go to one side only they might lose their money. If a man is a person who will take a bribe he will take a bribe from both parties, and he will vote as he pleases, and then the account is balanced as to conscience.

794. Supposing the agent of a candidate endeavours to bribe a gang of voters instead of the voters separately, there would be a gang-master, as the Right honourable Member put it?—Yes, I never heard of those things, but I can understand their existence.

795. Do not you think that the gang-master would wish to get the best price he could from both sides?—I think it is very likely he would.

796. Supposing an agent of one candidate had gone to him, and said "I am ready to pay you at the rate of 5 l. a vote, if my man gets in"; what do you think he would do?—If he were a shrewd man, he would say, "I will make a good bargain: I will get 5 l. from each side, and vote as I please." I heard a case the other day of two men who were sent down, one on each side to bribe a particular borough, and who met at a hotel. One said, "What did you come down for"? "Oh, I came down to transact some business about the election." "How much have you got to spend"? "So much; how much have you got"? "So much." "Then let us divide it, and put it in our pockets," and they did so; they went away, and never bribed anybody. That I believe to be true, and I know the parties' names.

797. Supposing the agents who conferred with those gang-masters were men that could be trusted?—I do not know who is to be trusted in electioneering.

798. I suppose those men are sometimes trusted, are they not?—Yes, they are; and they very often betray their trust; a man will take a bribe, and will sell the person who bribes him.

799. The gang-master would naturally be anxious, would he not, to get the highest bid he could?—Certainly he would be anxious to get as much as he could; but you see there is an uncertainty about the speculation, because if he is only to be paid after the election, this candidate may not get in; but if he makes a bargain with both sides, one must get in, and he is sure to be paid; and, inasmuch, as neither of them know which way he voted, he would say, "I made a capital bargain there." He has made a bargain with both, and therefore he is quite safe.

800. The one whose bargain he will accept is the one who offers the highest, because he will get most out of it?—I daresay he would get about an equal sum from each side, otherwise, he would not make a good book; it is like betting upon a horse.

801. Is it not his interest to bid one against the other?—His interest is to have both the bids equal; then he must win under any circumstances.

802. Is it not his interest to go from one to the other, and say, "This man has offered so much; you must offer so much more"?—Yes; he would get a second offer; and then he would say, "I am quite right, I must win; now I will do as I like."

803. Do you think that a man who is in the position of a political prostitute, as you suggest, would care what he did?—I think this; the most that he could possibly make would be the highest sum that he could extract from both, and an equal sum, because he must get it then. Besides, he is not at all sure that he will get it from the one who will have won. There is never a certainty about those things by persons of that description. I should say that they would rather feel disposed, under the circumstances of that kind, to take a promise from each, and vote for the richest, because a man would think there was more chance of being paid.

804. Therefore the one at any rate would have that preference over the other?—Yes, generally speaking, that would be so, I think.

805. Mr. Whitbread.] The long and short of it is, that this gang-master must be a respectable person who can be believed, he must be known, and he must be able to be got at; because, if he is not a known respectable man, he would not be trusted?—That is so. People would not trust a deferred payment to anybody that was not worth money, because they would give the vote, and the man would have the vote, but they would not get the money.

806. You stated that you had no hesitation in saying that in all the elections a large portion of the expenses were not returned?—When I say "all," of course, I say that in a modified sense. In many cases the returns are so small that there is nothing to conceal; but what I mean to say is this; that where in a constituency there have been any corrupt practices, or there have been any illegitimate expenses incurred, those expenses do not appear; I do not mean to say that there are not a great many Members returned to Parliament who have the strictest returns made. I only refer to cases where there is anything corrupt.

807. Questions have been asked you, with a view of showing that a system of secret voting would lead to an increase in lying and false promising, and so on; I ask you whether, upon the strictest canvass at present in a moderate sized borough, it is not true that there are a very large number of men who always decline to promise, and never do promise, and who give their votes without promising?—I think that, at the last election for the borough of Windsor, there were 1,777 electors; take 10 per cent. off, that is about 170, that would leave about 1,530, or thereabouts. Mr. Eykyn told me from his book that he had 917 promises, and I believe the other candidate said that he had a larger number of promises, and must win; but the result was, that Mr. Eykyn, instead of winning by 200 majority, won by a majority of 8 or 10. I cannot account for that, except upon the principle that they were bribed; there are 10 per cent. who did not vote at all, and there are a few persons who wait till the last, and they are the persons who wish to have bribes; and they give, I believe, very strong intimations of what they want.

808. Have you ever been actively engaged in canvassing yourself?—Not for many years. I have been in former years, but not for many years.

809. Assuming that there are men who do not promise now, do not you think that if the law were to shelter a man from the necessity of giving an open vote, public opinion would very soon run very counter to the practice of pressing him to give a promise if the law did not oblige him to give an open vote afterwards?—Public opinion is very erratic sometimes. I cannot say it would be.

810. Mr. W. H. Smith.] You stated, did you not, that there were some 50 or 60 persons who are known to be bribed with regard to the municipal elections, and 100 whose names you could put down upon paper who are bribed systematically at the Parliamentary elections at Windsor?—A part of the 60 would be embraced in the others, and I should have a strong suspicion of those being the parties.

811. You also stated, did you not, that there would be no difficulty in procuring evidence to show that those people had been bribed?—I think there would be no difficulty in showing that.

812. If the fact is so well known in Windsor, how does it come to pass that no attempt has been made to punish those parties for bribery, your attention having been drawn to the fact that the municipal electors who are bribed are disqualified, and may be punished in other ways?—I cannot say; I can only tell you this, that I offered to find all the money, 1,500 l. to prosecute for bribery at the last election, but it was not done; we sincerely wished to put an end to it.

813. What were the difficulties in the way?—There were no difficulties in the way whatever, except simply going before this House, and having a Special Commission. There were questions as to whom it should fall upon, and so on; but I say, so far as the parties in Windsor are concerned, they are desirous of having an end put to the corruption.

814. The consent of the parties is not necessary; it is open to any one individual to institute a prosecution with reference to the municipal election?—Yes, I believe it is so.

815. That being so, how is it that no one person on either side, disgusted with the existence of the present state of things, has taken such a step; have you expressed a very strong opinion upon it?—I have; I never interfere in the municipal affairs at all, but in Parliamentary matters, I express my opinion always, and vote. As to the reasons why persons do not take hostile steps against their neighbours, I can only say this, that after a municipal election, and the battle is fought, the people are all very friendly together, and forget it all in about a week; and if a person were to disturb the peace of the town by entering into litigation, I think he would be unpopular.

816. Then the unpopularity has prevented the setting on foot of a prosecution of this kind?—It is not the unpopularity merely; it would be an ill-natured thing, and a keeping hot blood still running in their veins, and ill-feeling, and there would be an objection to it on that ground. I assure you that it is a fact that whenever a person petitions against the return of another in any borough, you may rely upon it that the sympathy is always in favour of the person who is petitioned against.

817. Mr. Stanley Hill.] I think you said that part of your objection to putting in force the provision of the 22nd of Victoria would be the matter of having a jury?—Yes, I think myself that in all questions that turn upon politics you cannot exclude political feeling in the jury box.

818. Would that be your reason for handing it over to a different county-court judge?—I say that I would have a public inquiry where the witnesses might be brought up as before a judge of assize.

819. Have you thought, with regard to this Act, that the jury is one of the difficulties?—I do not think that an honourable man brought up to the bar would have his judgment warped, as might be the case with a jury.

820. Do you think that the fact of there being a jury is one of the difficulties in the way of putting this Act into operation?—Yes; I do not think that there would ever be a conviction.

821. Has it ever occurred to you that the penalty being only 40 s., a jury could not be demanded?—No; I am speaking of an indictment.

822. My question had reference to the 22nd of Victoria?—I beg your pardon; by that Act it is only 40 s. to be recovered in the county court.

823. So that no jury could be demanded?—No; you might have a jury.

824. Only if the judge consents?—No; anybody can ask for a jury.

825. Is that your reading of the County Court Act for any matter under 5 l.?—No; you are quite right; you cannot under 5 l.

826. Mr. Leatham.] Would there be any danger of personation under the ballot, if the number of polling booths were so greatly increased that every voter would be personally known to the person who had the register before him?—Of course the means of detection would be multiplied.

827. We have heard a great deal about the immorality of lieing and promise-breaking in relation to voting; do you think it would be more immoral to promise to vote against your conscience and afterwards to break your immoral promise by voting as your conscience dictates, or to promise to vote against your conscience and then to carry out your immoral promise?—That is a question of morals; I should scarcely like to give an opinion about that matter; I might be thought to be Jesuitical.

828. You spoke of the worst cases of bribery being the cases of those who lye-by to the last, that is what is called the half-past three o'clock bribery?—Yes.

829. There would be nothing of that kind under the ballot?—No; no one would know the position of the poll under the ballot; there would be nothing of that kind of bribery, and that is one of the great advantages of the ballot; no one would know who was ahead, and therefore they would not resort to that bribery which takes place generally between two and four o'clock.

830. Mr. Bright.] Judging from your evidence you have not assumed that the ballot would cure everything?—No, there is no panacea that will do that.

831. The Right honourable Member asked you some questions with regard to the want of truthfulness, that might exist under the ballot; you admitted to some extent, did you not, that that was possible?—Yes, I think it is possible.

832. If a man under the compulsion of intimidation votes contrary to his opinions does not he in a sense act a lie, that is to say, he gives a vote for one side, and believes in, and wishes that the other side should win, and do you not consider that to be an act also of practical immorality?—I should say that it is a moral falsehood, certainly; certainly; I think it is an immoral act, contrary to his convictions and his conscience.

833. Looking at it simply as a question of morals, perhaps you would hold the opinion that the question was balanced; that as much might be said against open voting as against secret voting in that particular?—It is in a state of equilibrium; the evils are equal.

834. You have been asked questions about the system of voting by gangs or tallies, a number of persons binding themselves together to do a sort of trade transaction at an election; is not that a transaction that may be accomplished under the present system?—It is.

835. Probably you know cases of that sort?—I know cases of it; I know a borough which a friend of mine went to, and I went with him myself, and I found that there were 800 freemen in the borough, and that they stood up 100 at a time, and at a certain stage they were to have 5 l. each, but the next batch of 100 required so much more; I know that as a positive fact. There were only 400 men to be relied upon, and I said to my friend "Do not you touch that borough at all."

836. Whatever truth there is in the statement that such a system as that might be worked in small constituencies under the ballot, do you consider that it could be worse under the ballot than it is under the present open system; are not both systems liable to a transaction of that character?—Yes; but I do not think that under the ballot it is so liable, because there is not the same certainty.

838. With regard to the question of personation, I understand that in your plan, and in fact, probably in every plan, the elector or the man who professes to be the elector comes before the returning officer and the proper authorities, and gives his name, and a reference is made to the register, and some attempt is made to discover whether he be the voter or not?—Yes, and he would be impeached at that point.

839. Is not the identification as complete under any system of ballot, as under the system of open voting?—The same.

840. Therefore, if I understand you, there is no disadvantage as regards the voting by ballot in particular?—It is the same; if a man comes up now, he says, "I am So-and-so," and he polls; but another man may come and say, "I am so and so," and poll; I know that at the last election for the borough of Windsor, there was a case of personation.

841. A Right honourable Member asked you some questions about public discussion, and whether we have not a good deal of public discussion in this country; you are probably aware that the ballot exists in a great many countries; in fact, in almost all countries but England?—Almost all.

842. Are you aware that in one form it exists generally in the United States?—I am aware that there is a form of ballot there.

843. You are aware probably, that it exists in another form in Australia?—I am aware that it does.

844. Are you aware that in Australia there is no public discussion upon public questions?—Quite the contrary, there is discussion upon almost every subject.

845. Has anybody ever suspected that in Australia they were less free to discuss public questions than they are here?—No; the vote by ballot I think would increase public discussion; for I think that candidates would be anxious to impress the minds of the people with the justice of their claims to their support, and they would have therefore more meetings, because they would know that men could exercise their franchise according to the dictates of their conscience, and they would constantly appeal to their conscience; and those who could make the strongest impression would get the votes; you would have more public meetings I think.

846. Have you found in your election experience that there are two kinds of influence; one which you would call legitimate and moral, and the other illegitimate and immoral?—Yes, I am aware that there are two kinds.

847. Which of those two would be most entirely suppressed or affected by the establishment of the secret voting?—My impression is, that moral persuasion would exist under the vote by ballot, and that intimidation and corruption would be diminished, if not altogether destroyed by the ballot.

848. The influence of character and of example and of friendly commerce, and of neighbourly feeling; all that influence would remain, would it not, by the ballot, just as it does now, and just as strongly?—The ballot would not alter human nature.

849. It would not alter those feelings?—Certainly not.

850. Mr. Villiers.] They would have their full weight?—Yes, certainly they would, as it would only set human nature freer.

851. Mr. Bright.] You have spoken of getting rid of canvassing, has it ever occurred to you that canvassing might possibly assume a very different character with the ballot from what it has with open voting; have you ever gone round with half-a-dozen gentlemen to canvass in your life?—I have, and a most disagreeable office it is.

852. Do you know the kind of thing which they say to the voter, and the kind of influence they try to bring to bear upon him?—Yes, I know it perfectly; but the influences that are brought to bear upon the voters are these. When persons go round canvassing, of course the candidate is very agreeable, and he puts his points thoroughly before the voter, and he secures the vote; but when they come to a man who is under influences, who is under their thumb so to speak, the style is not that of persuasion; it alters its tone; "You must vote for so and so, because you are under an obligation to me." It is no longer persuasive; it is mandatory.

853. Mr. Hunt.] Have you witnessed that in canvassing yourself?—I have, more than once, unfortunately; a great many times I have seen it done. When a committee is set up, they always meet together at night, and they put down opposite to each man what he is. "This man is a carpenter, and works for So-and-so." "If anybody knows So-and-so, tell him to go to that man directly, and see him." "Who is this man?" "He is coachman to Mr. So-and-so." "Write a letter to Mr. So-and-o, and tell him to canvass his coachman at once." They get by that means at each man, and it is a system of putting on the screw.

854. Mr. Bright.] If the ballot were established by Parliament, would not two things happen; one that the elector would feel himself absolutely free; and the other that the man accustomed to coerce would know that he was absolutely free?—Yes; a man would feel that he was free, and would be free, and the other man would know that he was free, and that is enough.

855. Do not you think that that would make a good deal of difference in their positions?—Yes; because if a man who was a potent person were to go to a voter and bully him, that is to say dictate to him how he was to give his vote, he would affront him, he would vote against him; and a person would be very chary how he did that. Therefore I think it would have the effect of protecting the voter in that way.

856. Have you any expectation that with the ballot there would arise amongst all those who have a vote a greater value for the privileges or right which they possess, and amongst those who have been accustomed to somewhat domineer or influence, a greater respect for the rights which they could no longer infringe?—I think that a freeman is always better than a slave.

857. In your borough do you think opinion has recently in a stronger form or volume been taking the course that your own opinion has taken on this question?—I can say that there has been a very gradual but forcible movement in favor of the ballot for some years past, and now I think it has come to a thorough climax.

858. What do you think about the opposite party, because you are not all of one opinion in Windsor; you have I presume the Conservative or Tory party, do you think that even amongst the respectable (and when I say respectable I mean the moral and thoughtful) men of that party, there is a greater disposition to consider this question fairly?—Some of my Conservative friends in Windsor have actually told me that they would be glad of the ballot, and I have heard some of the most respectable Conservatives say that they would be glad of the ballot.

859. And looking at the number of election petitions that you have had in Windsor within the last 20 years, is it your decided opinion that with the ballot you could look forward to 20 years in the future as a much more creditable period in the politics of your borough?—I believe myself that its virtue would be in a great measure restored.

860. Mr. Cross.] Do you believe that secret voting is possible, that is to say, if you have the ballot under any form you like, that you can keep it secret?—That is entirely at the discretion of the voter.

861. Do you believe that it is possible?—I think it is perfectly possible, I am sure it is; if a man is under great pressure, he can always keep his tongue quiet, and vote as he pleases.

862. Do not you believe, that if we had the ballot, the form of bribery would be changed, that is to say, if a person wanted to get in, though there were the ballot, he would say, "I will give so much, provided I win, to be divided among you, but if I lose, I will give nothing"?—Of course, that is the only way in which a man could proceed; but as I have said before, it is a game that two may play at, and therefore it becomes an equilibrium with a certainty to the voter, and therefore he will vote as he thinks fit.

863. I conclude you are acquainted with the large manufacturing populations to a certain extent?—I know some of them.

865. I am speaking generally of political questions throughout the year; when there is no election at all, men are in the habit of talking together, and every person's opinion upon all subjects, is thoroughly well known in his own works?—Yes, I think it is very likely, that at certain works, where the people are all agreed, they would express their opinions; but supposing they expressed opinions contrary to the wish of the master or the capitalist, and a man suffered the injustice of being turned out of the factory, I think that a man would be very cautious how he expressed his opinions, if he was likely to lose his work, if work was scarce.

866. I am not speaking of the times of election, but when all the elections are over, people get talking together, and everybody knows the opinions of his neighbours?—But then there are reticent workmen, I should fancy.

867. Therefore if a great employer of labour, using the means that you have just pointed out by the force of intimidation, induces a man to give his vote contrary to his conscience, that is perfectly well known among his fellow workmen, and he is twitted accordingly, if he is intimidated, and gives his vote contrary to his known and expressed opinion?—It would be known to his fellow workmen, no doubt.

868. And he would consequently be twitted with it?—I dare say he would; as I understand, the Honourable Member means, without the ballot; they would say, "You were obliged to do it," and he would say, "Yes, I have got a large family; I am sorry to say I was."

869. Do not you think that the fact of having given an open vote, is really a very great protection to the voter?—I think that it removes all protection.

879. Not protection against the man who intimidates him, but the feeling that it would be known that he had voted against his opinion, is a very great reason why the man would not vote in favour of his employer against his own will; he would rather be a martyr in that way, than lose his character among his companions?—Political martyrdom is a very uncommon thing; I mean to say, that a man does not wish to expose himself to those consequences, if he can avoid it; he would rather that he should have the protection of the ballot.

871. Do not you think that the fact of such a man's fellow workmen knowing perfectly well his political political opinions, and seeing that he voted directly contrary to them, would restrain him from so voting, because he would know that all his friends would twitt him about it afterwards, and that he would be called a turn-coat and all sorts of names, and turned out of their society?—If the men were right minded it would create just the opposite feeling, it would create a feeling of sympathy that the man was intimidated, instead of creating a laugh at his expense; they would say, "We are very sorry that you were obliged to go against your conscience."

872. At all events if that is a protection, the ballot would do away with that?—Yes; certainly.

873. Sir Frederick Heygate.] You stated, did you not, that you have witnessed this bullying mandatory conduct in canvassing?—I have seen it many times.

874. Have you witnessed it on more than one side?—I have known it on both sides.

875. Surely you have not been in the habit of canvassing on both sides?—No, but I have known it done; I do not think that either party is free from it; if a man has influence he will use it in political matters; I know that neither party is clean upon that point.

876. You say there is a residuum amongst the electors at Windsor of about 60, who are always in the habit of being bribed?—I fancy that they always are bribed, somehow or other.

877. Do you think that if they had the ballot they would not be bribed?—I do not know; it is very likely they have political opinions, indeed I have no doubt that they have political opinions, but their love of money or their necessities overwhelm their political opinions; if they could not get the money, I have no doubt that they would vote according to their convictions, if it was not known how they voted.

878. Do you think that that class of voters take any interest at all in the municipal elections?—Some of them are very active partisans; some men who are bribed wish to appear to be partisans for fear their virtue should be suspected, when they have no political partisanship in their hearts.

879. Can you state to the committee what the borough-rate at Windsor is in the pound?—I should think it is 2 s. in the pound.

880. Mr. Villiers.] Do the voters pay the rates themselves?—Yes, they do.

881. Mr. Hunt.] Have you any acquaintance with any country where the ballot is in force?—I have only been on the continent; I have never been to America.

882. You are not aware whether in those countries where the ballot is in use, the voting is kept secret or not?—I think in a new country the ballot is a farce, because it is not wanted.

883. Do you know whether in those countries where the ballot is in use, the voting is really kept secret?—I do not know, but my impression is that it might be.

884. I was asking you whether you knew that as a fact it was kept secret where the ballot was in use?—I think it is very likely in many cases that it may not be a well-devised system, and it is not kept secret, but it might be.

9 April 1869.

885. Mr. Villiers.] Did I understand you to say that it would be possible that personal canvassing would become very unpopular if the ballot was adopted?—I do not think that I made that observation.

886. Do you think that it would be so?—My impression is that people would rather be free from this domiciliary visiting and persecution, and being worried day after day by persons canvassing for their votes, and candidates would feel ashamed to do anything of the kind.

887. Would it not lead to its discontinuance if candidates knew that it would be offensive to voters?—I do not know; there is very great difficulty in seeing how you can get rid of personal canvassing.

888. Chairman.] We have been told that in some cases it happens that persons are nominated for municipal offices without their own consent, for the purpose of provoking a contest; have you ever known anything of that sort?—No; I should say it is a very rare occurrence.

889. It is possible, is it not, for any voter to nominate any other voter?—Yes, if qualified, they send the name into me, and I publish it, and if there are only a certain number nominated they are returned on a given day without any voting at all.

890. Have you never known a purely vexatious nomination?—I have never known an instance of a vexatious nomination.

891. Have you any opinion with regard to the opening or closing of public-houses on the polling days for municipal or borough elections?—My impression is, that all elections would be more quietly conducted, and there would be less turmoil and strife and less corruption, if public-houses were closed on the day of the election.

892. Do you think that that could be done?—Yes, but it would be very unpopular, in my opinion; but I have no doubt, as far as the election was concerned, it would be more peaceful, more orderly, more well-conducted, and there would be no treating; and I very much question whether there would be so much bribery.

893. Mr. Bright.] Do you mean that it would be unpopular with the publicans, or with the respectable population of the place?—It would be unpopular with the great mass of those men who like beer, and there are a great many of those men.

894. Mr. Cross.] With regard to the councillors being nominated for factious purposes, you say you have never known any case of that sort?—I never have known any.

895. Do you not know that the objection to voters being nominated against their consent arises from this, that anyone elected for the council must serve, except upon payment of a fine?—We never have had an instance of that; it would be rather otherwise; it would be done for purposes of annoyance; there are plenty of people always willing to come forward.

Mr. James Herbert, called in; and Examined.

896. Chairman.] Do you hold any office in the borough of Windsor?—I am a house agent, and receive rents for the corporation.

897. You do not hold any municipal office?—I only receive rents for the corporation.

Mr. J. Herbert.

898. Did you hear what was said by the town clerk as to the number of voters who expect to be paid a certain sum for their vote?—I did.

Mr. J. Herbert.

9 April 1869.

899. Do you concur in what he said?—I should have mentioned a smaller number than he did.

900. What number would you say?—I should have thought about 35 or 40, not more, are open to corruption.

901. Do you mean Parliamentary or municipal voters?—Municipal voters.

902. Do you agree with what Mr. Darvill said, that they only expected the amount of a day's wages?—Working men in coming to vote frequently lose time, and if they are at work out of the town they call upon the candidates to pay their expenses for loss of time.

903. Do you think that in the case of those 30 or 40, their vote depends upon which side pays then the most, or do they vote with their party, and merely expect to be paid for their trouble?—They vote for their party.

904. You do not think that in Windsor there is any body, however small, a body of men whose votes depend upon the bribe which they receive?—I think there are a few.

905. Did you hear what was said by Mr. Darvill as to the purchase of cottage property for political purposes?—I did, and it is perfectly true.

906. Have you in your profession had any knowledge of those transactions?—Not in my profession, but I know of it as a public fact.

907. Mr. Bright.] What is the fact?—That a candidate purchased those houses for political purposes.

908. How many are there of them?—Ninety-six in one batch, and 33 in another batch.

909. Do they give borough votes?—They do.

910. Chairman.] Is it within your knowledge that the municipal elections have been worked for purposes connected with the Parliamentary elections?—Yes, speaking of the last municipal election only.

911. Do you mean to say that there was more corruption than usual at the last municipal election?—I believe so.

912. Was there any understanding that the vote for the borough election should go the same way as the vote for the municipal?—I can only give a general answer to that; I believe so, but I do not know it personally.

913. Mr. Villiers.] I suppose there are influences of all kinds exercised over the voters in Windsor?—Yes.

914. What sort of influences; you have given us one description of the way in which people buy cottages and threaten voters, or the persons that live in them; but what influences have you seen at work during the election; have customers gone to shopkeepers, and things of that sort?—I have seen treating; and masters hinting to a foreman or a better class workman that he wished the other workmen to vote in a particular manner, and if they did not vote according to his wishes, no doubt they would have been discharged.

915. That is the coarsest kind of influence; but there are other influences, I presume; for instance, in the chapels, do the ministers tell their flocks to vote in a particular way?—I never heard of it.

916. I suppose the Palace has some influence, has it not?—Yes, but I think they are allowed to vote as they like at the Castle.

917. Do you think that the influence in Windsor is chiefly treating and bribery?—I do.

918. Have you considered at all what would be the way of stopping it; and do you agree with Mr. Darvill, that the ballot is the best experiment now to make?—I do.

919. Have you lately come to that conclusion?—No; I have thought so for some time past.

920. How long have you known Windsor?—Nearly 40 years. I was born at Eton, which adjoins Windsor.

921. And you have observed those things at the elections?—I have.

922. And you have always been of opinion that the ballot would have been a means of preventing them, or mitigating them?—Since I have had any opinions upon political matters.

923. What is your opinion of its effect upon canvassing; do you think that people would go round to ask men to vote, if they did not know how they would vote?—Not so much as they do at present.

924. Do you think that the people would go to a tradesman and say that they would withdraw their custom, if they did not know how that person was to vote?—I do not think they would, as a rule, it would be of no use, of course.

925. Do you think that the feeling would grow up in a place, that it would be extremely offensive to do it, and people would injure their candidates, if they did it?—I do think so.

926. And you think it possible that that sort of thing would cease?—Yes; I believe it would.

927. And with regard to bribery, do you think it would be effective in that respect?—I think it would prevent it, certainly, in a measure; it is a very difficult thing to say that it would prevent it wholly.

928. But at least things would only be as bad as they are now, if it did not prevent them?—They are bad enough now, and any system would be better than the present.

929. Would you say that corruption was practised at both the municipal and the Parliamentary elections?—Yes, certainly.

930. You have not observed that things have got better in that respect lately?—No, certainly not.

931. You do not think that the fire would go out of itself?—No, I am quite sure it would not.

932. Do you agree with Mr. Darvill, that the time has come when something should be done to stop it?—I do.

933. It is a frightful scandal upon the place, is it not, that it should go on?—Yes; I think not only in Windsor, but other places as well, it is time it should be stopped.

934. Mr. Hunt.] Do not you think that public opinion is rather asserting itself now, more than it used to do, against undue influence upon voters?—I think public opinion has very much increased in favour of the ballot lately.

935. Is not it your opinion that there is a much stronger public opinion against the intimidation of voters, than there used to be?—Not much; I should think it is about the same, I do not know that there is any difference.

936. Do you know whether there is any intimidation at Windsor amongst the workmen between one another?—No, I think not.

937. It all comes from above, does it?—Yes, certainly.

938. Mr. Villiers.] Do not workmen influence their own tradesmen?—No.

939. Mr. Locke.] You have no large factories or things of that sort at Windsor, have you?—None.

940. What

940. What is the greatest number of men who are electors, who are in the employ of any person at Windsor?—Forty-five at one place, and 100 nearly at the castle.

941. Do those men all vote on the same side?—At the castle, no; they do at other places; a person goes round, and tells them that a certain candidate is to be supported, but if we had the ballot a great many of those men would vote in a different way.

942. They do not resist it, do they?—Yes, a few do, but were afraid, if they voted against their master, they would lose their situation; I have heard them say so at this last election.

943. Do you think that the ballot, at all events for those men, is absolutely necessary?—I do.

9 April 1869.

944. Mr. Staveley Hill.] Do I rightly understand you to say that, in your opinion, the ballot has now become absolutely necessary at Windsor?—Yes, I think so, and at other places as well.

945. You think it is utterly impossible to have a pure election at Windsor at present?—I can only speak so far as our own side was concerned; it was pure on our side.

946. You think that, without the ballot the pure side won?—Yes, certainly; but with it the Liberals would always win at Windsor.

Mr. Frederick Woodthorpe, called in; and Examined.

947. Chairman.] Will you state to the Committee what office you hold?—The office of Town Clerk of the City of London.

948. The municipal elections in the City of London are not held under the same Act as in other boroughs, are they?—They are not.

949. Will you explain to the Committee what is the system in the City?—The system for the election of aldermen, common councilmen, and ward officers, is according to an Act of Parliament or rather several Acts of Parliament passed for the amendment of the Act of Parliament, the 11th of George the First. The first amendment to the 11th of George the First was passed in 1849, and the second amendment in 1867, both which Acts were promoted by the corporation themselves to improve, as they believed, and as Parliament subsequently sanctioned, the municipal elections for those offices.

950. Under those Acts, what is the actual system?—The system is that, from year to year a list of the voters in each ward is made out at a specific date; at present, the 3rd of December in each year; so as to agree, as far as possible, with the registration of voters for the election of Members of Parliament for the City of London; that registration coming into operation on the 1st of December, the municipal lists are made out on the 3rd.

951. How does the nomination take place?—At the wardmotes in each ward; at the wardmote held under the precept of the Lord Mayor.

952. Is it a public meeting?—Yes.

953. Consisting only of voters, or is it perfectly open?—There is no restriction; it is open to the inhabitants.

954. Is the nomination made by word of mouth, or in writing?—I believe by word of mouth; but the town clerk's office does not make him cognisant of the actual proceeding in that respect; each ward clerk arranges it, but we know of no nomination by writing; it is generally speaking, I believe, done by word of mouth.

955. In the same way as a Parliamentary nomination?—I believe precisely similar.

956. If there are more than one candidate what then takes place?—If there are more candidates than the number to be representatives for the particular ward, generally speaking a poll is demanded.

957. And how is that poll taken?—Under the terms of the Act of Parliament, to which I have referred, of 1867; it takes place on the following day.

Mr. F. Woodthorpe.

958. Is it by open poll, or is it by going in with voting papers?—An open poll.

959. Also in the same way as for a Parliamentary election?—Precisely the same, there being a list of voters as arranged and settled on the 3rd of December, so that any person coming up they refer to the book to show that he is on the list of voters as there stated, and no other list can be used.

960. Have you any knowledge whether those elections are conducted with purity or otherwise?—I speak not only personally from 33 years' experience, but traditionally from my father who held the same office, and I never heard of a case for the election of aldermen or common councilmen where bribery or intimidation was used.

961. Is that the general opinion?—That is the general opinion.

962. Mr. Villiers.] What is a liveryman; is he not a common councilman?—Not at all; the liverymen are members of the different livery companies of London, enrolled by the different companies.

963. But they vote by right of that privilege, do they not?—They vote by right of that privilege for some offices, but not for the offices I have named: that of alderman, common councillor, or ward officers.

964. They have a vote for Members of Parliament, have they not?—They have.

965. And can the companies increase their number to any extent?—Yes, I believe so; some of them are limited, and cannot exceed a particular number.

966. Do I understand you that that right is retained yet; have the liverymen still the right of voting for Members of Parliament; and have the companies still the right of increasing their number without any limit?—The livery companies have still the right of voting for Members of Parliament, and there are some companies, and only a few, I believe, that are limited in the number of their liverymen.

967. Chairman.] Can you state what is the number of municipal electors within the City?—The Committee will pardon me; I have only received a very short notice desiring that I should be here, and therefore I have not been able to ascertain the actual number, having no returns in my my possession to show the number; but I think I can speak in round figures, that the municipal electors, in consequence of the increase of the franchise under those two Acts of Parliament, especially the later one, which does not require an elector to be a freeman of London as formerly was the case, have increased one-third, and therefore I speak within the mark when I say that they are 12,000.

968. Do you know what are the number of Parliamentary electors in the City?—No; of course there is a list and return, which I would have been prepared with; I should think the number of electors upon the Parliamentary list would be about 18,000, because there are the liveries and also the householders.

969. Are a large number of those 12,000 electors persons in poor circumstances, or are they generally well to do?—Well to do; none can be put upon the municipal register, unless they are rated to the amount of 10 l. to any rate, police, poor rate, or otherwise.

970. That is under a special Act of the City of London?—Yes, under a special Act.

971. Mr. Villiers.] Would you know if there was any corrupt practice resorted to in those elections?—I think I should know this: if an election were disputed, and a scrutiny therefore demanded upon such ground, it would come under the cognizance of the Court of Aldermen, and thereby I should be informed of it.

972. But there are contests for those offices, are there not?—Yes.

973. And sharp contests; it is a great object, is it not, with the candidates to obtain the election?—I believe, generally speaking, they desire very much to be elected.

974. And canvassing takes place for the purpose?—I suppose it does; but I am not cognizant of it personally as town clerk.

975. Are you not really acquainted with the practices upon those occasions?—Only generally, that they do canvass.

976. I suppose the same thing takes place as in all other canvasses at popular elections; there is some intimidation and some inducement held out to the voters to choose one man instead of another?—I am not aware of anything of the kind.

977. But you are not aware of the contrary, perhaps?—I am not aware of the contrary, certainly.

978. With respect to proceedings at Parliamentary elections, have you any particular means of knowledge?—Not particularly; they do not at all come under the cognizance of the municipal authorities, except that the sheriff is the returning officer.

979. Mr. Hunt.] Do you know whether there has been any bribery at Parliamentary elections for the City?—I have not any knowledge.

980. Have you any means of knowing?—Not any officially.

981. Have you ever heard that there has?—No, I cannot say that I have heard of bribery to any extent, but of that, as I say, I am not cognizant, the electors principally being of the livery of whom strictly the municipal authorities have no cognizance.

982. Do you know whether amongst those who take part in municipal elections in the City, there is any feeling about the ballot, for or against?—I am not aware that it has ever been mooted; it may have been at some few wardmotes, but I am not cognizant of it.

983. Have you any opinion about it yourself?—Yes, I have a strong opinion against the ballot.

984. On what ground?—Because I think, if a man has got a vote, he should use it openly.

985. Do you think that, if the ballot were established, you would get rid of the evils of undue influence and of pecuniary corruption?—I do not think it would at all affect the City of London.

986. But, generally speaking, do you think it would be a cure for intimidation and bribery?—There appears to be a very strong feeling that it would do so; I confess I have not been able to persuade myself that it would be effectual; I think it would lower the standard personally of the voter.

987. Mr. Locke.] Generally in the City, I believe, the opinion is in favour of the ballot; are not the great majority of the Court of Common Council in favour of it?—I have not heard so.

988. But a great many are in favour of it?—I know a good many are in favour of it for the Parliamentary elections.

989. With regard to the manner in which those wardmotes are conducted, a wardmote is summoned, is it not, for business purposes, and likewise for the election?—No, it is summoned for the election.

990. At the election all sorts of questions are gone into, are they not?—A good many are, undoubtedly.

991. By the householders of the ward?—Yes.

992. And they pass resolutions and bring forward any question that they may think fit?—They do.

993. Then the candidates are nominated?—The first proceeding is to make the elections according to the precept.

divided by the number of occupiers, shall give a sum of not less than 10 l. per annum for each and every such occupier, to the police or any other rate, and who shall be registered in the register of voters for the City of London, in use at elections for Members to serve in Parliament, and then in force in respect to such premises, shall be capable of being elected a common councilman for the ward in which such premises shall be situate, any law, custom, or usage to the contrary thereof in anywise notwithstanding." The Corporation, finding that that restriction as to freemen still closed the door to very many of the ratepayers of London, who would otherwise be qualified to become voters for members of the Common Council, occupiers of very large premises even, who did not choose to take up their freedom, applied, as I have stated, for the Act, which was passed in 1867, whereby the necessity of being freemen of London was obviated, and now any person, rated according to the terms which I have stated, without being a freeman, can be a voter for aldermen and common councillors.

995. The value being 10 l.?—Yes.

996. Mr. Villiers.] He can carry on any business, can he not, without being a freeman?—Now they can carry on any business without being freemen, that restriction has been done away with some few years.

997. Mr. Locke.] Every liveryman is a freeman, is he not?—Not necessarily; not of the City of London.

998. But he must be a freeman of a company?—Yes, certainly.

999. A freeman of a company, and a freeman of the City of London, are two distinct things?—They are.

1000. But can a liveryman, who is not a freeman of the City of London, vote in a Parliamentary election?—He can not.

1001. The Lord Mayor is chosen out of the aldermen, is he not?—He is.

1002. By the liverymen?—The livery return two to the Court of Aldermen, and they select one.

1003. Nobody is qualified to be Lord Mayor of London, unless he be an alderman?—That is so; and he must have served the office of sheriff.

1004. What other offices do the livery elect in the City of London?—The livery nominate one of the two for Lord Mayor; they elect the sheriffs, they elect the chamberlain, they elect the bridgemasters, they elect the auditors of the City accounts, and they elect the ale conners.

1005. That is done in common hall, is it not?—Yes, that is done in common hall at the Guildhall.

1006. The aldermen are elected, are they not, by the same constituency as the common council?—Precisely the same.

1007. And the aldermen are elected for life?—Yes.

1008. With regard to the common council, the election takes place annually, does it not?—Yes, annually.

1009. What is the effect of that annual election in the City of London; are the changes in the common council numerous, or not?—Certainly not.

1010. Although the election takes place every December, generally speaking the same persons are returned?—That is so.

1012. Therefore the whole body of the common council is elected annually?—Yes, annually.

1013. With regard to other municipal corporations, one-third is elected, is it not?—Yes, I think it is one-third.

1014. And the aldermen in other municipal corporations are elected by the town council?—I really am not quite certain whether it is so or not.

1015. Do you see any disadvantage in the mode of election of aldermen and common councilmen which prevails in the City of London?—Not any.

1016. You think that it works well?—Decidedly.

1017. Have you given your attention at all to the working of "The Municipal Corporation Act" in other boroughs?—No, I have not particularly.

1018. You say you have not known any instances of bribery, or corruption, or intimidation, in the election of aldermen and common councillors, more especially for aldermen in a ward; is there very frequently a very strong contest, and a good deal of money spent?—I know nothing about the spending of money. I know that there are contests, and sometimes they are close.

1019. They have committee-rooms and canvassers, do they not?—I am not aware of the system. There is no doubt that such measures are made use of in some shape or way, more or less.

1020. Do you think politics enter, to any great extent, into the ward elections in the City of London?—I cannot say that I think they do. I think it is far more the local influence of the party being a candidate, as to his connection with the ward and the ward purposes.

1021. Do you think that the municipal elections in the City of London have any connection with, or bearing upon the Parliamentary?—I have not the idea that they have any.

1022. In the case of men who are elected for the common council, and elected as aldermen, do you think politics enter into the consideration of their eligibility for the office?—I do not.

1223. You think that those elections in the City of London are carried on for the government of the city, without reference to politics?—That is my belief.

1024. Sir Frederick Heygate.] You stated, did you not, that the number of liverymen was unlimited in the City of London?—I am not aware, at the moment, that all the companies are restricted as to the number of their livery. Some, I know, are restricted; but I am not aware that they all are.

1025. To your knowledge, is it the practice of those companies, that are allowed to do so, to make an unlimited number of liverymen?—I am not aware.

Mr. F. Woodthorpe.

9 April 1869.

1026. Is there not a very heavy sum to be paid upon persons being made liverymen?—That depends upon what company they belong to; some are very moderate, and some are rather heavy, I believe.

1027. Can you give an idea of the average sum that is paid?—In some cases, I believe, it costs a considerable sum of money, in others it is very moderate; I should say that it varies perhaps from 5 l. to 50 l.

1028. And some much more?—No, not much more.

1029. Is it not much heavier where the applicant is not born "free" of the City?—I believe it is so.

1030. Are not there many cases of this nature?—Not largely so, that I am aware of.

1031. Is not that, practically, a limit to the amount?—Yes, there is a certain amount to be paid.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

The Petition of Electors of the Borough of Warrington was read by the Clerk. 13 April 1869.

Mr. HENRY BLECKLY, called in; and Examined. Mr. H. Bleckly.

1032. Mr. Cross.] You are a Magistrate, I believe, of the county of Lancaster?—I am.

1033. And you have been twice Mayor of Warrington?—I have.

1034. Does not the firm of which you are a member employ a very large number of hands in the iron trade?—We do.

1035. How many hands have you employed on the average?—About 1,000.

1036. Have you for a long series of years been acquainted with the proceedings at elections both municipal and Parliamentary?—I have.

1038. Have you seen since the passing of that Act a great change in the amount of drunkenness in the streets on the day of the municipal elections?—There has been very much less of drunkenness during the period that I speak of, than there was in the antecedent period.

1039. Do you think that that change has been from the gradual growth of improvement in the opinions of the people generally, or did it come suddenly into operation as soon as the Act came into force?—It happened to come contemporaneously with the Act, and has been generally spoken of as having been the result of the Act. I say this without reference to any particular party at all; but it has been considered that the operation of the Act has been to improve the character of the municipal elections materially.

1040. There have not, I believe, been any prosecutions under the Act?—I believe not.

1041. How do you account for it that the Act should have had that effect?—I hardly know how to account for it. It has been seen, and understood, that definite punishments likely to be inflicted attached to the offences, and people have been unwilling to incur the penalty.

1042. With regard to the nominations under that Act, do you think that a great number of people have been nominated under that Act, or a larger number than there would have been the case if that Act had not passed, of factious and fictitious nominations?—I think fewer persons have been nominated.

1043. Chairman.] You stated that within the last 10 years the municipal elections have been conducted in a more orderly manner; do you think that they have been conducted in a pure manner also?—I do.

1044. Have you ever heard any allegation of the prevalence of bribery at the municipal elections at Warrington?—Very seldom. One hears men talk about such things occasionally, but they have never been brought to any test or proof, and I do not think that there has been any allegation that could be relied upon of there being any extensive system of bribery at all. I may say that I have not heard of any.

1045. Is it your belief that there is very little bribery?—It is my belief.

1046. Are not the contests in the municipal elections frequent?—They come round in the ordinary course under the Act of Parliament, and there are generally contests at the time of the election, I think; one or more probably.

1047. How many wards are there in the borough?—There are five wards in the borough.

13 April 1869.

1048. Do you know the number of electors?—I should suppose that the number of electors would be about 4,000.

1049. Sir George Grey.] Was this a sudden change that took place after the passing of the Act of the 22nd of Victoria?—I think it was.

1050. Was any public attention called to the Act in Warrington, or any public notice given of it?—I do not think there was.

1051. You stated that you attribute it rather to the knowledge that a specific punishment was attached to bribery, and not to any attempt to enforce the Act; are you aware whether there was any specific punishment attached to it under the Municipal Act?—No doubt there was a punishment attached to it under the general Act, but this was brought more prominently into view when this Act was passed.

1052. Do you mean that it was the fear of the penalty imposed by the 11th section of that Act which deterred persons from offering and receiving bribes?—I think that it had considerable effect.

1053. Mr. Bright.] What is the condition of your corporation; do politics enter much into the elections?—They have done more than they do now.

1054. What is the complexion of the council, is it Tory or Liberal?—We should call it Radical in Warrington.

1055. Is there a majority of the Liberal party in it?—Yes, I think there is.

1056. Has that been so generally for the last 10 years?—I think it has.

1057. Is it so by a very large majority, or not?—I do not think it is; I think it is now by a fair working majority; not an overwhelming one.

1058. Have the contests been spirited or violent?—They have not been what you may call bitter; party spirit has been somewhat moderated, I think, and if a man were considered a fair representative, under the circumstances, I do not think that the fact of his belonging to one particular party would probably have prevented his being elected, assuming that he had other qualifications.

1059. If there has been a general absence of bribery, has there been much treating; much of what has been called public-house work?—I do not think there has.

1060. Chairman.] Has the Act been put into force?—I think we had a person brought up for personation under the Act some years ago.

1061. Mr. Villiers.] There has been no occasion to enforce the Act, if there has been no bribery or treating at Warrington?—I am not prepared to say that there has been none; but none that has been brought forward in an official manner, and none that has been brought forward so as to be taken notice of.

1063. But would it be the disposition of the people of Warrington; the authorities, for instance, if they heard or suspected bribery, to put the law in motion?—I think it would.

1064. May I ask why you think it would?—I think that there are many respectable people, who, if they saw the law conspicuously broken in that way, would be disposed to put it in operation.

1065. You stated, did you not, that it never has been put in operation?—I do not think there has been occasion for it to be so.

1066. You have never heard that there was occasion?—I do not think so.

1067. There have been contests at those municipal elections, have there not?—There have.

1068. Are the people not somewhat eager in the contests; do they not canvass there?—They do.

1069. And do the people vote quite independently, animated by public spirit, and prompted by no other motive whatever?—That is more than I can tell. I cannot undertake to say under what motive they vote; but as a matter of fact, I think that they do vote without undue influence being used to direct their votes.

1070. We are rather particular in hearing this evidence from you, because it varies a good deal from what we have heard in other places, where it seems that the people do not take a very strong interest in the candidates, unless the candidates move them by something?—I will say that they do not take, probably, so much interest. I do not say that they take a great interest in it; but the fact is, they have been elected without much trouble on their part. I was elected myself without taking any steps whatsoever; without asking a single person for his vote, and without giving or doing anything whatever to acquire the position which they elected me to.

1071. There was no contest, perhaps?—I am not aware that there was any contest; but I say that I not only used no undue influence, but that I did not even take any steps to secure my election.

1072. Do people desire to belong to the council at Warrington?—A certain number of persons do; I do not say that the desire is very urgent.

1073. I think I understood you to say that public-houses were not resorted to upon that occasion at Warrington?—I do not say that they are not resorted to; but I say, for instance, that a candidate may probably have his place of meeting at a public-house; his committee may meet there.

1074. People do not get refreshments there gratuitously during those contests, do they?—I have not heard of their doing so.

1075. You could not say that they have not?—I could not undertake to say that nobody received refreshments without paying for them; but I have not heard that it has been so; I fancy that as people are induced probably to do their best against their opponents, if it was notorious, or could be proved, they would have brought it forward.

1076. Is there ever any riot during those elections?—I do not think we have had any at all.

1077. Are the Parliamentary elections conducted with the same propriety and purity as the municipal elections?—As far as my experience goes, the Parliamentary elections have been conducted in an orderly and respectable way, without riot or disturbance.

1078. There was a contest upon the last occasion, was there not?—There was.

1079. Has there been an inquiry since?—Yes, there has.

1080. Were the Members unseated?—No, they were not.

1081. Sir George Grey.] Will you just look at the 54th section of the Municipal Act, 5 & 6 Will. 4, c. 76, and read it to the Committee?—"And be it enacted, that if any person who shall have, or claim to have, any right to vote in any election of of mayor, or of a councillor, auditor, or assessor of any borough, shall, after the passing of this Act, ask or take any money or other reward, by way of gift, loan, or other device, or agree or contract for any money, gift, office, employment, or other reward whatsoever, to give, or forbear to give, his vote in any such election, or if any person by himself, or any person employed by him, shall, by any gift or reward, or by any promise, agreement, or security for any gift or reward, corrupt or procure, or offer to corrupt or procure, any person to give, or forbear to give, his vote in any such election, such person so offending in any of the cases aforesaid shall, for every such offence, forfeit the sum of 50 l., of lawful money of Great Britain, to be recovered with full costs of suit by anyone who shall sue for the same by action of debt, bill, plaint, or information in any of his Majesty's Courts of Record at Westminster; and any person offending in any of the cases aforesaid, being lawfully convicted thereof, shall for ever be disabled to vote in any election in such borough, or in any municipal or Parliamentary election whatever in any part of the United Kingdom, and also shall for ever be disabled to hold, exercise, or enjoy any office or practice to which he then shall, or at any time afterwards may, be entitled as a burgess of such borough, as if such person was naturally dead."

1082. Does not that clause impose a penalty of 50 l. upon any person who commits bribery at a municipal election, and also disqualify him for ever from the exercise of any municipal franchise?—It does.

1083. What is the reason why that clause was wholly inoperative, and that a great deal of bribery existed before 1859 in the municipal elections at Warrington, whereas the Act of the 22nd of Victoria, which imposes milder penalties or a disqualification of only six years instead of a perpetual one, has been operative?—If I were to say, as a matter of fact, that when this Act of Parliament was passed there did exist a large amount of bribery, I should merely state what was true; if I am asked how it happens that such a fact should exist with this penalty staring people in the face, I am not able to say, except that if you impose a severe penalty, a penalty more severe than public opinion would approve, or than you would expect the public feeling to go along with you in enforcing, the probability is that your Act becomes a dead letter; if you inflict a moderate penalty which public opinion will support you in, the sentence is then regarded as one that may be fairly brought to bear against the offender.

1084. Then I believe the penalty under the last Act is recoverable in the county court?—I believe it is.

1085. And therefore by a much easier and less expensive process?—Yes, it is.

1086. Do you really attribute the decrease of bribery in Warrington to the operation of this Act; to the diminution, in fact, of the penalty and to the fact of its being recoverable in the county court, although this last Act has never yet been put in force?—The certainty of the penalty being incurred tends to diminish the offence; when punishment is brought within reasonable limits, it is understood that it will be incurred, and therefore the act is abstained from.

1087. Do you think that the general opinion in Warrington is that this Act would certainly be enforced in case of any flagrant bribery?—I think that is the opinion.

1088. There would be no indisposition among respectable persons in Warrington to set that Act in motion?—I do not think there would.

1089. Mr. Edward Egerton.] The provisions of that Act were pretty well known in Warrington, from the fact of my honourable friend the Member for Lancashire at that time residing in Warrington?—Yes.

1090. So that there was a general knowledge, throughout Warrington, of the provisions of the Act which he had passed through Parliament?—Yes; it was more especially known as Mr. Cross's Act.

1091. Is that the reason which you assign for the gradual change in the state of public opinion?—I am not able to say what the reason may be; but, as a matter of fact, I say that the Act was well known in Warrington to be an Act of Parliament which had been introduced into Parliament by Mr. Cross.

1092. And the inhabitants of Warrington knew that Mr. Cross had paid a great deal attention to the subject?—Yes.

1093. And was anxious to relieve Warrington, if possible, from the stigma of corruption?—No doubt.

1094. Mr. Locke.] Do you think there would be any necessity for a public prosecutor?—I think it would be an advantage that there should be.

1095. For that reason do you think that there would be any advantage in it if, as you say, steps would be taken to punish bribery?—I think they would be taken more certainly and effectually if there were an officer whose duty it was to do it; in other cases parties might consider that it would have to be a flagrant case for them to take up; but if there were a public officer whose duty it was, it would be expected that he would do it under all circumstances.

1096. Upon every occasion, as a matter of course?—Yes; that is to say, he might fail on many occasions in establishing a proof, but as he would be working with the public money he would have an inducement to undertake a lawsuit that a stranger would not have, who might, unless he had overwhelming evidence, not bring it forward.

1097. Have you given your attention to the question as to a public prosecutor?—No; I consider that it would be exceedingly desirable that, in the case of offences against the public, the prosecution should be set in motion by the public themselves rather than by a private person.

1098. As to the public prosecutor, which you suggest should be appointed, do you mean that he should be appointed merely for this purpose, or generally for the repression of all offences?—I have hardly considered that question; I fancy that what applies to the one would apply to the other.

1099. Mr. Brand.] I understood you to say, speaking of Warrington, that previous to the last 10 years the municipal contests were more corrupt than they have been subsequently?—They were.

1100. Was political excitement greater at that time?—Possibly it might have been.

1101. And there would be less political excitement in recent years?—I think there has been less political excitement in recent years.

Mr. H. Bleckly.

13 April 1869.

1102. And do you think that the comparative absence of corruption of late years has been caused by the absence of political excitement?—I think that that has had its influence.

1103. Mr. Staveley Hill.] You have had a good many matters which have considerably interested the borough of Warrington, have you not, such as water works, sewage works, and so on?—Yes.

1104. Have they been much considered by the ratepayers?—They have.

1106. Did not that excite a considerable amount of interest in Warrington?—Yes.

1107. I think you had one Bill last year, in Parliament, of considerable importance?—Yes.

1108. Do you know at all about what proportion of the voters voted at the last municipal elections?—I cannot speak of with certainty; I do not think that anything like seven-eighths would vote at the municipal elections; but I really cannot tell. The municipal elections took place in November, and I have not had an opportunity of examining into the returns.

1109. Practically speaking, in those elections you have not known of any corrupt practices?—I have not; and I may say that the general impression in the town (I do not say of one particular party or the other) is, that the elections have been conducted in a fairer, more regular, and more orderly manner during the last 10 years than they were in the preceding time.

1110. There have been no complaints of any corruption?—There have been no complaints of any corruption to any extent.

1111. Mr. Villiers.] Has any undue influence been used, such as intimidation on the direction by masters to vote?—I do not think there has.

1112. You would know of those things if they did occur, would you not?—I think that I should hear of them; I think that they would be brought out or we should hear of them; we have newspapers that would give us information.

1113. Are you now in office?—I was mayor up to the end of last year, but I am not so now.

1114. Had you been in the corporation before then?—Yes, I was in the corporation some time before then.

1115. I think you said that you never engaged in a contest yourself?—No, I have not.

1116. You were always elected without an opponent?—Yes.

1117. But you do not know the particulars of the election of any other person who was so fortunate?—I know that there have been persons elected in that way.

1118. But where there has been a contest you know nothing of the particulars of the contest?—Nothing further than the public reports; I have not taken any special interest myself in them.

1119. Mr. Cross.] You have been twice mayor of Warrington, have you not?—Yes.

1120. Mr. Graves.] Do you attach much importance to voting by papers in the municipal elections?—I think that it is a very useful method of voting.

1121. Is it not rather an unnecessary trouble to oblige a man to go personally and deliver in a written notice of the way in which he votes?—Considering the mistakes that have taken place in the voting at Warrington, we should desire to see the most regular and strict method applied to voting, so as to be sure that the intention of the voter is carried out.

1122. Have any instances come within your knowledge where those papers have been altered after being signed by the voter while going to the polling place?—No, I have not known of that.

1125. The check clerks on both sides took down most of the votes, did they not; but the official clerk omitted some of them?—That was the case, I believe. The check clerks may have omitted some of them; but I believe the check clerks pretty well corresponded with each other; but the poll clerk, being entirely inexperienced, did not enter the votes as they were given. He did not make any inquiry, I believe, of the voters for whom they intended to vote; but he simply took their cards and put them into his pocket.

1126. Some of the men whose votes were not entered on the actual poll register did actually tender their votes legally, and their names would have been put on by the judge, or were put on afterwards?—Some four or five, I believe, were put on by the judge afterwards, as having done that which in his judgment entitled them to say that they had voted. They feel very much aggrieved that, having been entitled to vote for the first time under a new Act of Parliament, there should have been some restriction put upon them which they were not informed of, and that there there should have been no provision on the part of the authorities to distinguish the person who was entitled by law to record the votes, and the other persons who were there merely to check the votes.

1127. Mr. Bright.] This happened in only one particular booth, I believe?—It happened in one booth merely.

1128. In that booth who was the returning officer?—The returning officer is one person, the mayor of the town.

1129. Who was his deputy in that booth?—I cannot tell you who the deputy was.

1130. Mr. Cross.] Who was the poll clerk?—The poll clerk was this man whose history you have heard to-day, in the petition which has been read, and who has since died.

1131. He went into a lunatic asylum and died, did he not?—Yes.

1132. Mr. Bright.] Were the errors thus committed all on one side?—They were nearly all on one side.

1133. Not entirely so?—I am not aware that they were to any extent on the other side; but they were nearly all on one side.

1134. Then not only did the poll clerk neglect his duty in not asking for the vote, and recording it, but the check clerk put there to watch the interests of the party for whom those men intended to vote also neglected his duty?—He failed to see that the poll clerk did not enter the name of the voter.

1135. But the machinery, as it is organised either by Act of Parliament, or by custom, or by the returning officer, appears to have been complete; and notwithstanding that it broke down?—It appears to me to be incomplete, because there is no defined duty, as it seems, devolving upon the officer, and no formal responsibility lying upon him which should enable a man to say "I did a certain act, and thereby entitled myself to be put upon this poll book"; because if the law does not define the act, and if it is to depend upon the opinion of the judge or jury, or whoever it might be, whether a man did sufficient or not, it seems rather hard upon men who have no knowledge of such things at all, that they should lose their votes from their not conforming to a rule which they are not made acquainted with, and that the officer who turns out to be a sham, or worse, should incur no penalty.

1136. Sir George Grey.] Did not the judge, in fact, hold that those voters never tendered their votes; that they merely put their cards across the table, and never stated for whom they voted?—I understand the decision of the judge to be, that they did not, in a legal sense, tender their votes.

1137. Mr. Cross.] I understand the complaint to be not in the least a political question?—No, there is no imputation made that the thing was done in that way at all; it is a defect of the machinery in taking the votes which is complained of.

1138. What you wish to represent to the Committee is this; in the first place, that there ought to be some provision, as there is under the Municipal Act, by which some man of character and station should preside at each polling booth?—That is so.

1139. At each polling booth in the municipal election, I believe the alderman of the ward is bound to preside?—One alderman for the ward is nominated as the presiding alderman.

1140. What you want is, that there should be at the Parliamentary elections some man of standing and high known character who should preside at each poll booth, and see that the votes are properly taken?—Undoubtedly.

1141. And that there should be some form specified by Act of Parliament, as to the way in which votes should be given, and as to what is a legal tender, and what is not?—Undoubtedly.

1142. This matter of course was found out, was it not, when the mayor added up his books at the end of the day?—Yes.

1143. And then he found, to everybody's surprise, that the result was different from either of the check clerks?—Yes, that was so.

1144. Supposing that the voting had taken place by ballot, and that through some accident those papers, or whatever form they might vote in, had not reached the proper destination, could that possibly have been found out?—It appears to me that it could not. I do not impute to this man that he did, or intended to do, that which was wrong, but I mean to say that if he had intended to do that which was wrong, he could do it just in the way that he did; and that if he were taking votes secretly, there would be no reason in the world why he should not deal with them in the same way, put them on one side without anybody being able to detect what he did with them.

1145. You could not find out whether the man had cheated, or had not?—It appears to me impossible; there should be a self-acting machinery, which will protect the public from being defrauded of their votes in this way; it should not be dependent upon the act of this man or that man, but it should be such a machinery as would ensure that the intention of the voter should be effectual.

1146. You mean that there should be a public check upon it?—Yes; unless a man has an opportunity of seeing afterwards whether his vote is recorded as he intended it, he may have no possible means of telling whether the officer has dealt honestly with him, or has not dealt honestly with him.

1147. With regard to the matter of bribery, of course you can only speak of that class of persons with whom you are intimately acquainted; you know nothing about farmers or shopkeepers; you come here simply to speak about the case of workmen?—Yes, that is so.

1148. You have told the Committee that your firm employ 1,000 hands, and that you are intimately connected with the workmen in that district?—I am.

exercise undue and improper influence upon their men.

1150. You do not think that you could bring up witnesses, so far as the town of Warrington goes, to show that there was intimidation used by masters towards their men?—I think not.

1151. There is a growing feeling, is there not, amongst the men themselves to resist any such intimidation if it was attempted?—I think that would be so.

1152. Is it a fact, or is it not, that in the case of all those men (I am speaking now of the north of England and such towns as you are acquainted with), their opinions upon public matters are perfectly well known to each other?—I take it that they are well known; and there is no difficulty whatever in ascertaining the preferences of any man who is employed in any work such as ours.

1153. And that the voting in fact practically is the last act of a long series of matters by which his opinions are known?—No doubt all the antecedent history of the man, all his talk and all his actions, are open to the observation of the persons with whom he associates, and the act of voting is simply the concluding act of a history which has gone before and which has been well known to other people.

1155. Is it your opinion, that supposing the ballot were established bribery might be more extensive, for this reason, that if a man were bribed in the case of open voting, he got his bribe in his hand and went away and cared nothing more about it, whereas, in the case of voting by ballot, a man would say, "I shall give you nothing unless I succeed," and then the man would have to earn his money and would go on zealously bribing throughout the whole election; I believe that is your opinion?—Yes; I have no doubt that men would then pay for results and would not pay otherwise than in case of success, and that bribery would take the form of giving the man so much at such a time in case the candidate was returned. I say, that there are a certain number of bribable persons, and that there are a certain number of persons who are willing to bribe, and that the question of bringing those persons together will always arise; and that if you put a man into such circumstances that it is his interest to work continuously in order to succeed, he will continue to work.

1156. Mr. Villiers.] Do you speak of Warrington?—I speak generally. I merely speak of the persons who would bribe and the persons who would be bribed.

1157. Chairman.] Were the facts which you have stated to the Committee with regard to the last Parliamentary election at Warrington, admitted at the inquiry which took place before the judge?—I think they were.

1159. What had those voters done who were held by the judge to have done sufficient?—They had gone into the room and said for whom they voted, and presented their cards.

1160. Then the failure which took place at Warrington was solely in consequence of the incompetence of the poll clerk and of the incompetency of the check clerks to the extent of not insisting upon his doing his duty?—I do not know that the check clerks had any authority to insist at all, but it arose partly from the want of proper mechanical arrangements to distinguish the poll clerk from the check clerks and from the poll clerk not doing his duty.

1161. Sir George Grey.] Was it not a fact that whenever a voter had, in accordance with the law, verbally stated for whom he voted, the judge corrected the mistake of the poll clerk and placed the name of that voter on the poll book, but where the voter had gone into the booth and merely put his card across the table and said nothing, the judge held that that was not a legal tender of the vote, and the vote never having been tendered never could be recorded; was not that the substance of the decision of the judge?—It might be something like it.

1163. Chairman.] With regard to the question of influence exercised at elections, do you think that any influence is exercised in Warrington by the workmen over each other as to their votes?—It is very hard to say that they may not influence them by argument or any other form; but I have no means of knowing that there is any undue influence exercised upon them.

1164. You do not think that any pressure or violence is used?—I do not.

1165. I think you stated that you are pretty well aware of what are the political opinions of the men who work under you?—I mean to say that if I wished to know I should not have any difficulty in ascertaining.

1166. But, as a fact, do you know the political opinions of a great many of them?—I have reason to know how most of them voted.

1167. Do you know the political opinions which they hold?—I do not know their names, there there are so many; but if I wanted to know I should have no difficulty in ascertaining.

1168. Do you know, or not, as a fact, whether many of them are in favour of the ballot?—That I do not know.

1169. Mr. Bright.] May I ask whether you have made the ballot your study at all?—I have thought about it and read about it.

1170. Have you ever seen it in operation in any country where it is practised?—No, I have not.

1171. Were you in Manchester at the time of the late trial of ballot election?—I was not.

1172. Can you tell me of any book or pamphlet or publication describing it, as it is seen in other countries that you have read?—Really that is rather a wide question to answer, and I cannot say that I could offhand; I have read a great deal that has been written on the subject.

1173. But you appear to have a very confident opinion that a mistake like that which occurred at Warrington, could not have been found out by the ballot?—When I look at the fact of a man writing down the votes in public, and which he knows will be examined in a few days by somebody else, and when he yet manages to manipulate the votes so that 70 men are entirely deprived of them, I say if they do this thing in the green tree, what will they do in the dry? What cannot be done when the security of publicity is taken away, and when the whole thing is shrouded in darkness? I suppose there must be some public officer or other in the last resort to control, or to see that the vote is given, and if that person is corrupted or imbecile, the vote may be dealt with as he thinks proper.

1174. Did you ever hear in any of the elections of this country on going back to the time of the Reform Bill, that a similar case to that at Warrington has happened before?—I can very readily imagine that such things may have occurred very often, and not have been discovered.

1175. Do you think that if the check clerks' books agreed, and they both disagreed with the poll clerk's book, no notice would have been taken of it?—I fancy that in very many elections where the difference is not considerable, the poll clerks and the check clerks do not bring their accounts into agreement. Where the difference between the number of voters is very near, the probability is that they would do so, but if there was a majority of 1,000 or 1,500, and there was a difference of 15 or 20, they would not be very careful to have it settled as to who was right or wrong.

1176. At your last Parliamentary election at Warrington, is it your opinion that there was any bribery practised?—I do not think there was any bribery.

1177. Do you think there was any treating?—There might have been by indiscreet partisans; of course it is very difficult to know what treating really means; some persons consider one act treating, and others another.

1178. Did you hear that the night before the election there was a good deal of what is called bottling?—No; I have heard that one or two persons were said to have been bottled.

1179. Did you not hear that at certain public-houses, and in one in particular, a very large number of electors were taken the night before the election, and kept there during the whole night, and polled early the next morning?—No, I did not hear of that; I may explain probably what took place, because it might be misunderstood. There were a number of persons who met together at some place near to the polling booth, where they would have to record their votes, and they stayed up all night in that place, because it had been given out that the other side would come in great force early in the morning and take possession of the polling booth.

1180. Do you know or not, that it has been charged by one party upon the other in Warrington, that at your last election a large number of electors were so secured and taken care of during the night previously to the election in places in connection with public-houses?—I do not.

1181. Have you not seen that such a charge has been made either in speeches or in your newspapers?—I am not in the habit of attending to speeches that are made in connection with local affairs.

1182. But in the newspapers, have you not seen it?—I have not.

1183. Can you tell at all what was the number of public-houses having votes at your last election, and in what way the great majority of them voted?—The number of public-houses is considerable, and I should think that the majority of them voted in favour of the Conservative candidate.

1184. That has generally been the custom in your borough, has it not?—We have not had many contests in our borough.

1185. At your nomination at Warrington at the last election, was there a very large attendance of persons?—Yes, very considerable.

1186. Was it very tranquilly conducted on the whole?—It was not; I never saw one that was.

1187. How many people do you think there were present?—I should say 5,000 or 6,000.

1188. Where was it held?—It was held in a place called the Fair Ground, an open space.

1189. Was there a considerable attendance of police?—I dare say that the whole of the police that could be spared were there.

1190. Do you think that there were many people there that did not belong to the town who came from the neighbourhood?—I dare say being Monday there would be.

1191. Were you present on the hustings?—Yes, I was.

1192. Did you take any part in moving or seconding the candidates?—I did not.

1193. Did you hear the speeches?—No; I saw them, I might say, but I did not hear them.

1194. Did anybody hear them?—I should think not.

1195. Were they reported?—I believe they were.

1196. Did the speakers then address themselves almost entirely to the reporters?—Yes, they did.

1197. When the show of hands was taken was a majority declared?—The majority was declared in favour of Mr. Rylands.

1198. By such a majority that it was not disputed?—I think it was disputed; but, then, it is so difficult that it is impossible to judge; I do not think anything is to be attributed to that.

1199. Were there any skirmishes during the nomination?—There was a deal of what you call horse play, rough sort of work.

1200. Nothing further than that?—I think not.

1201. Is it your opinion that the practice of nominations

Mr. H. Bleckly.

13 April 1869.

nominations is unfavourable to the tranquillity of elections?—I think so.

1202. That is to say, bringing together a great number of both parties, they are apt to get a little excited during the day?—No doubt; I think they would be very much better dispensed with altogether.

1203. Sir George Grey.] What would you substitute for the nomination in the case of an election?—I would have at some public office the names published the same as they are at the municipal elections.

1204. Are you aware that the nomination is, in fact, the election where there is no contest?—Yes, I am aware that it is, and so it would be in this case; if there were no other person nominated the person who is nominated would be declared elected as at the municipal election.

1205. At what period would this nomination take place; the day appointed for holding the election in the borough, we will say, would be Monday, the 10th of the month, three days after the writ has been issued; when would the nomination take place?—Just as it does now; they might give three days' notice, within which the names of the candidates who were to be proposed should be left at a public office.

1206. Would you propose that the names of the candidates in the case of a borough should be left at the office within those three days now allowed by law as the period within which the election should be held?—They should.

1207. Would you allow the nomination to be made up to the last moment; in fact, to the morning of the day on which the election is to take place?—No, I think not.

1208. Then you would not give more than three days' notice?—I would give them three clear days to do it in, but it would be done by simply altering the time after the receipt of the writ.

1209. Is it not the case that now any person may be nominated on the day fixed for holding the election on the hustings and in the face of the constituency?—I believe it is.

1210. How would you publish those nominations?—I would publish them at the Town-hall or some public office; they should be posted up as other nominations of that kind.

1211. If there were no second candidate or no third candidate in the case of a place returning two Members, you would have the returning officer, as I understand you, declare the one or the two, as the case may be, duly elected?—I should.

1212. What opportunity would those candidates have of declaring before the constituency their political opinions?—They generally have an opportunity of doing so long before the election takes place; and, as a matter of fact, they do so; they issue addresses and hold meetings, and do a variety of things which enable the constituency to form an opinion as to their political views.

1213. Are those meetings generally mixed meetings or meetings of the partisans or friends of the particular candidates?—They are generally meetings of the partisans.

1214. Then what opportunity would there be given for the constituency to compare the political opinions of the two candidates, and to cross-examine them in fact?—They would have an opportunity of attending. I imagine that the circumstances would suit themselves to the law. If there were no nominations before people elected candidates, they would make an opportunity of attending somewhere and asking them questions.

1215. Is it not the case now that it is considered an uncourteous thing, when a candidate has a meeting of his own political friends, for his political opponents to come in and disturb the meeting by putting some hostile question?—If they do it in a hostile way; but if the object is fairly and honestly to ascertain a man's opinions, then I do not think there would be any objection.

1216. Do you think that if nominations were abolished, mixed public meetings of the constituents would be held, before which the several candidates might appear?—No doubt.

1217. Do not you think that those mixed meetings would be liable to the same objection as nominations: that there would be a great deal of interruption on the part of contending parties?—No, I think not.

1218. I can quite understand that meetings would be quiet meetings which are composed of the friends of the candidates; but when you get this mixed constituency in a public meeting, at which the respective candidates are to address the meeting and subject themselves to cross-examination as to their political opinions, why should not the same scenes of disorder take place at those meetings that now are alleged to take place in some cases at nominations?—In the first place, there is no object at the nomination of ascertaining any man's opinions; they are perfectly well known beforehand; nobody goes there for the purpose of learning what his opinions are; he has ascertained that beforehand.

1219. You think that the speech at the nomination has no effect upon the votes to be given?—Not the slightest.

1220. Has the nomination day generally in Warrington, in your experience, been a disorderly one?—Not when there has been no contest. I was at Liverpool at the nomination for South-West Lancashire, and although people would have been anxious to hear Mr. Gladstone, there was a general outcry on all sides, the bulk of the people could not hear; and they did not care to stand still and let the other people hear, and so they made a great noise; on such occasions few people can hear, and a very few people can make a great uproar.

1221. Mr. Villiers.] Would it be an unpopular thing to do away with the nominations?—I do not think it would. I never heard anybody who after any experience of it desired to retain the nomination day at all.

1222. Sir George Grey.] Would you abolish the day of the declaration of the poll also?—I think it is a desirable thing that there should be a public declaration of the poll.

1223. Is not that very frequently the occasion of great disorder?—No, I think not. I do not think that people care very much to attend when they know who is elected; it is generally the friends of the candidates who attend them. I have never seen any great disturbance then, excepting just when the candidates perhaps were addressing their constituents.

1224. At the time that that takes place, supposing the beaten candidate as well as the successful one attends at the declaration day, and the partisans of each candidate, does not that also lead to disorder as well as the speeches before before the nomination?—No doubt it would, but it would not be necessary that there should be any speeches after the election was over.

1225. Might not the mayor or the returning officer give public notice who was returned without making that notice public upon the hustings?—Quite so; I do not know that there is any reason why it should not be done so.

1226. Mr. Villiers.] You have stated here, have you not, that you speak the opinions of the working people upon this matter?—No, I do not know that I said so; I say that my experience with them and of them does not lead me to the opinion that they would submit to improper influences; that the tendency is in the other direction, to leave them to the free exercise of their own opinions and feelings.

1227. You are not at all aware, are you, of what their opinions are upon those matters that you have been speaking of?—I have not made much inquiry.

1228. You have never communicated with them upon the subject of open voting or the ballot?—I have not.

1229. You have stated that you thought that open voting was a protection, especially to working men?—Yes; I mean to say that it is a protection or security in respect of voters who might be exposed to being tampered with.

1230. You say that they are always outspoken as to their opinions, and their doing so is a protection for them, because nobody would want, unless for an improper purpose, to induce them to vote in a different way?—I did not say that nobody would attempt to induce them, but I say that their opinions are known in consequence of their working together, and talking together, and being in constant and daily communication with one another, and that they are not in the habit of withholding from one another their feelings and views upon public matters and persons.

1232. Is that their view of the protection, or at least is that their view of the present system of open voting, that it is a protection to them?—I have never heard them complain of the present system of open voting at all.

1233. But you have not any idea whether they will take the same view as you do with respect to open voting being a protection to them?—I do not say that it is a protection to them; I say it is a protection to the public or to other persons that those men shall vote according to their opinions, and there is a check upon them in consequence of the fact that their vote will be known, their opinions being previously known.

1234. Then you did not mean to say that open voting was any protection to the working man himself?—I do not mean to say that there is any protection to him; I do not see how he is protected, except that his opinions being known, if he were tampered with, it might be suspected that he had been so.

1235. Now that voting is open, supposing that any master became rather eager in a contest, and wished his men to vote upon the same side as himself, and he exercised that influence unduly upon one of his workmen, do we understand that the opinion of the workmen would protect that man, and would support him, if he was to be so influenced, or do you think that the working men would not yield to the influence used by the master?—I think there are a certain number of working men who would yield to that influence; I think that there are a certain number in the community who are bribeable; a certain class of men who would give way to improper influences, but that a much larger number would not do so.

1236. You do not intend to say anything against what is generally urged in favour of the ballot, that it enables a man to exercise his opinions freely?—No; I do not know that it prevents him exercising his opinion freely.

1237. Supposing him to have an opinion, it enables him to do that without any fear of molestation, either by his fellow workmen or by his master, does it not?—I do not exactly know what sort of molestation he would be subject to; I mean to say that, at the present time, such men as I am acquainted with, feel themselves able to go and give their vote in an open manner without fear of the consequences.

1238. You are now speaking, are you not, of men immediately under your own superintendence?—Men, such as I am acquainted with myself.

1239. You have heard a good deal of influences being used in former times, certainly, and I suppose yet a good deal of that exists?—I have heard of it, of course, and I have no doubt there has been; but I think it is on the decrease.

1240. The ballot might have many disadvantages; but it would have that redeeming quality, would it not, that it would enable a man to vote without fear?—It would enable a man to vote in secret, probably.

1241. But without fear?—That I do not know; because I do not think, as I said before, there would be any great difficulty in ascertaining how he voted, and if it was a case of pressure; if, as you say, the master was anxious to press him, he would equally press him then, and get a promise from him that he would vote in a certain way.

1242. How would the master know which way he had voted?—By asking him afterwards, whether he had voted or not, and which way he had voted.

1243. How would he know?—He could not know anything except from his word. If he were a corrupt man, of course he could not tell whether he would speak the truth or not; but if a man took a bribe, the chances are that he might not be altogether so bad that he would not actually redeem his promise.

1244. You state that there are in all those towns a certain number of persons who are desirous to be bribed, and another set ready, no doubt, to bribe them, and they generally seem to get together at elections?—Yes.

1245. But is it your idea that, under the operation of the ballot, the same thing would occur exactly as occurs now?—Just the same.

1246. Do you think that bribes would be given without knowing what would be the result?—I think a bribe would be given in case a man got a quid pro quo.

13 April 1869.

1247. Those bribes are generally offered at the moment of the contest, are they not?—Yes, and then that would stimulate men to do, and exert themselves to induce others to do, what was wanted.

1248. But there are several candidates sometimes in cases of contests; supposing that they all offered so much upon the result, what then?—I suppose that a man would have a preference, perhaps, for one or the other, because he got more, or something of that kind, if he were a bribeable man; I am assuming a man of a mercenary and corrupt disposition, who is quite willing to sell himself to the highest bidder.

1249. Do you think that any man would do that twice, who had offered to pay according to the result, and had been defeated; would he not cease to rely upon that mode of gaining the election?—He would not pay it if he were defeated.

1250. But he would not rely upon that mode as a means of getting the election?—I do not think you will ever get rid of that evil, which resides in the cupidity of some men, and in the desire of other people to possess power, which they will get either by fair means or foul.

1251. Practically, would not the ballot defeat that, from people not being able to do what they are inclined to do?—I do not think it would; I think if you pay a man upon success, and do not if you do not succeed, you put as much stimulus upon him as you possibly can, and you would find it answer the purpose.

1252. But where there is one seat or two seats and there are several candidates, everybody cannot succeed?—That is true.

1253. What does the disappointed man do the next time; does he offer again to pay the voters according to the results?—No doubt he would; he not having paid at all if he was defeated.

1254. How could he rely upon that system to succeed?—He would rely upon a system which takes hold of a certain mercenary and corrupt element, and that mercenary and corrupt element has to be dealt with, and he deals with it by telling it that if it will throw its weight into the scale he will gratify it, and I think that that mercenary and corrupt element would do so for the purpose of obtaining what it wanted.

1255. I am assuming that it did not succeed in a particular case, but he would not be the less liable to the law which he openly violates in that way?—No; but it would be more difficult to trace the action of anybody under those circumstances, as you shroud it in darkness.

1258. You do not think there would be any talk about it by the disappointed candidate?—That depends upon the skill with which it is done; no doubt there might be as there is now.

1259. In the case of any man who made that offer or that promise, if it was traced that he promised to bribe all those electors he would be liable to the law, and if there was anybody interested in putting it in action he would suffer the penalties of the law, would he not?—Yes; but you assume that there might be a large number of electors, but supposing that a man might secure 10 or 12 electors and they turned the election, those 10 or 12 electors could be dealt with in this way without any of it being found out, probably.

1260. It would be notorious, would it not, that those 10 or 12 had so acted?—It might.

1261. And people would suspect that they had been so dealt with?—But they would not have the means of knowing that they had been so dealt with, excepting the general suspicion that they were open to influences of an improper character.

1262. Are not many people rather anxious that those who have not yielded to this influence should be protected?—Probably that might be so.

1263. And it would be very soon detected if anything of the sort were attempted?—I doubt very much whether it would be detected except by ascertaining how they voted.

1264. Mr. William Henry Smith.] You suggested that nomination papers should be sent in for the purposes of Parliamentary elections; how would you arrange for the demand of the poll; at the present time it is open to a candidate to withdraw, unless he is prepared to incur the expense of the poll?—If certain persons were proposed and, up to the time when the returning officer should make his declaration, they did not withdraw, they would then be liable just as they are now; they would go to the poll then, and any expenses which would be incurred they would be charged with.

1265. Then you would require the consent of the candidate to the nomination, in the first instance?—Certainly.

1266. That is not necessary now, I believe?—No, I believe not.

1267. And it is not necessary with regard to municipal elections?—It is not.

1268. The expense in the case of a contest with regard to municipal elections falls upon the town, does it not?—Yes, unless the candidate chooses to incur more expenses, which he then takes upon himself.

1269. What are called the legal expenses fall upon the town, and not upon the candidate, do they not?—He need not incur any expense at all; he simply stands by.

1270. There are certain necessary expenses for taking the poll, are there not, which fall now in municipal elections upon the town?—I do not exactly know what those are.

1271. The poll clerk, for instance, and such other charges as are necessary for the taking of the poll, fall, with regard to municipal elections, upon the town or the municipality; and with regard to Parliamentary elections, upon the candidate?—They fall upon the candidate, no doubt. In municipal elections the presiding officer is an alderman, who, of course, is paid nothing; that is to say, the candidates themselves provide clerks to record the votes, as well as the municipal officer.

1272. The check clerks, in fact?—Yes; and it is generally done at the public office of the corporation; either the Town-hall or in some building building over which the corporation have control; and therefore there is no expense of that kind to the candidate.

1273. Then, as regards a Parliamentary election, it would be necesary that the candidate should first of all signify his consent at the nomination, and should enter into some bond to pay the expense of the contest?—Yes, that would be necessary.

1274. Mr. Edward Egerton.] I understand you to suggest, for the consideration of the Committee, that in cases of Parliamentary elections there should be some officer, as there is in the case of municipal elections, for the purpose of seeing that the votes are properly taken?—There should.

1275. Then, would that have rectified the mistake which took place in the Warrington case, with regard to those votes which we have heard were not tendered, where the voters merely delivered a card across a table, which you know is not voting?—In a municipal election the same thing might take place; but there a man presents a paper to the presiding alderman, and he asks him vivâ voce whether he votes for A or B.

1276. Then you would make it the duty of the officer who had to preside there that he should ask every voter how he voted?—Yes; he should ask him vivâ voce do you vote for A or B?

1278. How was it that upon this occasion there was nobody present on behalf of either of those candidates?—There was a person present on behalf of each of the candidates; but they each of them considered it enough to do that which they were asked to do, to write down how the persons voted; and they were satisfied when a man handed over his card.

1279. Did they see those men merely tender their cards, without saying anything; and did they imagine that they had voted?—They did; but then, as there had been no statutable form prescribed, and as the man enters a public office, and as the public have not provided anything to check his ignorance, it seems rather hard that the whole penalty should lie upon the voter, and that there should be no duty incumbent upon the public; that the duty of the public is merely to provide a room, and say to a man, "Go in, and do what is necessary," without saying what is necessary. It seems rather a hardship, when you have opened the door to a large number of the working class of people to give their votes, that you should leave them in the lurch when the opportunity comes that they should give their votes.

1280. Is it not the fact that this mistake was not discovered till the following morning when the votes were all cast up by the returning officer?—It happened to be discovered that night, but it was contrary to law for them to have opened the books then; but in that respect there seems a slackness on the part of the law in providing a proper check.

1281. But the impression prevailed, did it not, for several hours, that Mr. Greenall was returned as the Member?—Yes, it did.

1282. What was the difference in the votes, do you remember?—I think he was defeated by about 27, and the apparent majority that he had was something like 40.

1283. I think you told us that you are a very considerable employer of labour; have you had an opportunity of knowing the opinions generally of your workmen?—I come daily in contact with them.

1284. Have you heard them state their feelings and say that they are anxious for the ballot?—I have not.

1286. At the last election for Lancashire, did it turn very much upon the question of the ballot?—I do not think it did at all.

1287. Was it ever mentioned?—I think not; we never had any discussion about it that I know of.

1288. Mr. Locke.] In polling, are not two questions asked by the poll clerk at the Parliamentary elections, first, "What is your name?" Is not it the duty of the poll clerk to ask that question?—I am not quite sure whether it is or not, but at any rate in this case it was not done.

1289. And then the next question is, "For whom did you vote"?—I do not think that those are required in the Act of Parliament.

1290. It is not at all required, is it, that the voter should have any card at all?—It is not.

1291. The system of using cards is merely adopted by the candidates for the convenience of their supporters?—Yes; but it is a most convenient thing, because in an extensive register a man appears, and if he brought no card with him, the authorities would have a right to say to him, "What is your number?"

1292. Does not it sometimes occur that the poll clerk will not receive the vote unless the man does produce a card?—I have not known it so.

1293. It is grown now into a system, is it not, for the voter always to produce a card, and the poll clerk, as a matter of course, looks at the card before he goes on to take his name down?—Yes, he looks at the number on the register, and upon the card is the same number as there is upon the register, and it enables him to refer to the register and strike out the man's name as having tendered his vote.

1294. Of course the production of a card which always has the number upon it, enables the poll clerk at once to find out what the man's name is?—That is so.

1295. But, whether or not, it is absolutely necessary for him to ask those questions, "What is your name?" and "For whom did you vote?" You think it is not?—I can only say that, in voting myself at the time of the election, they did not ask me that question.

1296. Then there are two other questions, "Are you the same person whose name appears as A B on the register of voters now in force for the county of So-and-so, or for the city, as the case may be"?—I think those questions are questions which may be put, but it is not obligatory upon the poll clerk to put them.

1297. And also, "Have you already voted either here or elsewhere at this election"?—That question can be put upon the requisition of any person who is there.

1298. That is put throughout the election?—That is so.

1299. But you do not know whether in this case those questions were put?—I believe none of them were put upon this occasion.

Mr. H. Bleckly.

13 April 1869.

1300. Not any question at all?—None whatever.

1301. Not the question, "For whom do you vote?"—No; not in the case of this particular petitioner.

1302. And you would suggest that it should be compulsory upon the poll clerk to ask some such question as that of the voter?—I would; and moreover than that, that he should be compelled to produce a card, and that that card should be filed just the same as a banker files cheques that are presented to him over his counter, and that this card should then be compared by some independent person with the poll-book, so that it might be seen that the poll-clerk has not tampered with the votes at all.

1303. You have been asked whether you have paid any attention, or read any pamphlets, on the subject of the ballot; have you ever read a speech that was made by Mr. Childers, some few years back, in the House of Commons, describing the mode of election in Australia?—I do not recollect reading it.

1304. Has not that been sent to you as a pamphlet?—I dare say it may have been, but I do not read gratuitously-distributed pamphlets as a matter of choice.

1305. With reference to the check clerks, you say that the check clerks, upon this occasion, took no notice of the irregularity that was going on?—They did not know that there was any irregularity. They did not know that this man did not write down the name, or that it would be irregular for him to put the card in his pocket, and enter it afterwards after the voter had left.

1306. They were a very extraordinary sort of check clerks, were they not, if they did not know what ought to be done at all at the election?—Yes, they were, no doubt.

1307. The poll clerks, the check clerks, and the deputy returning officer, were all persons absolutely ignorant of the duties which they had to perform?—I think the facts prove that they were so.

1309. As I understand you, the fault lies with the returning officer?—The returning officer had the appointment, but in this particular case the returning officer only came into office a very few days before the election, and therefore he had not had an opportunity of making such inquiries respecting the poll clerks as might be necessary, and, in fact, one whom he had appointed was taken ill, and not able to come as agreed to.

1310. In point of fact this was a very special case, was it not?—It was a special case.

1311. You never knew anything of that sort occur before?—No; only it shows where the system is vulnerable, and hereafter it may be that this, which is an accident on this occasion, may become systematic unless Parliament interferes.

1312. Mr. Graves.] Do you happen to know the number of voters on the Parliamentary list, and also on the municipal list at Warrington?—The number of voters on the Parliamentary list, I think, was between 4,000 and 5,000, and on the municipal register somewhere about the same, I think, but I am not quite sure now.

1313. Have you known many instances of the personation of voters at the Parliamentary elections?—Not many; there have been some alleged, I believe, but I do not think there have been any proved.

1314. There has been no conviction of personation within your knowledge?—No.

1315. Does that arise from want of proof, or from the machinery of the Act being so cumbrous in Parliamentary elections?—I hardly know how to answer that question.

1316. Am I correct in supposing that it is your belief and opinion that if voters were corruptly inclined there is greater inducement, under a secret mode of voting than under a public mode of voting, to corrupt those voters?—I think so.

1317. Mr. James.] You are anxious that there should be protection against the possibility of the poll clerk tampering with the taking of the poll; have you known any instance occur where there has been ever a suspicion even of the poll clerk tampering with the poll?—I do not remember.

1318. In this case it is not suggested that the mistake arose from any mala fides, but from want of competence in the poll clerk?—There is no imputation of mala fides upon the poll clerk, but it was a want of competence.

1319. You suggest that if the ballot existed there would be bribery by means of promises dependent upon success?—Yes.

1320. What guarantee would the voter have that the promise of the bribe would be kept?—A general reliance upon the person who made the promise.

1321. To have that reliance he must know the person, and know that he was trustworthy, must he not?—No doubt the candidate would employ a person whom he did know; such a person would be likely to influence the voter, and to deal with him confidentially.

1322. And upon whose word the voter would rely?—No doubt.

1323. Do you think you would find a trustworthy person, a person so respectable that the voter would rely upon him?—I do not think there would be any difficulty; I say that a man would be sufficiently trusted to induce a certain number of persons within his range of influence; he might only have six persons that he could influence, but that he could get six persons by promising them something dependent upon success.

1324. Probably he would have to employ several bribers instead of one; now who could pay the money at the time of the bribe?—I am not acquainted with the mode in which bribery is carried carried on now; I do not know whether they employ one or more persons, or any number.

1325. What guarantee has the person who pays the money, that the voter whom he pays will vote for him?—You simply make it the man's interest to do so, and by making it his interest you secure his efforts.

1326. Then take the case of the voter; what guarantee has the person who pays the money that the voter has voted for him?—He would have no other guarantee than that he has succeeded in getting that which he wanted to get; and he may credit the elector with having done what he promised to do.

1328. Take the case of two candidates, and that both of them promised a hundred men 5 l. a piece if they succeeded, the voter will promise both, and whichever succeeds, he will go to him and say, "I voted for you," when he really has not, and therefore the successful candidate will be paying a person who has not voted for him?—Yes.

1329. Would not that be the purchase of the whole borough?—I am not assuming that this would extend throughout the borough. I am assuming that there are only a certain number of bribable persons, and that certain number may be sufficient to turn the election, and that they may be induced to accept bribes under such promises.

1330. A dishonest person, who is bribable, would promise both, and in any event get money from the person wo succeeded whether he voted for him or not?—Yes, there might be a number who would do that.

1331. Would there not be an increased risk to the person bribing in the event of detection from his making the promise, and also making the payment?—I think not, because the promise may be made to depend upon a certain event in the future.

1332. That would be an offence as it is now?—Yes, it would be an offence.

1333. Then he would have to pay after the election, and that would be another offence?—Yes.

1334. Would not there be double risk of detection?—I think not; you can only present a petition to Parliament against a member's return within 21 days of the election.

1335. Do you not know that you can present it now within 28 days after the fact of payment?—I am not aware of that.

1336. If he pays three years after the election, within 28 days of the act of payment, a petition may be presented?—I am not aware that that would make much difference.

1337. It might make some difference?—Yes, it might make some.

1338. Mr. Dalglish.] Do you suggest that each voter should be provided with a ticket?—I do.

1339. Who would provide the voters with tickets?—The candidates.

1340. Supposing there are two candidates, A and B, and the voter, a rather ignorant man, intends to vote for B, he goes up with his ticket, and the ticket is deposited, and he believes he gives his vote for B, how would you check the poll?—He would be asked by the poll clerk, or by the deputy returning officer whether he voted for A or B, according to the card he produced.

1341. Supposing he produced a card for B, and said he voted for A, how would you set that right?—The poll clerk would send him back again to get a card for A.

1342. If the poll clerk takes the card, and he asks the man how he votes, and he does not look particularly at the card, and if he votes for A, giving the B card, do you propose that this card should check the poll book?—I do.

1343. How would that be a check?—If the poll clerk took the card for A and recorded the vote for B, of course they would not check one another, but then I should object to the poll clerk doing that. If it was obligatory upon him to have a card, corresponding with the vote which the man gave up, that would be a thing which could be openly and publicly checked.

1345. But in the middle of the day, would it not be double duty?—There is no need for it to be; if you only get 500 persons at each booth, there could be no great difficulty in recording 500 votes during the day.

1346. Mr. Leatham.] Did you take an active part in the last election at Warrington?—I did not take a very active part in the election, having been mayor up to the end of the municipal year; I had not taken any part in the election, as the period was so short; I did not think it desirable that I should do so.

1347. Or subsequently, with regard to the petition?—No.

1348. Are you not aware that intimidation was one of the things charged by the petitioners?—I daresay it might; but I fancy that those petitions are got up rather in general terms, and things are included that may turn up afterwards without any definite facts being before the person who draws the petition.

1349. When was the last contest before this for the borough?—I should think 15 years ago at least.

1350. Can you remember the exact year?—I cannot.

1351. Was it in 1857?—No, it was before that; I think it was nearly 20 years since.

1352. You spoke of most of the keepers of the public-houses having voted for Mr. Greenall?—I think so; I should say the majority of them.

1353. Would it be a large majority of them?—Yes, I should think so.

1354. Who is the great brewer in Warrington?—There are two large brewers; one is Greenall & Co., and the other is Walker & Co.

1355. You do not connect the fact of Messrs. Greenall & Co. being large brewers in Warrington, with the fact of so many public-houses voting for Mr. Greenall?—I have no doubt that the persons who live in those houses find him a very good landlord, and on that account would all be very likely to record their votes in his favour, he being a man of moderate politics.

1356. Mr. Brand.] How many voters are there in the Parliamentary borough of Warrington?—Somewhere between 4,000 and 5,000.

1357. Do you think that that corresponds exactly

13 April 1869.

exactly with the number of municipal voters?—I could not say that exactly, because I have not looked at the figures; but I should suppose that it would be somewhere thereabouts.

1358. Are the population of Warrington generally skilled artizans?—There are a large number of artizans.

1359. A well-to-do class, in fact?—Yes.

1360. And not a dependent class?—I do not know how to answer that question exactly.

1361. What rate of wages do they get?—They get good wages.

1362. Could you state the rate of wages given?—I do not know; our men on the average will certainly earn more than a pound a week.

1363. Generally speaking, are the working men in Warrington receiving good wages?—They are receiving fair wages.

1364. There are not many dependent voters in that borough?—I hardly know what you mean by dependent; they are not in such a sense dependent that they would do what would be discreditable for them to do at the wish of anybody.

1365. What proportion do you suppose are bribable?—I should think only a very small proportion.

1366. Would you say one-tenth?—It is difficult to say; but I should think that you would find that there would be at least one-tenth of them that are bribable.

1368. Supposing you sent that card by post in a constituency of upwards of 17,000, are you aware that that would cost 73 l.?—Yes; I am aware that it comes to a large sum.

1369. Then there would be the printing of the cards, and folding it up, and the number of people employed in doing it; could the candidate get off for less than 200 l. for doing it?—I am not aware of the exact figure, but then I would relieve him of a certain portion of the other expense which now falls upon him.

1370. Mr. Cross.] Do you believe that at the last election there was, either on behalf of one party or of the other, any bribery, or treating, or opening of public-houses?—I do not believe that on the part of the main actors in the election, or with their consent, there was any such thing.

1371. Neither bribery, nor treating, nor opening of public-houses?—No, not on the part of those who had direct influence and responsibility with reference to the election.

1372. Mr. Bright.] If there was such an allegation made in the petition which has been referred to this Committee, that allegation is, in your opinion, false?—I certainly should not be justified myself in saying that it was false; but I should say that my own opinion is to the contrary. There might have been something within the knowledge of the person who drew that petition, but to my own knowledge I do not believe that there was anything of the kind.

1373. Mr. Villiers.] Did anything of that kind come before the judge?—No, nothing.

1374. Mr. Staveley Hill.] Was there any proposal made to proceed upon that allegation of corrupt practices as far as you know?—There was a statement made that a Commission was to be applied for, but it was evidently a mere brutum fulmen not intended to be carried out.

1375. Mr. Cross.] It is perfectly well known, is it not, that the modes of voting in Parliamentary, and in municipal, and in board of guardian elections are all three different?—They are all different.

1376. In the municipal election they vote by voting papers personally delivered?—Yes.

1377. Do you not think that the fact of those people having been in the habit of voting at the municipal elections under the old franchise rather tended to this mistake at Warrington with reference to presenting their cards and then considering that they had voted?—I think it did.

Mr. Alderman Robert Addyman, called in; and Examined.

Mr. Alderman R. Addyman.

1378. Chairman.] Do you hold any office in the Borough of Leeds?—I am an Alderman of the Borough of Leeds.

1379. Have you filled that office for some time?—No, only since last November when I was elected an Alderman; I had been previously eight or nine years in the Council.

1380. Can you tell the Committee the number of wards in the borough?—Twelve.

1381. And the number of voters?—I think about 40,000 municipal and Parliamentary; they are just about the same number now.

1382. What is the number of councillors and aldermen?—There are 64 aldermen and councillors; 48 councillors and 16 aldermen.

1383. How many are elected at each election?—There is one-third of the councillors elected every year with the exception of the aldermen, who are elected one-half of them every three years; eight go out every three years and the other eight elected.

1385. Do they prevail now?—They did at the last election.

1386. Of what nature were those corrupt practices?—In the nature of treating, and bribing with money also.

1387. Was there any intimidation?—There was intimidation to some extent, I have no doubt, but I do not think it prevailed very extensively.

1388. Treating and bribery you consider the chief evils?—I do.

1389. Are those facts notorious, or have you any special knowledge of them?—They are very notorious throughout the borough, because they have been practised so openly.

1390. Do they prevail in each ward or are they more prevalent in some than in others?—They only prevail in certain wards. There are some wards, I believe, quite free from corruption, or at all events they are reputed to be so.

1391. Has any attempt been made to check those practices?—Yes, we have made an attempt as private individuals. The first attempt was made by the Reform Registration Association. Bribery and corruption existed to so great an extent that it became a public scandal almost, and we felt that we ought to purge ourselves of the evil, and if possible to blot it out; and the first effort was made by the members of the Reform Registration Association.

1392. When?—In the year 1865. At that time we obtained a conviction against a member of our body, a councillor. We took him to the county court, and we had him convicted in a penalty of 40 s.; and we were under the impression at that time that he would be disqualified to sit at the council afterwards, at all events for six years; but we found ourselves very much mistaken, for he simply paid his fine and took his place as usual amongst us, and he is there now.

1393. But does not the law enact that, on conviction, he should not do so?—We thought the law did; but when we took a legal opinion, through our town clerk, we found that the law was practically inoperative there; and that, although we had obtained a conviction in the county court, the man could still sit as a member of the corporation.

1394. Was that the end of it?—That was the end of it.

1395. Has any subsequent attempt been made to unseat him?—No, but afterwards instead of checking bribery and corruption, this man's triumph over those who had tried to convict him and turn him out of the corporation, I think, had a tendency rather to increase the evil, and it again became so notorious, that, in 1866, Mr. Alderman Carter, one of the respected Members for Leeds, moved in the council that a committee be appointed to inquire into the corrupt practices said to exist at that time. A committee was appointed, and I have handed to the noble Chairman the result of the investigations of that committee. Of course the evidence which we have there is of a very slender character, because the evidence was voluntary. We advertised through local papers for persons to come and volunteer any evidence they could afford as to the corrupt practices that were said to exist.

1396. Can you state shortly what was the character of the evidence which you collected?—The character of the evidence which we collected was that a certain amount per head had been paid for votes, and that public houses had been opened, and drinking had gone on to a very great extent.

1398. Did you make any report to the council?—We did not. The evidence that you have on your table was read by many members of the council; that was the only mode they had of getting to know the result of our labours.

1399. Did you draw up a petition to the House of Commons?—We did.

1400. That petition was not presented, I believe?—It was. You will find that petition which we drew up in the book that you have upon your table.

1401–2. That was the end of the second attempt?—Yes, that was the end of the second attempt.

1403. Within your recollection, there has been only one attempt to put the existing law in force?—There has been only one attempt.

1404. You sued for the penalty of 40 s. against a member of the town council?—We took this member of our town council into the county court, believing that we should have a perfect remedy there; but the only thing we got was the conviction and the penalty of 40 s., and he still retains his seat, very much to our annoyance.

1405. But could you not then have instituted a criminal prosecution against him?—So we could; but we found that the expenses were very great. We had already incurred a cost of, I think, some 200 l., which was done by individual effort, and that was a thing which we did not like to repeat very often in consequence of the cost.

1406. Mr. Bright.] How did it cost you 200 l. for taking the man into the county court?—It cost us 200 l. in this way: we had a good deal of trouble in collecting evidence, and we had to employ legal gentlemen of undoubted standing, and their bill was something very terrific.

1407. Do you recommend any alteration in the law?—I should like to see an alteration in the law if it would prevent bribery and corruption.

1408. But does your experience lead you to think that it is difficult, or almost impossible, to put the law as it stands into operation for the purpose of checking bribery?—I think that it is so.

1409. Have you considered what alteration would make the law effective?—Yes; I have thought that if men could record their votes privately, or by ballot if you like, that might be a check to bribery and corruption.

1410. But have you considered whether any alteration in the law for the punishment of bribery at those elections would be effective?—I think that the punishment ought to be three months if you like, in the House of Correction, instead of a 40 s. fine. I think that that would be more effective than a fine: a fine means nothing.

1411. Could any system be devised by which it would be less difficult and expensive to institute prosecutions for bribery?—That I am not aware of. If we put the law into operation at all, we find it very expensive to work in the way we went about it.

1412. In your opinion, does the system of secret voting offer the only probability of any remedy for this state of things?—I think so; I should recommend making bribery or corruption of any kind penal, making it beyond a fine, making it so that a man dare not risk it.

1413. But would anyone be found at this heavy expense to put the law in operation, if the consequences were more serious to the offender on conviction?—I suppose that the matter of expense would be a consideration then as it has been previously. If the law could be simplified, making the process less costly, I think it would be put in operation more frequently.

1414. Was it because the result was unsatisfactory, or because the expense was so heavy, that no subsequent attempt has been made to put the present law into force?—I think both. The results were unsatisfactory, and we found that the expenses were heavy, and therefore both considerations operated upon our minds.

1415. In what way was the result unsatisfactory?—Because we did not purge ourselves of the member of our body who had been guilty of the act of bribery after we had proved it.

1416. Would not further proceedings have enabled you to purge yourselves of that member?—Yes.

1417. Why were those further proceedings not taken?—In consequence of the cost.

1418. Are the elections conducted tranquilly at Leeds?—Upon the whole they are, but sometimes there are disturbances; an extra body of police have had to be called out to preserve order.

1419. Is that in consequence of the treating which prevails?—No doubt of it.

1420. Are you in favour of closing the public-houses on the election day?—If necessary, I would not have any public-house influence at all.

1421. Do you think that the public opinion in Leeds would be in favour of such closing?—I do.

1422. Have you any objection to applying the present system of voting at the municipal elections by means of voting papers to the Parliamentary elections?—No, I do not know that I have any objection to voting papers as employed at present.

1423. The evidence which you collected has not shewn you that they are tampered with?—Not to any serious extent. I believe that they have occasionally been tampered with. For instance, a man has gone into a committee-room instead of going into the polling booth, and tendered his voting paper, and he has frequently had it altered and put into his hands again, and then gone into the polling booth and presented it, but his vote has had a very different result to what he intended it. There is no doubt that that has been done.

1424. Have you ever known vexatious nominations made?—Frequently.

1425. For what purpose?—I do not know, except that the publicans sometimes have made a nomination in order to get up excitement in the ward, so that they might benefit by the sale of their drink; that has been frequently done.

1426. Any voter can now send for a nomination paper, can he not, and nominate a candidate?—Any burgess can.

1427. Would you alter the law in that respect?—I do not know whether I should be prepared to alter it in that respect or not.

1428. Would you see any objection to making the consent of the candidate necessary?—I would make it with the consent of the candidate; I would not permit anybody to nominate a gentleman without his consent.

1429. Have you any other suggestion which you desire to make with regard to the municipal elections?—I do not know that I have.

1430. Without some change in the law, you have no hope of checking the present malpractices?—I have not.

1431. Although to a great extent in the borough of Leeds there is a strong desire on the part of the inhabitants that a check should be put to the present malpractices?—That desire exists very strongly on the part of every respectable man in the borough, whether of one political shade or the other; I think that both parties are equally anxious to blot out bribery and corruption, except those who benefit by it.

1432. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] You say that some wards are free from corruption; are those the higher class of voters, or is it where the political feeling runs very much one way?—It is where the more respectable class of inhabitants reside; men who are above bribery and corruption.

1433. There is a good deal of party feeling in Leeds in the different wards, is there not?—Yes.

1434. How long ago is it since you had this prosecution?—It was in 1865.

1435. Then there has been no new election with respect to that member of the council of whom you spoke since that time?—Yes, I believe there has; he has been re-elected since that time.

1436. You say that it is very notorious that bribery has taken place at many of those elections?—Yes, it is.

1437. Do you find that the people who are known or suspected to be guilty, lose character at all in Leeds?—I think they have no character to lose in the first place.

1438. Do they lose position?—I do not think they do; they move in a certain class, and they seem to be held up amongst their own body rather than to suffer the loss of position.

1439. You have only had, as I understand, this one prosecution for corrupt practice, but you have had several prosecutions in Leeds, have you not, for other offences against the election laws; for personation, for instance?—Yes; I am aware that there have been prosecutions for personation; but I do not think that much good resulted from it.

1440. Were there not a great many prosecutions at one time connected with either municipal elections or the election of guardians?—Not many prosecutions I think, but there have been a good many inquiries.

1441. My impression was that there had been some prosecutions for personation before the Reform Bill?—There may have been, but I cannot speak of my own knowledge.

1442. You say that the papers of some voters have been altered, is that from their being unable to read and write, or from drunkenness, or what?—From their being unable to read and write I should think in most instances. A man goes into the wrong committee-room and presents his paper, it is then altered, and he goes and presents it.

1443. That might happen, might it not, in case he was going to be a Parliamentary voter if voting papers were used?—It might; it depends upon the machinery that is put in force.

1444. Mr. William Henry Smith.] Are you acquainted with the mode in which the elections for for the boards of guardians are conducted?—I am, because I happen to be a member of the board of guardians myself.

1445. A constable, I believe, delivers the papers?—No, not necessarily a constable; certainly not.

1446. But does not a public officer do it?—Men are employed to deliver the papers and also to collect them, but they are not constables.

1447. Are you aware whether any irregularity whatever has occurred in connection with the election to boards of guardians under that system?—I know that some years ago irregularities have occurred.

1448. In the shape of bribery, or what?—No; by the papers being tampered with; for instance, the man who collects them, if he is a political partisan, could burn a lot of them and never deliver them at all.

1449. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] There was a Poor Law inquiry at one time upon that very point, was there not?—I believe there was, but I do not recollect the circumstances of it.

1450. Mr. Edward Egerton.] I understood you to state that there is a strong feeling in Leeds upon the subject of this corruption?—So there is.

1451. How do you reconcile that with the fact of this gentleman, of whom you have spoken, being re-elected a member of the council?—Simply because a great number of the burgesses that he represents are as corrupt as ever, and he has used, no doubt, the same influences as those that put him in, in the first instance.

1452. Are you acquainted with the provisions of the Municipal Corporation Act with regard to proceedings for bribery?—Yes.

1453. Has it ever occurred to the town council to put them in force against anybody?—The town council were advised that, as a public body, they have no means by which they can enter proceedings against a member of their own body.

1454. They would prosecute cases against the law, would they not?—They have not done so, so far as bribery and corruption are concerned.

1455. In other cases they do, do they not?—In other cases I suppose they do; for instance, a man brought up for selling bad meat, or anything of that sort, or any contravention of the bye-laws of the council, they would prosecute.

1456. Have they not a prosecution officer?—They have not.

1457. You say that 200 l. was the amount of the expenses of this county court case; can you give us any idea of how that was got at?—Legal charges, I believe, formed the bulk of it.

1458. Are you speaking accurately now?—I am speaking as accurately as I can, because I had to pay my share of it, and therefore I have some knowledge of it.

1459. You state deliberately that 200 l. was the cost of one single county court suit?—To the best of my belief that was about the amount; of course I do not confine myself to the exact figures, but it is pretty near that sum; it may be a little over or a little under.

1460. Mr. Locke.] Could you have proceeded before the magistrates for that bribery?—No, we could not; we were told that we must either go before the county court judge or take it to a higher court.

1461. What do you mean by a higher court?—We could have taken it to the assizes, or perhaps the quarter sessions, and have gone in for a conviction of 50 l.; and if we had succeeded that man would have been disqualified for six years; and, in fact, he would have been politically dead for that period.

1462. Then you might have proceeded against him for bribery in the Criminal Court?—We might; we had the option of two courses, and we took what we believed to be the least expensive, and it proved inoperative.

1463. And the most expensive also?—I do not know; we did not try the other court; it might have been more expensive.

1464. It is the 11th section, is it not, of the 22 Vict. c. 35, which provides that "if any person at any election for mayor, councillor, auditor, or assessor in a borough shall be guilty of bribery, he shall for every such offence forfeit the sum of 40 s. to any person who shall sue for the same in the county court, with the full costs of the suit"?—That is so.

1465. And that does not provide for any other remedy than the county court?—No, it does not; and the only penalty attached is the fine; there is no subsequent penalty; no disqualification; at least we found it so in our case.

1466. Mr. Cross.] You say that you would not have any person nominated without his consent for the office of town councillor; but are you not aware that under the Municipal Act a man, if he is elected, is bound to serve?—Yes, I am quite aware of that; or he must pay a fine.

1467. You would not like to do away with that, would you?—Yes, I should; I do not see why a man should be nominated against his will, and create turmoil in a ward when he is not anxious to do so.

1468. You do not see any reason why you should keep up the fine if a man refuses to serve if he is elected?—No, I do not think there is any reason for it; we have always plenty of gentlemen to serve, if they could go in honestly and fairly, without resorting to the present corrupt practices.

1469. Mr. Graves.] Do you consider that corrupt practices were more general at the last election than at previous ones?—They were more glaring at the last election; more apparent, at all events.

1470. Is it your opinion that corrupt practices have increased with the extension of the franchise?—I am not prepared to say that; the municipal election just took place before the Parliamentary election; therefore it could not have increased in consequence of that.

1471. You have given it, I think, as your opinion that the ballot would to some extent check those corrupt practices; will you give to the Committee the benefit of your reasons for that statement?—I think if a man could record his vote honestly and conscientiously without its being known how he voted, it would be no use bribing that man at all.

1472. Has it occurred to you that if he was corruptly inclined he would under the secret voting system have two opportunities in place of one?—Yes; perhaps the man who voted might have two opportunities, but I think the man who gave the bribe under such circumstances would be extremely foolish, because he could not tell how it would operate, whether for or against him.

1473. Does intimidation extensively prevail in Leeds?—I am not aware of my own knowledge that it does. I know that some little pressure is occasionally put on, but not extensively so.

Mr. Alderman R. Addyman.

13 April 1869.

1474. From what you know of the working classes of Leeds, do you consider that an attempt at intimidation on the part of an employer would be more likely to conduce to resistance to the wishes of the employer, or to the agreeing with him?—In some instances I believe it would have a contrary effect to what the employer intended; it would operate against him.

1475. Mr. Fawcett.] You spoke just now of fictitious nominations; do you think that that would be prevented by subjecting the parties who were responsible for them to a pecuniary fine?—I think they would be more careful about doing it.

1476. Has it occurred to you that the proper fine to impose upon them would be to render them responsible for some share of the expenses, when they got up a fictitious contest?—I think if the expenses did fall upon them we should have very few fictitious nominations.

1477. Mr. Dalglish.] Did the councillor who was convicted and fined 40 s., pay the cost of the suit?—He paid his own costs, but not ours; he simply paid the costs of the court.

1478. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You are aware, are you not, that the Act of Parliament says that the costs of suit are to follow the event?—Yes; but we had incurred a great many costs which we could not recover in the county court.

1479. Mr. Locke.] He paid the taxed costs?—Yes.

1480. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] To what reasons do you attribute the corruption in the municipal elections at Leeds?—That is a difficult question to answer. I think some men desire to have power and influence who can only get it by that mode; they have not moral influence enough to get it without resorting to their pockets.

1481. Are they men in a low position that are anxious to get into the municipal council?—Not generally; but some are in good positions, but without standing as men of the highest character; and I think they want to get into the council to mend their position and influence.

1482. Have politics anything to do with the municipal elections at Leeds?—Yes, beyond all doubt.

1483. Do they vote as Conservatives and Liberals for one candidate or the other?—They do not in all cases; but all the contests have a political complexion one way or the other; they are generally Whig and Tory against each other.

1484. They do not elect a man simply because he would be a useful town councillor, but because he is a Conservative or Liberal, is that so?—They, perhaps, take both things into account; they take his political views, and also his moral worth, and whether they think that he will be useful.

1485. Is that the case in all the wards?—No, I am sorry to say it is not.

1486. In those wards where corruption is prevalent, is it the case that politics are more taken into account than in those where it is not?—It is a political contest purely where corruption takes place; one party buys against the other.

1487. Then I suppose they buy with an ultimate view to the Parliamentary election?—I do not know that they do that. I should think it is only for the immediate advantage of getting into the corporation.

1488. Has the preponderance of the one party or the other in the corporation anything to do with the Parliamentary elections?—It may influence them to some extent. Our corporation is decidedly a Liberal corporation. I am speaking now politically.

1489. Do you attribute the corruption in the municipal elections at Leeds at all to the fact that politics have something to do with it?—In some measure, no doubt.

1490. But not altogether?—I do not think so, altogether.

1492. The bribery at the municipal had, in your opinion, no bearing directly or indirectly on the Parliamentary elections?—I should say not in Leeds.

1493. Have you considered the provision of the 22nd of Vict. c. 35, which has been referred to to-day with regard to prosecution?—Yes, I have.

1496. Do you think that if that provision were extended to bribery, facilities would be given for convicting persons guilty of bribery?—I do. It is my opinion that if that machinery could be put in motion cheaply it would do.

1497. Do you think that there would be much difficulty in obtaining evidence of bribery in Leeds and obtaining a conviction upon clear evidence before two or more local justices?—In our experience we find that there is a great deal of difficulty in obtaining evidence about bribery; the bribers do not like to commit themselves, nor do those who have received bribes; it takes a great deal of trouble arriving at it.

1498. Do you think that any alteration of the law would facilitate getting evidence?—I do not think any alteration of the law would; still we could get at the major part of the facts.

1499. Mr. Bright.] You recommend certain alterations alterations in the present state of the law with regard to the punishment of those offences; would you rely entirely upon punishment, or have you any view with regard to prevention?—Prevention would be better than cure, and if you could surround the voter by such circumstances that he could record his vote freely, according to his own conscience, without fear of intimidation, I think that would be the best thing to do.

1500. I understood you to say that you had no objection to the mode of voting by papers, as in the case of your municipal elections; did you mean to say from that, that you thought that a better mode than the mode of the ballot?—No, not by any means; the ballot would be the best mode in my judgment.

1501. Have you had any opportunity of seeing anything of the mode of conducting election by ballot?—I have not.

1502. Is the opinion extensive, or general, or growing amongst the electors of your borough, so far as you know, in favour of an alteration in the mode of voting?—So far as I know, it is, decidedly.

1503. Have you had any opportunity of knowing whether amongst those who are your political opponents, and who generally have been deemed to be in favour of open voting, there has been any change of opinion?—I believe that amongst the respectable portion of them, they are so disgusted at the bribery and corruption which exists, that they are desirous that some alteration should be made; I have heard many of those who are politically opposed to me express their feeling that the ballot would be a good thing.

1504. During your recent Parliamentary contest, was the subject of the ballot one that was frequently discussed by the candidates at their meetings?—At every meeting that I attended, it certainly formed a part of the discussion that went on.

1505. But, with regard to the municipal elections, have you heard it spoken of as likely to be a remedy for any of the evils complained of?—Yes; I have heard it spoken of as one of the remedies that would be desirable.

1506. You know that the ballot has been generally considered rather as a political than a municipal question?—Yes, it has.

1507. Confining your answer to the case of municipal elections, do you think the opinion prevails that it would be advantageous in those as well as in Parliamentary elections?—I think it does prevail.

1508. Were you present at your last nomination at Leeds?—Yes, I was.

1509. Were there a great many people there?—I should think 30,000 or 40,000 people.

1510. Was it held on Woodhouse Moor?—It was.

1511. Did the candidates and their friends make long speeches?—No; we tied them down to a quarter of an hour each, or else they would have made long speeches, no doubt.

1512. Have your nominations generally been periods of great tranquillity when there was an opportunity for a full discussion of political questions?—I have never seen a disturbance at a Parliamentary nomination in our town, I am happy to say.

1513. There is a great space on Woodhouse Moor, is there not; there is room enough for all that come?—It is about 50 or 60 acres, I think.

1514. Is the meeting generally so tranquil that the candidates can be well heard?—They can be distinctly heard. There may be moments during the time that a gentleman is speaking when a little disturbance may take place; but as a rule they can be heard throughout the whole of the audience, I should think.

1515. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] It is the only town almost in the West Riding, is it not, which has a quiet nomination?—I cannot speak for other towns. We do hear of disturbances elsewhere; but I am glad to say we can keep quiet.

1516. And it used to be so, did it not, when you used to meet in the Cloth Hall Yard?—Yes, ever since I have known it; there used sometimes to be a little tumult, but nothing of a malicious character.

1517. Mr. Bright.] Do the publicans exercise great influence in your municipal contests?—They do, unfortunately.

1518. Do they exercise an overwhelming influence in some of the wards?—I have no doubt that they do.

1519. And are many of them returned to the corporation?—Not many; I think we have two of that class amongst us now.

1520. Do you think that the closing of the public-houses during the day of the election, speaking of the municipal elections as well as the Parliamentary, would tend to promote purity and tranquillity of election?—I am certain of it.

1521. Setting aside the publicans, do you suppose that if Parliament were to entertain that question, it would generally meet with support from the population of your town?—I feel satisfied of it. I think every right-minded man would give it his hearty support. I do not speak now as a teetotaller, because I am not one.

1522. We know, of course, that in Leeds there are a great many persons who differ in their political views from you; but taking the whole of what are called the respectable classes of society, amongst the working men as well as others, do you believe that they would rather favour such a proposition as that?—I am sure they would; and amongst the working men especially (I speak it to their credit), it is only a small class that would be opposed to it; men who benefit by this drinking and corruption.

1523. Is there any mode now, by which your municipality can turn a man out of his seat for corruption or bribery, in the way that the House of Commons can get rid of a Member if he has been proved to be guilty of those offences?—There is no mode that I know of; we have tried to do it and failed signally.

1524. You have tried it by a lawsuit?—Yes, we have no other mode.

1525. The municipal council have no mode by which they can appoint a committee to try the case and expel a guilty member?—We have no power of that sort that I am aware of.

1526. Nothing analogous to the power of Parliament?—No, nothing of that kind.

1527. You would, therefore, as I understood you, recommend measures that would make the law more easy to be put in force for punishment, and at the same time you think that the adoption of the mode of secret voting would be very favourable to purity, both in the municipal and the Parliamentary elections; am I right in gathering that to be your evidence?—That is my opinion.

1528. Chairman.] Do I understand you to say

you would desire that there should be some such power of presenting a petition to invalidate the return of a town councillor who had obtained his seat, by corrupt means as exist in the Parliamentary elections?—I think it is very desirable that there should be.

1529. Have you at all considered that part of the subject?—No, not specially.

1530. Before what tribunal would you have such a petition heard?—I would not mind if it were heard before two of the sitting borough justices. I think the clause pointed out by the right honourable Member seems to meet my views of the case. I think they would be most likely to judge impartially.

1531. Can you tell the Committee what sort of amount is generally paid at those contests?—I have heard it variously estimated from 100 l. to more than 1,000 l.

1532. Do you mean that that is the total cost to one side?—To one side.

1533. What has been the amount of the bribes that are given?—The bribes have varied from 1 s. up to 1 l., or something more than that. Of course I only state this from hearsay. I do not know it of my own knowledge.

1534. But, I presume that you have read the evidence which was collected by your committee?—Yes.

1535. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] With respect to nominations, would it be a popular thing, do you think, at Leeds to put an end to nominations at the Parliamentary elections?—Not to put an end to nominations, but to the present mode of nominating, I think it would, decidedly.

1536. You think that putting an end to public nomination would meet with approval?—Yes; and I think also the declaration of the poll seems an unnecessary thing, and I am not alone in that opinion.

1537. Sir George Grey.] Why should you desire the nomination day to be got rid of, if the proceedings are always peaceably conducted?—We certainly have had the notion that it is unnecessary; we enjoy tranquillity at it ourselves, but I do not think that, as a rule, it is a good thing; it is also expensive.

1538. Is there any desire at Leeds, as far as your own experience goes, to get rid of the nomination day?—Yes, I think there is; it stops all business for that day, and that is a very serious thing for a large town like ours; the working men lose a day's pay, and perhaps spend another day or two's pay in addition, therefore it is a serious thing for them.

1539. What would you substitute for it?—I think the same mode as nominating a member for the town council.

1540. What would you substitute for the show of hands, which is often decisive; suppose there is a show of hands, and the candidate against whom the show of hands is does not demand a poll, yielding to the expression of opinion on the part of the constituents, what would you substitute for that?—That is a thing which I have not thought of at all; if there were two candidates required, and there were only two nominated, that would do away with the necessity of the show of hands.

1541. Do you think that there is any advantage in candidates appearing before a constituency and stating their opinions?—We should take care that they appeared pretty frequently before us before the election, at a number of mixed meetings.

1542. Mr. Cross.] How could you get a mixed meeting; a man generally goes and makes a speech to his own party, and is it not thought rather an interruption if one of the opposite party comes to ask him questions at that meeting?—That depends upon the mode in which he comes; if a man comes as a gentleman he generally gets a civil answer, and we are glad to see him; but if he comes for the purpose of making a row, we deal with him as others would, I suppose.

1543. Do not you think it is necessary to have what are called open meetings, in order that a man may be cross-examined to any extent that a person likes?—We have in the Cloth Hall Yard, long before the nomination takes place, open meetings, and we invite the attendance of everybody there.

1544. Mr. Locke.] Do you mean open-air meetings?—Yes.

1545. Mr. Cross.] Still the body of men round a candidate are men of his own opinions, are they not, as a rule?—It is the fault of the other party if they are not there; it is quite as free for them to be there as the others, and they frequently attend.

Mr. Edwin Gaunt, called in; and Examined.

Mr. E. Gaunt.

1546. Chairman.] Are you a town councillor of Leeds?—Yes, I am.

1547. Have you for some time held that office?—From eight to nine years.

1548. Have you heard the evidence just given by Mr. Addyman?—Yes, I have.

1549. Do you agree with him in what he said?—I agree with him in the main. There are some things which I do not entirely agree with.

1551. Were you a member of this committee of the council which was appointed to investigate the subject?—Yes, I was.

1552. Do you think that the prosecution cost about 200 l.?—Yes, I think it would cost that.

1553. But that was for a great number of prosecutions?—Yes, for getting the evidence up for the whole of them.

1554. Can you explain to the Committee why no further step was taken after obtaining this penalty?—I think I can understand it perfectly; a person who is prepared to pay 500 l. to gain a seat, does not care much for 40 s., and the very small cost in addition.

1555. Could you not under the Act have prosecuted that town councillor, and disqualified him for ever from serving in the council?—We were advised advised by several parties that it would be the best plan to try the case under the recent Act; the 11th section of the Municipal Elections Act of 1859. We clearly understood that the latter portion of this section would apply, that "the name of the offender may be expunged from the list of voters being lawfully convicted thereof, shall for the term of six years be disabled to vote in any election in such borough, or in any municipal or Parliamentary election, whatever." We found on getting the verdict in the county court, and afterwards when it went to the Court of Queen's Bench, I think the judges in the Court of Queen's Bench decided, that this Act did not apply in such a case as that; I think as far as that was concerned we were saddled with the costs of that case.

1556. Did that case go before the Court of Queen's Bench?—Yes.

1557. Sir George Grey.] Was this the case which went before the Court of Queen's Bench, whether where you had recovered a penalty of 40 s. against a councillor in the county court that was to be followed by legal disqualification?—It was.

1558. And the Court of Queen's Bench held that in order to be legally disqualified he must be convicted on a criminal prosecution?—Yes, I believe that practically was the decision.

1559. Why did not you adopt criminal proceedings?—In the first place it cost some seven or eight of us a couple of hundred pounds; we did not want to incur the odium of prosecuting man after man in wards that we had nothing to do with, because they were not in our own wards at all; they were in separate wards from those which we represented, we did not want to incur the odium and the expense.

1560. Chairman.] Was there any other point in Mr. Addyman's evidence which you think requires any explanation, or with which you do not entirely agree?—There was just one point, I think, which he, perhaps, did not remember, with reference to the nominations in the Cloth Hall Yard. All our nominations, I think, except one, have been peaceable nominations; but I remember very distinctly, for it was the first nomination under the Act of 1832, when we had a very serious riot in the Cloth Hall Yard, and I think we ever afterwards held the nominations on Woodhouse Moor, where there is plenty of room.

1561. Is it your opinion that, under the Act as it now exists, no further prosecutions will be taken in Leeds to stop bribery at the municipal elections?—I do not think any further prosecutions will be taken under that Act; it is not worth while.

1562. Do you think if the Act were simplified prosecutions would be undertaken, or do you think that the odium and expense of collecting evidence were too great to incur, seeing that they had no power of preventing the evil when proceedings were taken?—I am satisfied that if it had answered its purpose of disfranchising some parties, they would have prosecuted many others, but it had not.

1563. Would you be satisfied to have those cases tried before the borough magistrates?—I would rather adopt another mode of voting myself.

1564. You would not trust to any amendment in the law for the punishment of bribery?—I should not. I think vote by ballot would be a better mode of voting, and would remedy it in a more speedy manner.

1565. Has that always been your opinion?—It has not always been my opinion.

1566. Since when have you formed that opinion?—For these last four or five years, perhaps.

1567. Has that change been on account of anything which you have seen at the municipal elections or at the Parliamentary elections?—Both on account of that and on account of reading the arguments on both sides.

1568. Do you think that the corruption at municipal elections has increased or diminished of late years?—I think in Leeds it has increased of late years in about three of the wards. I know the whole of the wards tolerably well, having been a voter in many of them, and I believe there are only three or four that are tainted with corruption.

1569. Do you believe that the Parliamentary election was pure?—Perfectly so, I believe; I believe none more so in England.

1570. They are in most cases identically the same voters, are they not?—Yes, they are in most cases.

1571. Can you account for the difference which exists?—I think I can account for it very well in my own mind; some of our largest wards, large working class wards are totally free from anything like corruption; for instance, the ward which I represent has from 6,000 to 7,000 voters, and I believe it is totally free from anything like payment on either side; and then the Hunslett Ward, which is another very large ward, has 7,000 voters in it, and that I believe is perfectly free, too.

1572. Mr. Bright.] Is not that ward inhabited almost exclusively by the working classes?—They are both exclusively working class wards, and so are Holbeck, Hunslett, and Bramley Wards, with one small exception, and that is the small town of Beeson, which is pretty clear, too; so that one can understand that the whole of the wards put together will carry a very large majority, as we did at the Parliamentary election, while in one or two wards it is worth while bribing for anyone that wants to get in. For instance, in the ward which has always been the worst in our estimation in Leeds, a ward that is by itself, the Kirkgate Ward, there are only 600 voters, principally small shopkeepers and lodging-house keepers; it is the ward round the market.

1573. What is the class of persons in that ward who are open to bribery?—I believe they are the small shopkeepers and the common lodging-house keepers, and it is generally done through the public-houses.

1574. You are speaking now of the municipal election, are you not?—Yes.

1576. I presume that there is not the slightest

13 April 1869.

Mr. E. Gaunt.

13 April 1869.

necessity for the ballot in those free wards?—I believe they would rather have it.

1577. But there is not the slightest necessity for it?—I do not think there is any necessity for it.

1578. Do not you believe, that the same effect would be produced in those three or four wards which you have named, as in the pure wards, when the people shall have become more educated?—I think it would have great effect upon them.

1579. If they were more educated you can see no reason why those three or four wards that you put your finger upon should want the ballot any more than the other wards?—In every one of the wards there would be a certain class of men that would be bribable.

1580. If those people in those three or four wards became more educated, would there be any more necessity for the ballot in those wards than in the other wards?—I do not think there would be any more necessity for the ballot.

1581. It rather depends upon the education and the class of people?—Yes.

1582. Mr. Bright.] Mr. Addyman was asked whether, amongst the population of your town, there was a great or growing feeling that the tranquillity and the purity of elections would be advanced by adopting the ballot as a mode of election; do you agree with what he said about it?—Yes, I heard his answer, and I quite agree with it.

1583. You say that your own view of that question has been adopted within the last four or five years; are you able to say whether, amongst the persons with whom you come in contact in Leeds, the tendency of public opinion, in your view, is in that direction?—I think so, decidedly, to a very large extent; I do not say that from just speaking with one or two, but I have spoken to a very large number, and I have addressed very large meetings at different times, and that has been a question which seemed to receive general favour.

1584. It has been supposed to be a great party question?—The Liberal party generally going for the ballot, and the Conservatives going against it; if you addressed a meeting of Liberals, they would be generally for the ballot; but do you think that there is any giving way on that question amongst the more intelligent and thoughtful of the Conservative party?—I think so, decidedly.

1585. Mr. Cross.] Do not you think that the tendency which you are speaking of is that there should be some remedy found for bribery and corruption?—Yes.

1586. And that that is the main point in people's minds?—I have no doubt they think that that is the best remedy.

1587. The main point in their minds which they want to express is that there should be some remedy for bribery?—Yes.

1588. Sir George Grey.] Do I rightly understand you that they do not require any protection against intimidation at Leeds?—I do not think they do much.

1589. Nor do they require any protection, if I understand you rightly, against disturbance; because the elections are conducted in a peaceable manner?—Just so. There was not the slightest disturbance during the last election.

1590. Mr. Bright.] Did you observe at the election, notwithstanding the general freedom of the constituency, that amongst the working men they take often the same side as their employers?—During the last election I have heard men say that they were very sorry to have to neglect their own side, as they call it, and vote for their employers; for instance, I do not think it is intimidation, and I do not think we should call it intimidation; but when a man is canvassed by his foreman, as we have heard of in certain cases, to vote in a particular way, and his own master happens to be a candidate, though he would much rather go the other way, he does not like to do it. I do not think they go on the other side of politics because they happen to be both on one side, but if I am asked by many constituents what they should do under the circumstances, I say I can hardly advise them, but it it is not likely that a man will go and vote against his own employer, particularly when his foreman is canvassing for him.

1591. There have been no charges, have there, of any positive acts of oppression in connection with voting at Leeds?—I think not.

1592. Therefore you would limit your remark to a certain pressure which would not be likely to come within the clauses of any Act of Parliament that could be made to meet it?—No, I do not think that it would come within the clause of any Act of Parliament.

1593. But to secure perfect freedom you adhere to your opinion that the ballot is the proper remedy?—That is my opinion.

1594. Chairman.] In the wards where corruption does prevail, do you believe that it prevails extensively?—I think it does in one or two wards, extensively.

1595. And you could name wards in which a large proportion of the voters are bribed or bribable?—Yes.

1596. Even in the pure ward, if the contests were very close, and the party feeling were very high, should you be afraid that bribery might be introduced even there?—I think so, decidedly. We find bribery nearly always introduced towards the latter end of the day, when the contests run close. When you are some 1,000 a head, it is no use beginning to bribe on the other side in any contest, but if the contest is running close we always find persons resorting to bribery.

1597. And if that once begin in a ward you think that it might become general?—It is a very difficult thing to stay it.

1598. Mr. Cross.] I presume that that means that if there were no publication of the poll during the course of the day there would be likely to be less bribery in the town?—That is my impression.

1599. But whether that was done by the ballot or by the poll clerk and check clerks being sworn to secrecy as to how people voted, it would make no difference?—It would make no difference as far as that particular was concerned.

THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. THOMAS TRIPPIER, called in; and Examined.

Mr. T. Trippier. 16 April 1869.

1600. Chairman.] YOU live at Liverpool, I believe?—I do.

1601. Will you tell the Committee your profession?—I am a Surgeon Dentist.

1602. I believe you are secretary to the Liberal Committee of the St. Anne's Ward?—Yes, honorary secretary.

1603. Is that an organisation for the purposes of the parliamentary or the municipal elections?—For both.

1604. What is the nature of the ward?—It is a ward principally of working classes. On two sides there are streets full of shops, but it is rather a working-class ward upon the whole; it is a smallish ward.

1605. How many voters are there in the ward?—The Parliamentary voters are about 1,640, and for the municipal election the number on last year's register, 1868, was 553.

1606. Are you aware whether illegal practices have prevailed at the municipal elections in that ward?—They have.

1607. Of what nature?—Open bribery directly with money; there is no question about it.

1608. Has money been corruptly expended by both parties?—Our party, I believe, since 1865, have not spent a penny in direct corruption.

1609. In what way are you aware that money has been corruptly expended by the other party?—By the way that parties have moved from their promises, and parties coming and demanding money from us and saying we can get so much from the other side.

1610. Is that done openly or with any concealment?—It is done perfectly openly; it seems to be a matter of business with them; they seem to look for it.

1611. Can you state what proportion of the voters in your ward are open to this influence?—I should think about 20 per cent.

1612. You mean that there are 20 per cent. who can be bought by either side?—Yes, by either party.

1613. Is there in addition a certain number of voters who expect money, but who cannot be bought by the other side?—Yes, we have a few who will not vote unless they are paid, and they will only vote one way.

1614. Those who are decidedly purchaseable are well known, are they?—Yes, we know them; we can just go and lay our hand upon them; in fact, in canvassing them they ask you the price.

1615. Is this practice on the increase or the decline?—Considerably on the increase. Parties who would be content probably with 5 s. some half-a-dozen years ago would now require 1 l. for their vote, and their neighbours, finding this sort of thing out, and that they get the money, will not promise without money also.

1616. What should you say was the ordinary price now?—It would vary. If you go back to 1865, we had a great contest in that year, and there was as high as 5 l. paid for a vote in the municipal election.

1617. Are we to understand that the practice has been on the increase since 1865?—Our party became so thoroughly disgusted with the proceeding that a resolution was passed in the committee that we should take no action in any election where those corrupt practices were continued, and since then we have set our faces entirely against it.

1618. But has it still continued?—It has still continued on the other side. If there is no money stirring, we have a considerable majority of Liberals in the ward; but since 1865, we have lost every election but one, and that was one year when there was no money spent by our opponents, and we beat them by two to one. In 1866, we had an extraordinary election; we had on the register that year 533 voters; the Liberal candidate polled 154, and the Conservative candidate 74; and there was no money given by either party.

1619. What do you call an extraordinary election?—The gentleman who was elected in 1865, who had spent, he admitted to me, 1,000 l., became bankrupt, and had to resign his seat the following year, and this was an extraordinary election, election, and there was no money spent at all by either party.

1620. Was that the last election which has taken place?—No. We had the ordinary election on the 1st of November 1866, and in the following month we had an extraordinary election caused by the gentleman who was elected in 1865 becoming bankrupt.

1621. What took place at the last election?—At the last election we had a very popular man indeed, and people came to us continually, saying either, "Give us a ticket for drink," or "What are you going to give us?" I said, "Not a shilling, if we lose the election." I have with me a statement of the polling which will, perhaps, give some idea of how the thing was. I just copied this yesterday from the poll sheets. Up to two o'clock, and we generally consider that two o'clock will decide a contest, we were in a majority of 35; the numbers were for Dawburn, 150; for Denton, 115. News came into the committee-room at this time that "Blucher" had appeared, and that we were going to be thrashed. By half-past two, our majority dwindled down to 16, the numbers were, Dawburn, 163, and Denton, 147; at three o'clock, Dawburn, 179, and Denton, 175; at half-past three, Dawburn, 194, and Denton, 192; and at four o'clock, Dawburn, 217, and Denton, 229; we lost by a majority of 12.

1622. Do you believe that the result of that election was entirely changed by the payment of money?—Yes. At three o'clock we had an offer from a kind of representative man. It has been the practice in our ward for people to form themselves into cliques, of some six or seven in a gang; they will all go in a gang and make themselves prominent; and there is a man that goes as a fugleman, and he will make a bargain for the lot. At three o'clock one of those men came to me and wanted to know what we would give him. I said, "Not a shilling; it is no use your coming here." They had been teasing some of our canvassers. I was engaged in striking off that day, and was kept in-doors the whole of the day; and I said to those who were with me at the time, "Do not attempt to give any money."

1623. Up to 1865, as I understand, money was paid by both sides?—It was, unfortunately.

1624. Since 1865, has the fact of your having left off paying money, reduced the prices which the voters have obtained?—Yes; it has reduced the prices.

1625. Do you know what sums were paid at this last election which you have just told us about?—Some of the committee-men who were very anxious to win the election were certainly disposed to have given their money, but I said, "We must not do anything of the kind." The committee-room of the Conservatives was at a public-house three or four doors from the polling booth, called the "Pontack Inn," and one of our committee-men followed them to that house, and observed them come out with a sovereign in their hands.

1626. Mr. Hunt.] Whom did you hear this from?—From one of our canvassers, who followed them.

1627. From whom did you hear that he followed him?—He told me himself; I desired him to go to the inn to watch those men.

1628. The man who saw the sovereign himself told you that he had seen it?—Yes; and, as I say, he was one of our committee-men.

1629. Chairman.] Were there any peculiar circumstances about this election; did it turn upon politics or upon local matters?—Our municipal contests are all political ones.

1630. Can you state anything with regard to the effect of those practices upon the value of cottage property in your ward?—The poor-rate collector tells me that he can get the taxes very much better in our ward than in most of the wards; that when he calls upon the persons they say, "Wait till the election is over, and we can pay them," and they do so. We were in conversation with the poor-rate collector the other day, when this subject came up. It is common parlance in the ward that cottage property is at a premium on account of the occupiers getting so well paid for the vote in the election.

1631. Have you any knowledge of any other wards in the town?—I know the adjoining ward; I assisted in the adjoining ward at the last election. We had an extraordinary election in January in the adjoining ward, where the gentleman who was defeated last November became a candidate for the ward.

1632. Have you reason to suppose that your ward, St. Anne's Ward, is more or less corrupt than the other wards in Liverpool?—We bear the character of being somewhat corrupt on account of the number of working people that are accessible.

1633. Do you know what sums have ever been expended upon the municipal elections by either side?—Our gross election expenses in St. Anne's Ward last November were 63 l.

1634. Did you spend 63 l. without paying any money in bribery?—Yes; those are the absolute expenses of the contest.

1635. Will you have the goodness to name those expenses?—We have generally about nine or ten cars, and a great amount of printing and posting, and we hire committee-rooms. We do not hold them in public-houses; we have not held our committee meetings since 1865 at any public-house.

1636. But you spent 63 l. legitimately?—Yes, we spent it legitimately.

1637. Do you know what sum of money has ever been expended in a contest?—The year before, our expenses were 65 l. in November 1867; in 1865 our expenses were 350 l.

1638. Previous to that, what were they?—I am not in a position to say what they were previous to that; it was only that year I became secretary to the ward.

1639. Have you any knowledge of what has been spent by the other side?—In 1865 the candidate himself told me that it cost him 1,000 l., and our expenses were 350 l. There were then 519 upon the register.

1640. Do you think that there is any connection between the municipal elections and the parliamentary elections?—I consider that the conduct of the last municipal election had very considerable influence with the new voters at our Parliamentary election.

1641. Can you explain how?—I can explain it in this way: for instance, with regard to promises, on going over the list, I find there were 83 parties who promised to vote for us who voted against us, independent of those who never promised at all.

1642. How do you connect that with the municipal election?—We can only arrive at it by canvass, by parties going round and canvassing, and and those reports which the canvassers bring us in.

1643. Do you think that the money which was paid for the municipal vote went some way to purchase the Parliamentary vote also?—Yes, I think it made parties right, as it was termed, and particularly a new voter; if he was secured at the municipal election, they had him quite right for the Parliamentary election.

1644. You say, do you not, that you could name a very large number of those voters who are purchasable in your ward?—For municipal purposes, I can.

1645. Have you made any calculation of how those voted at the Parliamentary election?—I have not made a direct calculation of them in going over the localities; I can merely say that it is principally in the locality where the men have moved from their promises that the number on the Parliamentary register has so considerably increased. There was 1,640 upon the Parliamentary list, and only 550 upon the municipal list.

1646. Do you believe that voters who could be purchased for the municipal election could also be purchased for the Parliamentary election?—I should think they could; but I do not think that there was much bribery at our last Parliamentary election; not with money at least.

1647. Has any attempt ever been made in Liverpool, in your ward, to put a stop to these practices at the municipal elections?—Yes, there have.

1648. In what way?—We had an inquiry; we put a detective officer to get evidence and to endeavour to put a stop to it; but we found that the expense would be so great that the thing fell through.

1649. No prosecution has been instituted, either under the Municipal Act or under the Act of 1859?—Not in our ward.

1650. Is there any strong feeling among the respectable inhabitants of the ward that those practices ought to be put a stop to?—A very strong feeling indeed.

1651. Have you considered at all what remedy could be applied?—I have seen no remedy; I believe that no penal enactment will ever put it down as long as there is open voting.

1652. Do you not think that the prosecutions might be rendered less expensive?—I think that the prosecutions might certainly be rendered much less expensive.

1653. I understood you to say that it was the probable expense of the prosecution which deterred you?—Yes, that deterred us from taking proceedings. We have had some very clear cases where we could have proved bribery directly, where we have had corroborative evidence, where a second person saw the money given, and which were thought to be very good cases.

1655. Are you aware whether a prosecution before a magistrate would be expensive?—I am not aware that we can take it before a magistrate.

1656. Supposing that the law were so altered that you could prosecute a man whom you suspected of having received a bribe, or of giving a bribe, before a magistrate, would that be an expensive process?—I do not see why it should be expensive. No doubt it would be a very good remedy if you could have an easier way of prosecuting the parties, for the prosecutions would deter others, I think, from committing this sort of offence.

1657. But you have no confidence, have you, in any system of punishing those practices?—I think that any law that you can introduce would be a perfect failure so long as we have open voting.

1658. How do you think that secret voting would stop corruption?—I should certainly adopt the ballot, because I do not think that those parties would be tempted to spend their money unless they got their work done for it.

1659. You think that they would not be sure that they got their work done?—They would not be sure; and I do not think that people are disposed to pay money unless they have their work done for it.

1660. Does treating prevail much at those elections?—Yes, to a considerable extent.

1661. Do you think that the ballot would put a stop to treating?—I can scarcely say that, but I think it would check it; people would not spend money unless they knew they got value in return for it. To a certain extent it would check it, but I cannot say that it would entirely.

1662. Is there any other improper influence used at those elections?—Yes, coercion. The very fact of canvassing itself is coercion, and I think that canvassing ought to be done away with.

1663. That is used pretty equally on each side, is it not?—Yes, on both sides. If a man is a working man, if the screw can be brought to bear upon him through his employer, or through anyone who has any influence over him, it is done.

1664. Do you think that intimidation goes so far in your ward, that a man would feel that he might lose his employment if he voted against his employer?—Yes.

1665. Do you know any cases in which that has happened?—I could not, perhaps, give a direct case now, as I have not given it consideration; but it is generally understood how these things are worked. We have called upon men who have been known to be Liberals, and they have told us that it is so. I can give one instance which just occurs to me. There is a cabinet-maker in St. Anne's Ward, a Conservative, whose foreman is an out-and-out Liberal, and that man, because he will not prostitute his conscience, refrains from voting.

1666. Mr. Villiers.] You stated that the respectable classes are against this system of bribery; how do they view the system of intimidation and undue influence which you have just now spoken to?—The respectable portion of the ward certainly are opposed to this amount of bribery and corruption.

1667. But how do they view undue influence or intimidation?—I am not able to speak as to how they view it.

1668. Can you say that the respectable classes wish the voters to act fairly and unbiased by any influence?

16 April 1869.

influence?—I should think that all respectable honest men would wish them to do so.

1669. But is that the fact?—I am not able to say what the men's views may be.

1670. Do you speak to the fact of coercion and intimidation being quite general in your ward?—In going round canvassing, when we find that a man who has Liberal tendencies, or who has voted on former occasions Liberal, is going to vote the other way, the natural question is, "Who is his employer?" and we usually find that he is a Conservative, or he is something else.

1671. Is this your inference; that he has been Liberal, but now being employed by a Conservative he is obliged to vote Conservative, or the other way?—That is the supposition.

1672. What is exactly your position in the ward, because you speak of yourself in the plural number, and you say, "We do this," and "We do that"?—I am Secretary of the Liberal Election Committee of the ward.

1673. Those facts that you have stated about bribery are perfectly notorious, are they not?—Quite notorious.

1674. And that sometimes the candidates pay 1,000 l. to get in?—That was upon rather an extraordinary occasion.

1675. What class of persons are they who pay such large sums to get in?—This gentleman was a brewer.

1676. One of the highly respectable classes?—I cannot say as to his being of a very highly respectable class; that was not a very respectable act.

1677. He is a respectable man, I suppose?—He became a bankrupt the following year.

1678. Was he rich before he became a bankrupt?—I do not know about that.

1679. That person who paid so much was elected, I suppose?—Yes, he was.

1680. It being notorious that he paid that large sum at the election, how was his conduct afterwards regarded by persons in the same station in life?—I think he was rather pooh-poohed when he got into the council; not because he got in by bribery.

1681. But then, if such people do pay to get in, how do other persons view his conduct?—This was rather an extraordinary case in 1865.

1682. But it appears, from what you say, that the practice was pretty general to pay something for the purpose of getting in?—In our ward it has been so, and I am speaking more particularly with regard to the ward in which I reside.

1683. But people are not thought the worse of, are they, after they are elected?—The thing seems to pass over, and they seem to think nothing more about it; it is taken as a matter of course.

1684. Have you ever heard any conversation about the matter, as to whether it should be put a stop to or not?—We have talked about it frequently.

1685. Just tell us how it is viewed; is it simply viewed with respect to the expense, or is it thought discreditable?—We think it discreditable as well as being expensive.

1686. Do you think that it being thought discreditable, if it was less expensive, the law would be put in action against the parties who had bribed?—We were so disgusted with this kind of proceeding, that in 1866 the committee made a resolution that they would not take part in any election where any one of our candidates attempted to use bribery or treating.

1687. And are the Committee to understand that the candidate lost in consequence?—We have lost every election but one since 1865.

1688. Is there any idea of changing the system again in consequence of finding that the candidates are unsuccessful?—I do not know; I shall leave the committee if any money is given.

1689. They have not taken into consideration whether they will prosecute the people that have succeeded by those means?—No, we have not taken any steps to do so.

1690. So that, as it stands now, the one party that will open its hands the widest will be successful?—Yes, since 1865; the last four years we have had no practice of that kind.

1691. But do we understand you that the ward, or at least the respectable portion of it, or those who have given up bribery, despair of curing the system by anything short of the ballot?—That is our opinion.

1692. Deliberately arrived at after consideration?—Yes; in our meetings the thing has been frequently talked over, and invariably the respectable portion of our ward vote with the Liberal party.

1693. What are the qualifications for those candidates; are we to understand you that their political opinions are inquired into before they start?—Yes, they are generally known; a man does not come out to be a candidate unless his political opinions are well known. In Liverpool, unfortunately, in all our wards they are purely political contests; it is not a matter of fitness at all.

1694. The fact is, that you know every councillor's politics who is elected?—Yes; he comes up as a Liberal or as a Conservative, and he stands upon those principles.

1695. And I presume that in the council he acts according to his politics?—He votes that way for the mayor and aldermen.

1696. Is it thought to be a fortunate circumstance that politics should interfere in those matters?—I think it is a very unfortunate one; because we have brought out very superior men to our opponents, and we have been beaten year after year; they have been men of ability and fitness for the office, and there has been no comparison between the men; but where this money has been brought to bear, fitness is only a secondary consideration, and we have not been able to get them in.

1697. But, in the discharge of their duties as councillors, are they biased by their political feeling?—They give their votes, I presume, honestly.

1698. You stated, did you not, that you did not consider that any of those malpractises existed at the Parliamentary election?—I do not consider that there was any money given at the Parliamentary election to any extent; but there was drink given freely.

1699. Then treating does go on at the Parliamentary elections?—Yes.

1700. And all the other influences to which you have referred?—Yes, coercion, and I presume where influence could be brought to bear upon a voter that has been done.

1701. And you think that that is very general in Liverpool?—Very general on both sides, I dare say.

1702. You have known Liverpool a long time; do do you think that there is any change in the feeling among the more respectable classes as to whether this sort of system should not cease?—Among the parties that I have come in contact with, I have generally found that they consider it is quite time that there should be some alteration in the law, and some alteration in the method of voting.

1703. Have you seen that change of opinion taking place?—I think that it is gradually going that way, particularly among the more respectable people.

1704. Is there much difference between the Parliamentary electors and the municipal electors, in point of standing and qualification?—Yes, considerable.

1705. The municipal franchise is the highest, is it not?—The franchise is the same exactly; but the class of persons who are on the municipal register are generally rather of a better stamp than those who have been latterly introduced into the Parliamentary election.

1707. Do you know whether there is any arrangement made to pay the rates of the voter?—I do not know of any.

1708. You had election committees for the Parliamentary election, had you not?—The same class of persons work both as far as we are concerned.

1709. At the last election the rates were not paid, were they?—We never gave a fraction for any such purpose, and I do not know of its being done by any party.

1710. Before the election took place, had any rate been paid at Michaelmas?—The poor-rate is laid at Easter.

1711. So that the rate was in force at the time of the election?—Yes.

1712. And there were arrears, I suppose, unpaid?—I am not aware that there were; I cannot speak to any arrears; the poor-rate collector would be better able to answer that.

1713. Mr. Hunt.] Do you know when your own rates were collected?—I think I paid mine about November; they are laid at Easter, and I generally pay towards the end of the year; I mean the poor's rates. Our local rates I paid about July; they are three months earlier than the poor rates are.

1714. However, are you of opinion that if there was the vote by ballot, all those influences would cease?—I think that in a very great measure they would.

1715. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] As I understand you, your ward is divided into three parties, the Liberals and the Conservatives, both of whom pronounce their opinions openly, and a class that is open to the receipt of money; is that so?—That is so.

1716. Then, in the case of the ballot being brought into operation, it would operate, you think, only upon that class who at present have no opinions?—Perhaps, dividing them into three parts in that way, it is scarcely fair; because many of those men who are purchaseable have political opinions, but they merely stand aloof, and will not assert them in the expectation of getting paid for them.

1717. To take another case, the one that you have mentioned of the cabinet-maker's foreman; that was a person, as I understand, of pronounced Liberal opinions?—Yes, a staunch Liberal.

1718. His master knew perfectly well, did he not, what his opinions were?—I am not able to say whether his master knew what his opinions were; I can only tell you the fact that he refrained from voting.

1719. And he refrained from voting in deference to his master's opinions?—I presume that is so.

1720. Supposing you had the ballot, and that he had voted, do you think that his master would have had any doubt about the way in which he had voted?—I should think not.

1721. So far as the relations between him and his master were concerned, the ballot would really make no change with a straightforward man like that?—The ballot would be a considerable advantage to this man, because he could then record his vote honestly.

1722. Would not his master know how it was recorded?—I do not know about his master knowing; of course he might have his own notion of how it was recorded.

1723. If he has abstained for many years from voting because, being a Liberal, he does not wish to vote against his master, who is a Tory, if vote by ballot came into operation can you doubt that his master would know how he voted?—I think the supposition would be that he had supported his own side.

1724. You have spoken of putting a stop to canvassing; will you describe what you mean by canvassing?—The ward is divided into streets; in our municipal election we divide the ward into 16 districts, and each gentleman takes a book with the names, and goes from house to house to solicit the votes.

1725. Is that the kind of canvassing that you want to put a stop to?—Yes.

1726. In what does that differ from your canvasser meeting a man anywhere in the streets and pressing him for his vote?—It is a part of the same thing.

1727. Can you stop that process?—You can scarcely stop that kind of thing, if he met a man casually and asked him whether he was going to vote for So-and-so.

1728. Could you stop a neighbour going into a friend's house and talking to him about his vote?—No, I do not see how you could stop a neighbour doing that; I mean a systematic canvass.

1729. Will you explain what kind of penalty you would put upon canvassing?—I would put a stop to a systematic canvass, where books are made out and a person takes a district and goes from house to house to the voters; that is the kind of thing which I would stop.

1730. Will you explain how you would lay down rules by which you could distinguish that kind of canvassing from any other kind of canvassing; as, for instance, a neighbour going in and asking a friend in his house for his vote, and making a memorandum of it?—If we found that the man made a practice of going from house to house I should look upon that as being canvassing, and I think he ought to be punished for it, if the law was put in force to that effect, and it was illegal.

1731. Could you do that with any effect, unless you made it absolutely penal to ask a man for his vote at all?—That would be interfering almost with the rights of individuals. Supposing that I met my next-door neighbour and put the question to him, not what you consider making a formal canvass, and the man said, "I think I shall vote so-and-so," I should not look upon that as being a set canvass; but if I went from house to house and took a district, and solicited those people, I should look upon that as a systematic canvassing that ought to be stopped.

1732. Whether you did it voluntarily or as a paid canvasser?—We do it voluntarily now, because we have no paid canvassers; they are all volunteers upon our committee.

1733. If I understand you right, you go for the ballot; have you ever tried any other method of repressing bribery, or corruption, or intimidation, in your ward?—We have no means of trying anything, only refraining from giving them money for drink.

1734. Have you ever tried to put the law which exists in force?—We have tried. We have tried to collect evidence for such a thing, and, as I said before, in consequence of the expense the thing fell through.

1735. Was it that you could not get good evidence?—No, it was not that. We had corroborative evidence where the money had been seen to pass.

1736. Was it want of money on your part that prevented you?—Want of money to go into the matter. Those things are somewhat expensive, and we were deterred from proceeding with them.

1737. Who used to find the money up to 1865; was it found by the candidate or by subscription?—We generally expected the candidate to find it.

1738. Did they know how it was employed?—I presume so.

1739. You made no secret about it?—I believe they generally presumed that there was money to be had on both sides up to 1865.

1740. I understood you to say, that in your particular ward the corruptible persons are generally represented by a sort of gang-man, who undertakes to get the money for them?—A few years ago there was a very formidable combination of beer-house keepers; some 15 or 16 combined together, and previous to 1865 it used to be made a point who could secure this lot first.

1741. Those 15 or 16, as I understand you, are able to turn any election?—They made themselves very powerful.

1742. They can turn the election; in fact, you have lost the election, you say, by those men being got hold of during the last four years on the other side?—Since then this combination has not been so powerful as it was; it has dwindled down until they form only about six now.

1743. Whoever they are, those gangsmen have been able to turn the election against you, who say that you have the majority of the respectable voters with you?—They have assisted in doing so. I cannot say that it has absolutely depended upon them.

1744. I understood you to say, that if you had no bribery at all, you would have the majority; but, as a fact, there has been bribery, and you have lost all those elections?—I stated that since 1865 there has been no bribery on our part.

1745. But there has been bribery which has turned the elections against you, and has put you in a minority?—I scarcely understand the Right Honourable Member's question.

1746. You stated that your party were in the majority in the ward?—Yes, we are.

1747. And yet you have lost all those elections since 1865?—Except one.

1748. And that at those elections the practice is, for some persons (I do not care how many) to represent the corruptible people and to arrange for their being bribed?—They have some person to represent them.

1749. And you say that they are perfectly well known, and that they have a fugleman who comes and asks you for money, not for themselves merely, but for the clique?—They form themselves into those little cliques, and there is one man put forward to get the biggest price he can.

1750. And this fugleman will manage it for them?—Yes, among themselves; we do not interfere with them.

1751. But the fuglemen are the men who manage it with those persons who give the bribe?—I presume they are.

1752. And they have been able to turn the elections against you?—We have lost them, except in one instance.

1753. Mr. Hunt.] You disapprove of systematic canvassing; do you approve of public nominations?—No.

1754. And you would like to see them done away with?—As far as the municipal election is concerned, I think that the nomination is quite right; but as regards the Parliamentary election, I think that it ought to be done away with.

1755. Would you wish to do away with the declaration of the poll too?—Yes, with the declaration of the poll also.

1756. Supposing that there is to be a general election, and that the sitting Members have announced their intention of not sitting again, will you describe to the Committee an election under the system which you would approve of: will you go through the different steps of the election—the introduction of a candidate to the constituency; the ascertaining of the views of the constituency with respect to the candidate when he is formally before the constituency as a candidate; and the different processes till you reach the return?—I presume that the gentleman who intended to put himself forward as a candidate would be a person whose political opinions would be known; he should not have been a man who had never been before the public in some way or other. You would choose a man whom you think would represent your opinions. We will say that two parties put up, one gentleman to be a Conservative and the other to be a Liberal; there is no doubt that gentlemen would, before the election, form themselves together to conduct the election on both sides; a number of Liberals would form themselves into a committee, and they would invite Mr. So-and-so, because they believe that his opinions would suit their party. He would then issue an address to the public, and the only other machinery that would be required would be an Act of Parliament saying how the voting should be conducted afterwards.

1757. How would you ascertain whether the candidate that the committee had selected, and who had put forth an address, was acceptable to the constituents, or to that part of the constituency for whom the committee had been formed?—That

That is a matter which they could not possibly arrive at; it could only be determined by the voting whether he was acceptable or not.

1758. The candidate would be chosen by the committee, and he would issue an address, but he would have no means of knowing whether he was acceptable to the constituency till the polling had taken place?—Just so.

1759. Do you think that that would be satisfactory to the committee who had selected him?—I think it would be satisfactory to the committee.

1760. Supposing you, who took an active part as a Liberal, have, with your colleagues on the committee, selected a candidate, and you had no canvass, and no public meetings, you would not know at all whether he was acceptable to the constituency?—I think it desirable that a public meeting should be called for the candidate to declare his opinions.

1761. Then, having issued his address, you would have a public meeting called to enable the constituency to hear his views?—Yes.

1762. You would expect him to address the meeting, I suppose?—Certainly.

1763. And then would you call for a show of hands?—I should not see any necessity for that.

1764. Supposing there were two rival Liberal candidates in the field, should you propose that there should be a meeting of electors to decide between them?—That is a matter I should not be able to speak about. If the position was that only one of two Liberal candidates was to be elected, it would be for the constituency themselves to decide by voting.

1765. Do you think there ought not to be any means of ascertaining beforehand the opinion of the Liberal electors as to which Liberal candidate should be put forward?—I would ascertain by meeting in committee, and talking the matter over as to which would be likely to be the most acceptable.

1766. You think that no other means should be adopted to ascertain the views of the constituency?—I do not see what other means you can adopt except public meetings.

1767. You think that there should be no canvassing, and that it should never be put to a meeting of Liberal electors as to which candidate they should bring forward?—I do not see the necessity of putting it to a public meeting of that sort, because a number of gentlemen would take an interest in the matter, and form themselves into a committee, and you would naturally expect that they would do nothing which would be detrimental to their party.

1768. Supposing there were two such candidates, would you expect them both to address public meetings; do you think it would be desirable that they should be so?—If a candidate is invited they would not invite two of the same political feeling.

1769. Then we will take one; supposing there is one candidate invited to attend a meeting, you would expect him to address the meeting?—Certainly.

1770. Supposing there was a rival candidate, his friends would wish him to address a meeting also, would they not?—Most likely they would, but not at the same place.

1771. But you would not allow either candidate to canvass the electors in any other way?—No.

1772. Do you not know as a fact that many excellent Members of Parliament are very bad hands at addressing a meeting, but whose opinions are very sound on public questions?—Yes, I dare say that is so.

16 April 1869.

1773. Would not that give a very great advantage to a man who has, what is commonly called at elections, the gift of the gab, and a great disadvantage to those who were not able to express their opinions so clearly at a public meeting as they would do to the electors in the course of their canvass?—It might be that a candidate addressing a meeting might militate against him, but a man of ability of that class would be pretty well known, even though he was not a fluent and ready speaker, and I do not think that that would militate against him with the public at all.

1774. Then, as regards those meetings, if you do away with nominations the meetings would be generally of one political complexion, would they not?—I think a candidate ought to call public meetings to express his views.

1775. Would not those meetings be of one political complexion as a rule?—I think a public meeting is open for all persons to go to.

1776. Is it not the practice, when those meetings are held, that they are confined almost exclusively to the one political party?—We have had public meetings called by one party, and considerable disturbance has been created by the other party.

1777. But generally there is a Liberal meeting and a Conservative meeting, is there not?—Yes.

1778. If you had no nomination, and no questions put at the hustings, the electors would lose their opportunity of inquiring into a candidate's opinions?—If he addressed a public meeting, or addressed them by an address, they would have an opportunity of reading the man's opinions and knowing something about them.

1779. But those electors who had not attended that meeting would lose the opportunity?—They would see an account of it in the newspapers the following day.

1780. But they would lose the opportunity of putting questions to the candidates?—Yes, certainly.

1781. You stated, with regard to the ballot, that you thought it would put a stop in a great measure to bribery, because parties would not be willing to spend money unless they could get their money's worth for it, supposing an arrangement were made that they should pay no money unless they were returned, I presume that men might be induced still to continue the practice of bribery?—At all events the present system does not answer the purpose, and I should be quite willing, if the ballot failed, to return back to open voting, but there would be no necessity for returning back to it I am quite sure.

1782. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is the office of town councillor in Liverpool an object much sought for by the most respectable inhabitants on both sides?—It has been an office that is rather coveted.

1783. Have you ever been a town councillor yourself?—No, I never had the honour.

1784. You stated that you were the honorary secretary of a ward association; will you tell the Committee what your duties are as honorary secretary?—The duties are that I keep all the accounts; all information is brought to me. I receive reports and mark up the register, and I copy the voting afterwards.

16 April 1869.

1785. Do you give any advice as to the persons to be nominated to the town council?—That is done in the committee, and I have no more voice than any other member of the committee in that respect.

1786. Have you in Liverpool the practice of which we have had evidence from other towns, of nominating gentlemen against their consent for the purpose of making a contest?—We never have done so in our ward.

1787. You told the Committee that up to 1865 money had been spent very freely by both sides, but that since 1865 the Liberal party had spent no money. What led to that determination on the part of the Liberals?—We found that it was so very demoralising to the electors that the elections were a perfect farce; it was no representation at all, but merely the man who came with the longest purse was returned.

1788. You told me just now that there was a great desire on the part of the most respectable members of society to seek the office of town councillor. Was it the effect of that corruption which prevented respectable men on the Liberal side coming forward?—They do come forward in other wards, but they are not considered quite so corruptible as our ward; in St. Anne's it has been more open and more notorious.

1789. In what part of Liverpool are those wards?—They are almost in the centre of Liverpool, near St. George's Hall.

1790. Will you go on to describe the effect of the election of 1865?—We got thoroughly disgusted with proceedings of this sort; we found that there was no representation at all.

1791. Did it never occur to you to find out that there was any legal remedy?—We knew that there was a legal remedy.

1792. Do you know the Act commonly called Mr. Cross's Act?—Yes, I know that Act.

1793. Did it never occur to you to put that Act in force?—It has been talked of frequently, but unfortunately we were both tarred with the same brush.

1794. Then it was from the fear of exposure on both sides that you refrained from putting the Act in force?—The Honourable Member will bear in mind that I have no official capacity, only as an ordinary committee man.

1795. But I suppose that you were present at meetings of the committee?—Yes.

1796. Did you ever hear any talk about putting Mr. Cross's Act in force?—We have frequently talked about it privately 1797. What prevented your putting the Act in force?—As I said before, it was the expense.

1798. There is not much expense in going before a county court judge, is there?—The county court might not be costly.

1799. What was it that prevented you?—Generally the getting of the money.

1800. Do you mean to say that in the town of Liverpool the real reason for not putting the law in force against the corruption, which you describe, was fear of the costs?—It was not the town; we are only speaking of the ward itself. Our committee is principally composed of working men, and we should be very sorry to ask them to put their hands in their pockets to pay such expenses.

1801. Was it in that ward that 350 l. was spent by one candidate?—Yes; the man came forward and spent it himself; that was in 1865.

1802. What description of person was this man who spent 350 l.?—A retired pawnbroker.

1803. That was not the gentleman who was bankrupt the next year?—No; he opposed the gentleman who was bankrupt the next year.

1804. Mr. Raikes.] Do I rightly understand you to say that they canvass with books in a systematic manner in the municipal elections in Liverpool?—Yes; just the same as in the Parliamentary elections.

1805. They make out a regular list, and thoroughly add it up, and know exactly what their position is?—Exactly so.

1806. And do you consider that that forms part of the municipal expenses, which I think you say were only 63 l. the last time?—No, the canvassing cost us nothing; they are all volunteer canvassers.

1807. Did the machinery for doing it altogether, committee-rooms, and books, and printing, and clerks, and so on, come to that amount?—Yes. We have generally a paid secretary during the election, because I could not do all this work myself. I could not devote the time to it; and I generally get a couple of men to make up the books, and so on, for me in the committee-room where I am working, and to give answers to anybody that comes to make inquiries.

1808. Do you think it would obviate what you disapprove of in canvassing if it were confined entirely to regular agents, who should not be accompanied by either employers of labour, or the candidates, or other persons likely to influence the voter?—I would do away with it entirely.

1809. You think that the fact of a person whom you knew nothing about, and who had no influence over you, calling upon you with a book, is in itself objectionable?—It is objectionable.

1810. Is it more objectionable than a person who had influence over you speaking to you in a quiet way?—The one is as bad as the other.

1811. You admit that you cannot prevent that?—If you meet a person in the street, and quietly put a question to him about his vote, I do not see how it is possible to prevent that.

1812. Do not you think that influence can be much more brought to bear in that way than merely by a disarrangement which is a matter of convenience, in order to enable a candidate to know what his strength is?—No, I do not think it could have the same influence.

1813. Then it is the book that does it?—It is not that, but because all this information that you get together is brought to one focus, and you know how the position stands; so many for, and so many against, and if a man says he will not promise, inquiry is made why he will not promise, and if they can bring any influence upon him, they bring it to bear.

1814. In fact, you object to doing that as a systematic business in an election?—Yes, I say let people come spontaneously forward and record their votes.

1815. Mr. James.] You stated that the bribery at the municipal elections takes place openly?—There has been no secrecy about it at all.

1816. From your knowledge of what does take place at the Parliamentary elections the bribery was more openly committed at the municipal elections?—Yes, I do not think that there was bribery at the last Parliamentary election.

1817. To what do you attribute the fact that bribery bribery takes place more openly at the municipal elections, both being against the law?—The opinion has gone abroad amongst the electors that there is no punishment for bribery at municipal elections.

1818. Do you think that they would regard it as a great crime if there were to be some punishment inflicted that could be speedily and cheaply inflicted?—I am afraid that with our present system of voting it would be of very little use; it would not deter people sufficiently.

1819. Mr. Graves.] Are you aware that there has been one case brought up before the county court judge under Mr. Cross's Act?—I saw it the other day in the newspaper.

1820. It did not seem a very difficult process, did it?—I saw the account in the paper, and it did not seem a very difficult process.

1821. It has never occurred to your mind, with all this bribery going on, to try and put the law in force?—We have talked about it frequently, but we never did anything.

1822. You have, I think, said that there has been a good deal of coercion used at Liverpool; did that apply to the municipal election or to the Parliamentary election?—It applied to both.

1823. Can you give any instances at all where coercion was used by any employer at the last Parliamentary election?—Not perhaps directly.

1824. Nor within your knowledge?—Not directly.

1825. You stated, did you not, that there was a good deal of drinking, although there was no bribery?—I do not think that there was any bribery, but there was a good deal of drinking.

1826. Where were you on the day of the last Parliamentary election?—I was knocking about the polling-booth the whole day.

1827. Did you see any drunken men?—Yes; many round the polling-booth.

1828. How long have you been living in Liverpool?—Twenty years.

1829. Have you seen many elections?—Yes.

1830. Did you ever see a more orderly one, looking at the number who voted, than the last one?—There was not a great amount of disorder.

1831. Did you ever see less drunkenness than there was on the last occasion?—I cannot say I did; but the honourable Member is aware that the system is very different now that the town is so much divided to what it was formerly.

1832. You have given the Committee the impression that there was a good deal of drinking at the last election, and I want to bring out the extent of it. Do you consider that there is a marked improvement, from your experience of the last 20 years, in the mode of conducting the Parliamentary elections in Liverpool?—I think there is a slight improvement.

1833. You seem to be strongly impressed with the idea that the ballot is the only remedy for all those evils?—That is one; I have weighed the matter frequently in my own mind.

1834. As a man who is deeply interested in the reform, I may say, of municipal and Parliamentary elections, do not you think that it would be wise to try and put the law in force first under the present system before you seek to change to one that you know nothing about?—I think, from the experience that we have had of the various Acts that have been introduced for punishing bribery and corruption, they have all seemed to me to be perfect failures.

1835. Supposing that the law were made as stringent as it reasonably can be for stopping all corrupt practices at elections, would you elect that the present system should be so improved, or would you still go for the ballot?—I would still go for the ballot.

1836. You say that there are 20 per cent. of the voters in your ward, I think, who are open to corrupt practices at the municipal elections; will you tell the Committee how those 20 per cent. would, under the ballot, be prevented from receiving bribes from two persons in place of one under the open system?—The only answer I can give is, that I do not think that either party would give them any money unless they received value for it.

1837. Then, it is only a question as to the candidate's motive; I presume that this 20 per cent. would remain the same?—It would remain just the same; they would get the money if they could.

1838. Speaking solely of this 20 per cent., and without any reference to the candidates, would not a secret system of voting give those men a double chance of getting money which they cannot have under the open system?—I do not see how it is possible.

1839. Will you explain why you think it is not possible, speaking of the voters alone?—This 20 per cent. who are purchaseable, there is no doubt, would take any money they could get, and I think they would be quite right in doing so if they can get it; but I do not believe that either party would attempt to give them money unless they got some guarantee that the men voted as they required them.

1841. Have you any ground for saying that the feeling in Liverpool is generally increasing in favour of the ballot?—Only from meeting with parties in conversation who seem to be very much dissatisfied with our open voting. The feeling does seem to be gaining ground, in my own experience; many who I know are strong Conservatives have quite given way and say, "It is quite time we had the ballot."

1842. What class of men are you speaking of?—Middle-class tradesmen of my own standing, men that I associate with.

1843. What is the feeling of the working men?—I do not mix amongst working men much, and I have no opportunity of saying what their feeling is.

1844. Are you aware whether the Liberal candidates at the last Parliamentary election in Liverpool advocated the ballot or not?—Mr. Massey did.

1845. Are you aware whether the Conservative candidates were in favour of the ballot?—No, they were opposed to it.

1846. Was Mr. Massey defeated who advocated the ballot?—Yes, he was.

1847. By a large majority?—Yes, by rather a large majority.

1848. And that would be an indication of the feeling of the majority of that large constituency, as adverse to the ballot?—There is no doubt that if we had the ballot the result would be very different.

1849. I merely want to bring out from you whether the opinion of the majority of the town upon upon the ballot was not expressed through their decision in the recent election?—I cannot say that it was the majority.

16 April 1869.

1850. But a very large number, I understood you to say, were against Mr. Massey?—Yes, but then the question is how many of that large number were coerced to vote in that way; I say that you had not the fair feeling of the people.

1851. You think that the value of votes has increased of late years in your ward?—Yes, for municipal purposes.

1852. Will you explain to the Committee how that is the case, if only one side have been tarred with this black brush that you have been using so strongly?—I do not suppose that the bribes have increased to any great extent in the amount of money; they have considerably increased in number; a man who got a few shillings a few years ago would now want 1 l.; a man who in 1864 would be bribed with 5 s., if you were to bribe him now would want 1 l.

1853. As you wish the Committee to believe that there is no competition in this bribery, will you explain to the Committee how it is that the price of votes is increasing?—It is increasing in this way, that many of those men will not vote under a certain price, that is, if two or three individuals vote, we will say, for 1 l., they will never vote for less than 1 l., and if you do not give them money they do not vote at all.

1854. Do you speak the views generally of your committee upon those points that you have been speaking of to-day?—I fancy that the committee generally coincide with the views which I am now stating.

1855. And with regard to the extent of corruption within that ward?—Yes, and many of them have even stronger opinions than I have.

1856. What is the name of the secretary to the Conservative Association in that ward, if there is one?—I do not know, they change every year; I think Mr. Bramhall was the secretary last year, and Mr. Reed was secretary the year before; I think Mr. Bramhall and Mr. Milburn were the two secretaries last year.

1857. Mr. Dalglish.] At the last Liverpool election was the ballot the question upon which the election principally turned?—No.

1858. Mr. Cross.] Should you have voted the same way at the last election if you had had the ballot?—Just the same.

1859. It made no difference with you?—Not a bit.

1860. As to those men who will not vote unless they get 5 l., we will call them the aristocracy of the people that are bribed, do you suppose that they would vote one whit more if they had the ballot?—They would want their 5 l. just as much.

1861. Whether they had open voting or not?—They would try to get it, there is no doubt about it.

1862. Does the bribery in the municipal elections that you have spoken of exist to the same extent in all the wards in Liverpool?—I do not think it does.

1863. Do you believe that any of the wards in Liverpool are, comparatively speaking, pure?—I do.

1864. How many of them?—Probably some half-dozen or so of them are pure out of 16; that is to say, I do not think that they are much influenced by money.

1865. Are those wards where the better educated class live?—Yes, that is so.

1866. How many wards do you consider perfectly bad?—Perhaps some seven or eight that really could be purchased.

1867. Are those the least educated wards?—They are the lower neighbourhoods, the least educated, or rather the poorer classes.

1868. Mr. Staveley Hill.] About what number did each of those gangs that you have referred to consist of?—They had formerly a very formidable gang of beerhouse keepers, but that gang has dwindled down from about 15 or 16 to something like six or seven of them.

1869. I understood you to say that there were gangs of those people who voted with their fugleman; do you know what the number of those gangs was?—I was then alluding to gangs among the working men, who clubbed themselves together in fives and sixes.

1870. What was about the sum of money given at the last election to each of those gangs of five or six?—I am not prepared to say; on the last polling day, shortly after three o'clock, I went into the polling booth, and a very active partisan upon the other side came and asked permission from the alderman to allow him to come in while those men polled, and I think there were 13 of them polled then, one after the other.

1871. Did they all come in a gang?—Yes, they all came in a gang, and they all voted together except one man, and he voted the opposite way, and I whispered to this partisan, and I said, "You did not square that man, then?" but he said, "All right;" and he went out, and all those men went back again into the public-house, to the "Pontack," where the committee-room was held.

1872. What was the price that you think was given for those men?—I cannot say, but there was a gang of six of them, and I expect they got about a sovereign each; I do not say this lot, but another gang of six got a sovereign each.

1873. They were headed by some one, a fugleman?—Yes, one man at the head of them came to myself, and I spoke to him.

1874. Did that one fugleman receive the money for the gang?—No, I do not believe he did.

1875. Do you know at all?—I do not know positively.

1876. What is your belief?—I believe they each got their money separately, because they came out of the house showing that sovereign openly.

1877. From whom would they have received it?—From some person; I do not know who.

1878. Some person who would be at the house to which they went back?—Yes.

1879. At the last election, what number polled in St. Anne's Ward altogether?—At the last municipal election, 446 out of 553.

1880. How many candidates were there, and how were the votes divided?—There were two candidates; the Conservatives polled 229, and the Liberals 217.

1881. And you say that, out of this number who so polled, about 88 would be bribed?—No, the 88 that I spoke of referred to the Parliamentary election who had promised us, but voted against us.

1882. You told the Committee that of the municipal voters about 20 per cent. are corrupt; out out of 446 that would be about 88?—There would be about 120 who were purchaseable upon the whole register.

1883. How many of those 446 at that election, do you think, were bought?—I cannot make the division as to the numbers that were bought, but there were a very considerable number of them; I should think there were fully 20 per cent. of them that were bought.

1884. Mr. Leatham.] I think you said that the fugleman did not pay the voters himself, so far as you are aware?—No, I think they got it separately.

1885. You think that they would not trust a fugleman to receive the money for them?—I do not know that it would be from a distrust of that kind.

1886. Do you think that they would promise their votes conditionally on the election of a particular candidate without receiving the money before they voted?—I have known instances previous to 1865, with reference to this beer-house gang that I have referred to before, where the money has been paid a week beforehand, and they could strictly rely upon them.

1887. Would they promise their vote without having received the money?—They would not without receiving the money, or the promise of a bribe.

1888. Would the promise of a bribe, to be received after an election, be sufficient?—They would take the man's word that he would give them the money.

1889. What kind of man's word would they take?—The gentleman probably who had canvassed them, or some one that was in an official capacity.

1890. Somebody whom they knew well?—Yes.

1891. They would not trust a man in the moon?—They would not trust a stranger.

1892. Was not Mr. Rathbone a local man, and well known in Liverpool, and much respected at the time of the Parliamentary election?—Yes.

1893. Was Mr. Massey so well known in Liverpool?—He was not.

1894. Do not you think that that was one reason why Mr. Rathbone polled a greater number of votes than Mr. Massey?—Certainly; on account of his being a local man.

1895. You were asked whether it was possible to decide between two Liberal candidates before an election, and whether could you suggest any method by which that might be done; it did not perhaps occur to you that a preliminary ballot of some kind might be taken when there are two candidates of the same class of opinions?—I was never placed in that position, where we had two Liberal candidates brought forward. The thing is possible, and in that case gentlemen would form themselves into a committee, and one gentleman might name one as a fit and proper person to be elected, and another might second him, and the same with regard to the other candidate; and it is very likely that the question would be put to the vote of the meeting, as to which should be invited to stand.

1896. You have mentioned that almost the only reason why prosecutions were not instituted was that they were expensive; is there not a feeling in Liverpool that after the contest is over it is better to let bygones be bygones?—It was so upon the last election, the one previous to that we went as far as to get up evidence for a petition against the sitting Members.

1897. Mr. Brand.] You have been asked several questions with regard to the practice of systematic canvassing, and you object very strongly to it; has it occurred to you that the adoption of secret voting would tend to diminish that practice?—I think it would.

1898. Sir George Grey.] I think you said that at one election, which you called an extraordinary one, since 1865, no bribery took place?—At the extraordinary election in December 1866, where there was no money spent on either side, and we polled more than two to one.

1899. What was the total number of votes polled in the whole election out of the constituency?—Two hundred and twenty-eight out of 553.

1900. Is not that much below the number that ordinarily polled?—Yes, very much below the number.

1901. How do you account for the small number of voters that polled on the only occasion when there was no bribery?—On account of the absence of money.

1902. Do you believe that if bribery were stopped, the municipal electors would not take so much interest in the elections, and would not poll in such large numbers?—In the case of those people who now refrain from voting from want of money, if it was known that there was none to be got, the probability is that they would record their votes in the ordinary way.

1903. You said that you did not hold any of your meetings in your ward at public-houses; is that the common practice in Liverpool, or does it apply only to your side in that ward?—There are some other wards, I believe, that hold them at private houses; we find it answer our purpose very much better, we gain a more industrious class of working men; we have a number of teetotallers upon our committee.

1904. But has the usual practice in Liverpool, both at the municipal and the Parliamentary elections, been to hold committees at public-houses?—It has been usual, speaking generally, to hold committees at public-houses, previous to the last Parliamentary election. We had no wards where their meetings were held at public-houses at the last Parliamentary election; in all the 16 wards their committee-rooms were in private houses.

1905. Do the wards exist for the purpose of the Parliamentary as well as the municipal elections in the arrangements made by each party?—They are rather more subdivided, and made into polling districts for the Parliamentary elections.

1906. You spoke of a good deal of drunkenness habitually occurring at those elections; does that apply both to the municipal and to the Parliamentary?—Yes, to both.

1907. What do you suppose would be the effect of closing all the public-houses during the Parliamentary and the municipal elections?—I believe that the closing of public-houses from 6 o'clock the night before the election to 6 o'clock at night on the day of the election would be a very great boon to the public; it would put a check to drunkenness, and tend to promote morality.

1908. Will you state why you object to the nomination day?—It merely affords an opportunity for men to show a greater amount of bad feeling.

1909. Supposing there is a mixed meeting at which

which the candidates appear to express their opinions, how does it differ in that respect from the nomination day?—From my experience on the days of nomination there are often very unseemly sights indeed, and they would be far better done away with; and I do not see why we should have more tumult than takes place at the municipal elections.

1910. What has taken place at the Parliamentary elections at Liverpool which makes you wish to see the nomination days given up; have the proceedings been very disorderly?—Very disorderly; if you happened to be half a dozen yards from the speaker you could not hear what he said; it has been all dumb show.

1911. Did not the different candidates address public meetings at the same time previous to the election?—Yes.

1912. Did you attend those meetings?—Yes.

1913. Were those of the same character as the nomination meeting?—No, we had very little interruption at our public meetings.

1914. Were they mixed meetings, politically speaking, or were they meetings of the supporters of the respective candidates?—Generally speaking, of the supporters of the candidates.

1915. Then there would not be likely to be so much disturbance?—We did not exclude the Conservatives. For instance, I myself am very friendly with Conservatives, and I took one or two of them with me to try and make converts of them if I could.

1916. Did any mixed meetings take place at which the opposing candidates appeared and subjected themselves to questions as occurs at the hustings?—At the public meetings that we had, anyone was quite at liberty to ask the candidates any question; in fact, an opportunity was generally given for it by the chairman, who would say that if anybody present wished to ask the candidate any question he could do so.

1917. You do not attribute the evils which you think attach to nomination days to drunkenness, but to party feeling?—To party feeling.

1918. Are the nomination days in Liverpool always of the same character, so that none of the candidates can be heard?—I have generally been upon the hustings, and at the last occasion I only stood a very short distance from Mr. Graves, but I could not hear all that he said in his address.

1919. Does the nomination take place out of doors or in-doors?—The hustings is covered, but it is out of doors; it is a temporary erection for the occasion.

1920. What number of people do you suppose were present?—Many thousands.

1921. Do you think it would be a proper thing to abolish the nomination day, and to give the constituency no opportunity of seeing the candidates together?—Yes, it would be far better to do so than to continue the unseemly sights that we now have.

1922. Mr. Villiers.] You do not mean to imply that yours is the worst ward, or the only bad ward, in Liverpool, do you?—No, but there are not many others quite so notorious as our ward.

1923. You do not mean to say that the same practices are not resorted to in other wards that there are in yours?—In some of the other wards they are. The town is divided into 16 wards.

1924. Generally speaking, what you have been speaking of to-day is the practice in Liverpool at the time of elections?—Yes, exactly so.

1925. When you say that a person who is a resident of Liverpool has a better chance than a stranger, do you think that that is independent of his character, and is simply owing to the influence which he can bring to bear upon the electors?—I do not know that it would be entirely dependent upon his character; but if he was a suitable man, and there was no stain upon him, I think being a local man he would have a far better chance than a stranger.

1926. You say that Mr. Massey had not so good a chance as Mr. Rathbone, because he was a local gentleman; that is, because Mr. Rathbone was very much respected in Liverpool, is it not?—I think Mr. Rathbone had a better chance over Mr. Massey on account of being a local man. They knew him and his family, and he was very much respected; in fact, all the family have been very highly respected.

1927. But you do not connect that with undue influence?—No, I do not.

1928. Mr. Fawcett.] Do you think that it would conduce to the purity of elections if it were made illegal to hold public meetings or committees at public-houses or hotels?—Yes, I think it would greatly conduce to the purity of elections.

1929. Do you think there would be any practical difficulty in preventing them being held at public-houses?—I think there would be very little practical difficulty in preventing it. We find it answer our purpose to hold meetings in private houses.

1930. There are plenty of places, are there not, in such a town as Liverpool to give the candidates a fair opportunity of speaking, even if they did not speak at public-houses?—Yes.

Mr. WILLIAM JOHNSON, called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. Johnson.

1931. Chairman.] I BELIEVE you live in Liverpool?—I do.

1932. In what business are you?—I am a flour dealer.

1933. In what ward do you live?—In the north and south, Toxteth.

1934. Have you a shop in Toxteth, north and south?—I have two in each.

1935. Do both the wards touch each other?—They do.

1936. Do you know what number of municipal voters and Parliamentary electors they contain?—We have in the united wards 2,415 municipal voters, and 6,680 Parliamentary voters.

1937. What is the character of the voters?—In the neighbourhood of the docks it is densely populated with the lower working classes; that is to say, the South Ward in particular; and in the remainder of the wards, the middle class, the shopkeeping class, chiefly reside.

1938. Have you taken much part in the municipal or the Parliamentary elections?—Not an active part till recently, these last seven years.

1939. How long before you took part in them actively had you observed them?—I have watched them these last seven years, both the municipal and Parliamentary elections.

1940. What opinion have you formed about those those municipal and Parliamentary elections?—I believe that every municipal election during that period, with one or two exceptions in the North Ward, has been altogether corrupt.

1941. Are you only speaking of the elections in those two wards?—I confine myself to those two wards.

1942. In your opinion, has that corruption increased or decreased of late years?—It is decidedly increasing.

1943. Can you say that positively, or is it only surmise?—Positively from personal observation.

1944. Do contests take place at every election?—Not all.

1945. I presume that no money is spent, except when a contest takes place?—Except when a contest takes place, no money is spent.

1946. How have you been able to ascertain this?—By seeing the money paid.

1947. Have you with your own eyes seen it paid?—I have.

1948. Did you observe the election of 1867?—I did. In 1867, a brewer, who owned a large number of public-houses in the neighbourhood, stood for South Toxteth, and bribery on that occasion was done by drink tickets and by money. The drink tickets were given to the canvassers some days before, and also during and after the election; the ticket had a motto upon it, and on presentation at certain public-houses, drink could be had in exchange. I saw several voters with several tickets in their hands, with the motto upon them, "Little pigs make the best pork." That arose out of the circumstance, I believe, of the guardians eating the pork at the workhouse.

1949. Were those tickets much made use of?—They were very freely used.

1950. You saw them used?—Yes, I saw them; customers complain frequently at my shops that those elections send their husbands on the spree for weeks afterwards, and it was notorious that for a week or 10 days drunkenness was in excess in that quarter of the town. I believe, on that occasion, at least one third of the voters were bribed, either by money or drink.

1951. By one side, or by both sides?—By both sides on that occasion.

1952. Can you form any opinion of what sum was spent by the successful candidate, the brewer?—It is currently reported that it cost the successful candidate 1,100*l.*; but the increased custom at his public-houses was such that he got something for his outlay.

1953. You do not mean to say that he was not out of pocket?—He was not out of pocket, as current report says, and I believe it came from himself.

1954. Do you mean that the voters drank great quantities of beer in addition to the quantity mentioned on the tickets which had been given?—Yes, I do, for weeks afterwards his houses were thronged for nights and days.

1955. By whom was this brewer opposed?—By a Liberal chemist and druggist.

1956. Did he spend much money?—I believe his party did; that was in 1867.

1957. In that case the corruption was practised chiefly by means of drink tickets?—Drink tickets and money.

1958. The chemist, I suppose, bribed with money?—I suppose his party did.

1959. Sir George Grey.] Did they give no drink tickets on the other side?—None whatever, to the best of my knowledge.

1960. Chairman.] Can you state any particulars of the election of last year?—Yes; the candidate last year was not a brewer, and the corruption on that occasion was chiefly by money.

1961. Did you see anything of the way in which the corruption was practised?—Yes, I did; as the voters went to the polling-booth they were directed by one of an organised staff to go to a certain house close by, and there they were shown into a room where the candidate's son was seated at a table with a bag of money.

1962. Did you see this?—I saw the parties going in, and I saw them come out with the money.

1963. You were not in the room, I presume? I was not in the room.

1964. But you saw them come out with money in their hands?—Yes, I did, with money in their hands, some hundreds of them.

1965. Do you know under whose management those arrangements were carried out?—The arrangements were carried out by one of the assessors of the ward, who sat in the polling-booth along with the presiding alderman during the day.

1966. Will you explain how those arrangements were carried on under the management of an assessor, who as I understand was seated in the polling-booth?—The arrangements were all made previous to that; but even in his capacity as assessor he told a party in my presence (as I was chairman of the Liberal candidate I went to the polling-booth) to go to the next door, where money was being paid.

1967. He sent on the voters to the place where they could get money?—Yes, several he sent on; but there was a party there outside, one of the canvassers on his staff whose duty it was to take them to the door.

1968. Can you form any opinion how many out of the whole number of voters were bribed at that election?—There were 544 votes recorded for the successful candidate, and I am morally certain there were 500 that received money.

1969. And of those you saw a large number that had received the money?—Yes, I saw them with the money in their hands; I watched the whole of the day.

1970. And did this bribery go on on both sides at that election?—There was none whatever on the opposite side; it was our condition that there should be nothing of the kind.

1971. How many did the unsuccessful side poll?—One hundred and thirty-four.

1972. What sums did you see paid at this election?—I did not see any paid; but I saw some that had been paid 5*s.*, 7*s.* 6*d.*, and 10*s.*

1973. Were any proceedings taken in consequence of those practices?—After the municipal elections last year there was a public meeting called for the purpose of taking into consideration the best means of putting down bribery and other corrupt practices at the municipal and the Parliamentary elections, and I was elected a member of that committee.

1974. Was that a ward meeting, or a town meeting?—A public meeting of the town in the Law Association Rooms in November immediately after the elections. The bribery was so very extensive that it was thought necessary that there should be some steps taken to put a stop to it.

Mr. W. Johnson. 16 April 1869.

it. From the information that I had, I communicated with several members of that committee, and steps were taken to institute an inquiry; we found that there was sufficient evidence to proceed against the candidate's son, and we summoned the candidate's son under Mr. Cross's Act for the 40 s. penalty, and a verdict was obtained; I have the report of the trial here from various newspapers; the penalty was 40 s. and the full costs of the suit.

1975. Sir George Grey.] What did the costs amount to?—I have not ascertained that; in fact it is not known yet.

1976. Chairman.] Did it cost your committee anything?—Yes, a considerable sum, but that is not known; in fact, it required a very large sum in order to get witnesses and to get information; I gave the parties names, and there was a person employed to get up the evidence.

1977. You cannot tell the Committee what sum it has cost or will cost the Liverpool committee?—I cannot. The secretary, who is also a solicitor, was asked what would be the amount, and he said he did not know exactly, but it would be very considerable, more than the committee thought of.

1978. What do you expect it will be?—Really I have no idea; I could not form an idea.

1979. Would it be more than 100 l.?—I should think it would be 100 l. at least.

1980. Did you only prosecute one person?—We only prosecuted one person, in order to test whether we could reach him by Mr. Cross's Act. It is now in consideration to go on with another, to prosecute the assessor who organised the whole matter.

1981. Do not you think that the same evidence that you used upon the one case would do upon the other?—I should think so.

1982. Has the result of that prosecution had no effect upon the councillor?—None whatever; he is still in the council, and has not resigned.

1983. You were not able, I suppose, to prove bribery against him?—We could not; not directly.

1984. And being unable to prove personal bribery against him, you could not remove him from the council?—We could not remove him from the council.

1985. You say that it is in contemplation to take proceedings against the assessor; has he since been elected overseer?—He has; he was elected by the vestry; myself and several other ratepayers went to the county magistrates and opposed him, and we were successful, as they did not consider him to be a proper person, being implicated in the manner he was, in the matter of bribing the South Toxteth Ward.

1986. But that has not yet been proved, has it?—It has not been proved against him; but his name came out so very prominently as being the moving spirit that he might have been the defendant instead of a witness, as he was obliged to be.

1987. Does his name come prominently forward in these reports which you have of the trial?—It does, very prominently indeed.

1988. Then, from the fact of this gentleman being elected to the office of overseer, it does not appear that his proceedings at this election met with any very general reprobation?—His election was effected in such a manner that it was rather suspicious, because the night before, he got his party who assist him in these elections to go round and beat up the ratepayers; I will not say to fill the room entirely, because there was plenty of room, but there was a certain number that never would have been there had they not been canvassed the night before.

1989. When did his election as overseer take place?—In the first week in April, this month; and he has since been returned as a poor law guardian; I heard of that this morning.

1990. Would that gentleman have anything to do with the preparation of the lists?—The overseers have the entire supervision of the lists, and I think that he is not a proper person to be in that office.

1991. And he is not in, as I understand you?—He is not in; the magistrates would not ratify his appointment.

1992. Were those elections which you have described conducted peaceably or otherwise?—At both the elections the polling-booths were blocked by the treated and bribed voters; so much so that no respectable persons could really go and record their votes; that is to say, if they were known to be of adverse politics; but their own party were always led up by one of this organised staff, and the crowd immediately opened and let them pass, but no one else was allowed to pass.

1993. Was any violence used?—None whatever, except, of course, violence in the way of shouldering, and not giving way.

1994. Was there much drunkenness?—A great amount of drunkenness. On that occasion, the night before, I went to a certain public house where they held their committee. I went with one of their own party, and he showed me a room in which there were at least 60 or 70 people all absolutely drunk; and they were kept there during the night, and taken up in a body the next morning to vote; and those were the parties together with others that blocked the polling-booth.

1995. Have you taken any interest in the Parliamentary elections as well as in the municipal elections?—I have of late, since our esteemed Member, Mr. Graves, was returned the first time.

1996. Do you consider that there is any connection between the municipal elections and the Parliamentary elections?—I do, for this reason: they have an organised staff, and the same parties, almost without an exception, who conduct the municipal election every year are there to conduct the canvass for the Parliamentary election; and I know of my own knowledge, that parties whom I have spoken to on the last election, on being asked how they were going to vote, said that they were going to vote for the people that gave them money; I said, "There is no money to be given on this occasion, it is a very dangerous thing"; and the reply was, "If we get money every November we shall give our votes to those who give us money in November"; and that is why I think the municipal election have very great influence upon the Parliamentary elections.

1997. You do not think that there was any bribery at the Parliamentary election?—I do not think there was any bribery; there was perhaps a little coercion and intimidation.

1998. Do you think that the bribery that was practised at the municipal election had an effect upon the Parliamentary election?—Yes, decidedly.

1999. Can you tell the Committee anything as to the system of bottling at the Parliamentary elections?—No, I cannot.

2000. Is the system of bottling carried on in the municipal elections?—Yes, I have seen it. I have seen, as I have just said a short time ago, the night before the election of 1867, 60 or 70, or perhaps more, parties in the room who were I may say beastly drunk, nothing better, and they were kept there until the morning, when they had a breakfast and were taken up to the polling-booth in a body.

2001. Were they induced to stay there, or were they locked up?—I do not know whether they were locked up, but there was a party who was in charge at the door keeping them there. I heard that they were locked up, but that I cannot say for a certainty.

2002. You were able, were you, to go in yourself?—No; the door was opened to me to show me the number that they had ready for the morning.

2003. Did you belong to any party in that election?—I did not, and I do not. I am of no party. I have plumped for my friend Mr. Graves, and I have voted the opposite side. I have no strong feeling in politics; all I want is to see this corruption and bribery done away with.

2004. Are you in favour of closing the public-houses on the day of the election?—Decidedly.

2005. Are you also in favour of forbidding the use of public-houses for committee-rooms?—I think that it would have a very beneficial effect if committees were not held in public-houses, because it is a matter of impossibility that either the central committee or the candidate himself can prevent indiscreet people from treating. I think it has a very injurious effect, and I have seen a vast amount of drunkenness arising from committees being held at public-houses.

2006. Do you think that public opinion in Liverpool would sanction such a change of the law as to prohibit the use of public-houses for this purpose?—I think so. I was speaking to some very strong partisans who were very actively engaged for Mr. Graves at the last election, and they were decidedly of that opinion.

2007. Is that feeling shared by respectable persons on both sides?—Yes, by respectable persons on both sides.

2008. But amongst certain of the lower class who are open to bribery or treating, it would be unpopular, would it not?—I think it would be unpopular with them.

2009. Have you formed an opinion with regard to open or secret voting?—I have been coming these last four or five years to the conclusion that really secret voting would be better than open voting.

2010. What has induced you to come to that conclusion?—I have known a vast amount of coercion and intimidation in former times, and even at the last borough election in Liverpool, which was one of the purest we have had, it was considerable. I know an employer of labour who had something like 23 voters in his employ; and, the night before, the foremen went to the works and told them that they must vote for Mr. Graves and Lord Sandon, and out of this lot of 23 I believe there were 18 holding Liberal opinions, and they were taken up the next morning in a body by a junior member of the firm. Two absolutely refused to vote, and there was quite a scene at the polling-booth; the others recorded their votes; but two that they thought had voted for Mr. Graves and Lord Sandon actually voted for Mr. Massey and Mr. Rathbone unknown to them.

2011. How would they poll unknown?—They put in their voting cards; they had in their pockets Graves and Sandon's card, as well as Massey and Rathbone's card, and they put in Massey and Rathbone's card.

2012. How do you know that this took place?—By one of the men, who told me the following morning. I met the employer that day and taxed him with it. At first he pooh-poohed it; and I said, "Well, I have had it from very good authority"; and, after a little conversation, I could see that he was somewhat flurried in the face, and I said, "I am afraid it is too true." As we were talking, another friend, a mutual friend of both of us, came up, and I continued the conversation, and at last he admitted it. He said, "Well, it is only what has been done on the other side." I said, "I do not know what has been done on the other side"; but I said, "You are the last man in the world that I should have thought would have taken an advantage of any man." I said, "I have got parties in my own employ, and I never asked who they were going to vote for. I know three of them voted for Mr. Graves and Lord Sandon, and three or four voted the opposite way; but I never asked who they were going to vote for"; and, as I say, he admitted that such was the case.

2013. Do you know what happened to the two who refused to vote, and the two who voted the other way?—I do not.

2014. You do not know whether the employer took any steps against them?—I saw another member of the firm, and I was telling him the names of those who voted the other way, and he said, "The scoundrels for turning traitor, I will kick them out of the place."

2015. But you do not know whether he carried his threat into expectation, or not?—I do not.

2016. In consequence of those things, you are now an advocate of the ballot?—I am.

came to me; of course I could see how the wind was blowing, and he said, if I did not vote for Graves and Sandon, I should be the first that would go; we were very slack, and I felt satisfied that I should have to be turned away." That was another instance.

2018. Were you a member of Messrs. Massey and Rathbone's committee?—I was not; I was chairman at the last municipal election for the Liberal candidate, but not at the Parliamentary election.

2019. Mr. Fawcett.] You plumped for Mr. Graves, did you not?—Not on the last occasion, but on the former occasion.

2020. Chairman.] How did you vote at the last Parliamentary election?—I voted for Messrs. Massey and Rathbone; in 1865 I plumped for Mr. Graves.

2021. Have you any reason to suppose that the practices which you have described are entirely confined to one side, or are the others equally guilty?—They have been on both sides; but on the last occasion I took the degree of chairman of the Liberal candidate on condition that there was not the value of a hair of my head given in bribery, and that there should only be legitimate expenses.

2022. But it is probable, is it not, that such coercion and intimidation as you have described is not confined to one side, but takes place on each side?—I believe so.

2023. Mr. Fawcett.] When you said you were chairman and there was no bribery, you meant at the municipal election, not the Parliamentary election?—Yes, at the municipal election last November.

2024. Chairman.] Has any intimidation or pressure exercised by workmen on one another come under your notice?—Not under my immediate notice; I have heard of it, but I cannot speak of it from personal knowledge in Liverpool during the last election.

2025. Mr. Villiers.] You say, do you not, that there was no money given at the time of the last Parliamentary election?—I believe not; I have not heard of any.

2026. But it is either money and influence at the municipal election, or coercion and influence at the Parliamentary election, and you say that that is pretty general?—It is.

2027. What is the class of persons that you refer to as receiving money at the elections; are they a very low class?—They are a very low class of persons.

2028. Do they live in cellars, or in rooms?—In cellars and courts; I may say they are the mass of the dock labourers and the working classes in general.

2029. But are they rated?—Yes, they are what are termed compound householders, and those that are rated directly.

2030. If they are on the rate-book they are entitled to vote, are they not, if they have resided long enough?—Yes; three years is necessary for the municipal election.

2031. And it is the same with respect to the Parliamentary, wherever they live, whether it is in a cellar or a garret, they have a vote?—Yes, if the rating is sufficient, they have.

2032. There is no qualification?—Yes, they are qualified by being rated.

2033. Were you present at the time of the proceeding in the county court that you have referred to?—I was.

2034. What was the nature of the evidence; that is to say, of what class were the witnesses?—There was one Patrick Dean, who was a labourer living in a court in Darnley-street, Toxteth Park.

2035. Were they persons who had received money?—Yes; this party is considered to have very great influence over his neighbours; he is, I may say, a kind of foreman of the lumpers. The agent of the Conservative candidate made an appointment with him, and it was agreed to give him so much money, as much as he got the year before, namely, 30*s.* for himself and 15*s.* per man for every man that he brought up.

2036. And this man was procured as a witness?—Yes, and he gave evidence of all those practices.

2038. But there was no money offered to him to give evidence, was there?—No, there was no money offered to him to give evidence.

2040. They probably do not believe it to be an offence against the law?—No, they do not.

2041. With regard to the settling of the lists of the voters at the municipal elections, did you say that the overseer prepares them?—He does not prepare the register; he has a supervision over the register.

2042. The municipal lists are revised, are they not, by the mayor, or some person in authority?—They are revised.

2043. By whom are they revised?—There is a revising assessor.

2044. Is there an assessor retained for that purpose?—Yes, I think so.

2045. Who was the person that you described as the assessor who was with the returning officer, is he a public authority?—No; he is a boot and shoemaker.

2046. Was he thought of sufficient importance to judge of the validity of the votes?—Yes, he is a very important man, because he managed the whole affair for the party, and has done for years; I have heard him say, only give him the money and I will put anyone in the council he thinks proper.

2048. Was he paid for that purpose?—I believe not.

2049. Who was the returning officer?—The alderman of the ward is the returning officer.

2050. The alderman of the ward was perfectly cognisant, was he, of what was doing?—Yes; he gave evidence on the trial, and he stated so.

2051. You

2051. You stated, did you not, that the assessor told the people where they were to go and get the money after they had given their votes?—On several occasions, and the alderman immediately got up and checked it; he said he would not allow anything of the kind.

2052. Is the alderman a magistrate?—He is a borough magistrate, and, I think, a county one also.

2053. You alluded, did you not, to some gentleman who gave drink tickets who was a brewer?—The assessor had charge of the tickets, and he was the secretary for the brewer.

2054. Was the brewer a magistrate?—No.

2055. He was in the council, was he not?—He is now; but he was not in at that time.

2056. Does he appoint the police?—I really cannot answer that question.

2058. This brewer has public-houses, has he not?—Yes, he has a great number.

2059. And he is supposed to have recouped himself by the custom that he got?—It is currently reported that he did so.

2060. Was it beer-houses or public-houses that he had?—Licensed public-houses.

2061. Who grants the licenses?—The magistrates.

2062. You are not afraid, are you, of the same practice going on if you had the ballot in voting?—I do not think it would be possible that they could go on in a manner they have been; I do not think people would pay their money on an uncertainty.

2063. And if they did pay the money, you say that people are pretty ready to come and give evidence afterwards that they have received it?—Yes, in this case they were ready.

2064. Do you know anything of the other wards in Liverpool?—I do not, I merely confine myself to the wards that I have an interest in; I have not meddled with the other wards at all.

2065. Is it the general report in Liverpool that there are the same practices in all the other wards?—Not in all the other wards; I believe there are some that the corruption does not extend to, but there are others quite as bad as Toxteth Park.

2066. What are the wards where those practices do not exist?—I should think Abercrombie Ward would be one.

2070. Do they agree with you?—I was speaking to several the night before last who are very strong partisans and members of Mr. Graves' committee, and they have come to the conclusion that the time has arrived when we must have the ballot, several have expressed themselves strongly in that way.

2071. Mr. Graves.] Could you give the number of votes that were polled in 1867?—No, I could not give the number exactly; in 1867, as near as I can remember, there were something like 500 recorded for the successful candidate and about 150 or 160 for the unsuccessful one; upon the last occasion there were 544 for the successful one and 134 for the non-successful one.

2073. Do you mean that there was a majority for the Conservative candidate of 1,800 in the two wards?—Yes, there was a great majority.

2074. I think you said that there were 500 men who were corrupt, and voted from corrupt influence in the municipal election?—I did.

2075. You have also said that you considered that the municipal election exercised a direct influence upon the Parliamentary?—Yes.

2076. Looking to the fact that there had been 1,800 majority in those wards for the Conservative candidates, do you consider that the 500 corrupt voters (for you confine it to that number) had any influence whatever upon the result of the majority?—Yes, some influence, but not to the extent of 500.

2077. Then you still further modify it?—Yes, I would say not to the extent of 500, because I know such was not the case, but it had a very great influence; the same parties that voted Conservative last November voted for the Conservative candidate at the last Parliamentary election.

2078. You do not wish the Committee to understand that the majority of 1,800 was composed of more than 500 of those men whom you consider influenced by corrupt motives?—Not at all.

2079. You have, I think, led the Committee to believe that the last Parliamentary election was, on the whole, as pure, if not purer, than any that had preceded it in your experience?—Than any that I have experience, it was.

2080. Do you consider that that was at all attributable to the fact that a very stringent Bribery Act was hanging over the town?—Yes, I think so.

2081. Then, you think that that had a direct influence in stopping bribery?—I think it had.

2082. Might we not argue from that, that if we had also a similar stringent Act with regard to municipal elections, it might exercise some deterring influence upon corruption at the municipal elections?—I think so; I think there ought to be a public prosecutor, and the facility ought to be very great for arriving at something definite a short time after the election.

2083. You think that there ought to be greater facilities given for making amenable to justice anyone who had so offended against the laws?—Yes, I do think so.

2085. Do you think if there were more polling places you would have many more voters?—Decidedly; I know that on the last occasion, I may say, scores of my friends and neighbours went away because they could not get near the polling-booth in consequence of its being crowded; and, of course, it was blocked for the purpose.

2086. Do you not consider that multiplying the number of polling places would rather increase the facilities for improper practices?—I do not see that myself; I think the danger is all over when it comes to that point; I think the evil has been done before that.

2087. You do not think that would have much influence one way or the other?—I do not see myself that it would; it would not do away with either intimidation or bribery.

2088. Have you formed any strong opinion with regard to the sufficiency or insufficiency of the number of polling places at the Parliamentary elections, for the purpose of giving more facilities than at present for working men to vote?—I have not; but I have formed a strong opinion upon that point, with regard to the municipal elections, because I have noticed them more than the Parliamentary.

2089. Mr. Fawcett.] Was there much treating at the last Parliamentary election at Liverpool?—I think not; I did not see anything of it.

2090. In reply to the Chairman, you said that it would be advantageous to prohibit committees being held in public-houses, do you think it would be equally advantageous to prohibit public meetings being held there during the election?—I would have no meetings at all held at public-houses, there are sufficient opportunities to hold meetings without public-houses.

2091. Holding meetings at public-houses often leads to treating, does it not?—It does, decidedly.

2093. Have you paid canvassers in Liverpool?—Yes, there are paid canvassers.

2094. Both at the municipal and the Parliamentary elections?—The same staff are generally employed for the one and for the other.

2095. Do you think that the fact of employing paid canvassers tends to make the election impure?—I do; I think it is a very bad system.

2096. Should you have any objection to forbid the employment of paid canvassers?—I should have no objection; I object to paid canvassers altogether.

2097. And you would welcome a law to forbid them?—I would.

2098. You do not think there would be any practicable difficulty in carrying it out?—I think not.

2099. Have you any idea what is the average expense of a Parliamentary election at Liverpool?—I have not any idea.

2100. It would probably be many thousand pounds on each side?—Yes, no doubt.

2101. Do you see any means, besides forbidding the employment of paid canvassers, of diminishing the expenses of Parliamentary elections?—I think we ought to do away with cabs.

2102. They are done away with in boroughs, are they not?—Yes, they are.

2103. By shutting up the public-houses on the day of the polling, and forbidding meetings and committees at them, that would also diminish the expenses?—Yes.

2104. And forbidding paid canvassers also?—Yes.

2105. The expenses are so large now that none but a very wealthy man can have a chance, I suppose, of standing?—None but a wealthy man.

2106. Do you think there would be any objection in the town to throw the necessary expenses of conducting a Parliamentary election upon the rates, in the same way as the municipal expenses are now thrown upon the rates?—I cannot answer that; I have heard that subject broached, but I really do not know as to the feeling of the town. I have no opinion upon it.

2107. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] What is the number of the Parliamentary constituency of Liverpool?—I think nearly 40,000.

2108. Are they nearly all residents?—I should say so, or the greatest portion of them.

2110. With regard to not holding meetings in public-houses, I presume in Liverpool you have large rooms where meetings could be held?—Yes; there is every facility in the shape of large rooms for holding meetings.

2111. Has it ever occurred to you that there might be a good many places in the country where no large room could be found except at a public-house?—Yes; no doubt that would be so in the country, but not in the borough of Liverpool.

2112. Do not you think that there might even be parts of the metropolis where no public room could be obtained except at a public-house?—I am not so well acquainted with the metropolis.

2113. Your answer simply applies to what would be practicable in Liverpool?—It applies to Liverpool only.

2114. Can you tell me whether it is legal to pay for the conveyance of voters to the poll at the municipal elections?—It is legal at the municipal elections, unfortunately.

2115. Is it the practice in Liverpool for the candidates to do so?—It is.

2118. Did you take an active part in the municipal election of 1867 that you told us of?—I did not take any active part; I merely was an observer.

2119. Therefore, you can give us no facts as to the bribery which you spoke of?—Yes; I can give you a number of facts, although I did not take any active part.

2120. You told us some facts with regard to bribery on the side opposed to you at that election; but none as far as I could learn with regard to bribery on your own side?—On the opposite side I know there was bribery; I have heard it from the parties themselves; in fact, I know where money was given.

2121. I understood you to say that in 1867 both sides bribed?—Yes, decidedly.

2122. But nothing came under your notice as regards regards your own side?—I did not take any active part in 1867, though I know that there was money given.

2123. And yet you have given instances of money having been given, and how it was given on the opposite side?—Yes, I saw that; in fact, I saw several cases where money in the same open way was given on the Liberal side. In one case I know a man was called on one side, and told, "I will give you so much if you will vote for So-and-so."

2124. I understand that no prosecutions were the result of that election?—None whatever.

2125. Both sides being equally guilty?—Yes.

2126. Mr. Locke.] You stated, did you not, that there was a revising barrister at the revision of the list for the municipal election?—I believe that is so.

2127. Is not this the case that the revision of the list of voters is made by the mayor and two assessors in open court between October the 1st and October the 15th, 28 days' notice having first been given, and are not those two assessors persons who are employed by the mayor?—They are; the two assessors receive their appointment from the mayor.

2128-35. Then there is no revising barrister?—Now you call it to my mind, I was not quite clear about it; it is the mayor who is the authority at the municipal elections, and the two assessors.

2136. Every person whose name is inserted in the burgess list may object to any other person as not being entitled to have his name retained on the list?—He may object.

2137. He may do so on or before Septemher the 15th?—Yes.

2138. And he serves a notice, one on the town clerk and another on the person objected to; is that the rule?—I think so.

2139. He need not, I find, give the grounds of his objection?—No, he need not.

2140. Nor is he liable to costs if his objection fails?—I cannot answer that question.

2141. Those lists are published, are they not?—Yes, those lists are published.

2142. And then they are revised in the way that is stated in the Act?—Yes.

2144. Was it done at the last municipal election?—It was.

2145. By conveyances?—Yes.

2146. Mr. Staveley Hill.] With regard to the trial in the county court, you say that you had a great deal of information from the person who used this undue influence over two or three voters?—Yes, from himself.

2147. You spoke to him about it, did you?—Yes, the party implicated told me that it was so.

2148. Have you seen him lately?—No, I have not seen him for several months.

2149. Did you think it worth while to mention to him that you were coming up to give this evidence?—I was not aware that I was coming till a day or two ago.

2150. Have you thought it worth while to tell him that you were going to state to the Committee that the conviction in the county court rested upon his evidence?—No, I have not thought of doing so.

2151. So that he may possibly want to contradict it?—He may.

2152. The expenses of a Parliamentary election in Liverpool are rather large, are they not?—I believe so.

2153. And necessarily large?—I should think so.

2154. Have you considered the question how far you would like to have those expenses thrown upon the rates?—I have not.

2155. What is your opinion with regard to that?—I cannot form an opinion; it is a matter I have not thought over, therefore I cannot give a correct opinion; in fact, I have no opinion upon it.

2156. Have you never heard the matter discussed?—Yes, I have heard it.

2157. In what way has it been discussed?—Some for and some against; some have advocated that the expenses should be paid out of the rates and others have held a contrary opinion; but I have never given any consideration to the subject.

2168. Do you think yourself that such a proposal would be generally well received?—That I cannot say. I know that the ratepayers are very tenacious about paying anything more than what they are really obliged to do; rates are very high at present.

2165. But you are not prepared to point out exactly what alteration you would recommend?—I am not prepared to point out what alteration I should recommend.

2166. Sir George Grey.] To what is owing the great difference between the number of the Parliamentary and the municipal electors if the Parliamentary do not comprise a lower class than the municipal?—There were the compound householders; and perhaps the difference may arise from the

16 April 1869.

the fact that it requires three years' residence for a municipal voter to be put on the register, whereas it only requires 12 months for a Parliamentary voter; that will cause a very great difference, because in a place like Liverpool they are perpetually changing and re-changing their residences.

2167. That is the lowest class of voters?—Yes, the lowest.

2168. Are there not a large number of freemen?—There are many freemen, but not so many as there used to be; they are dying out. I do not think there are more than perhaps 300 or 400 at the present time, speaking from memory.

2170. Do not you think that the largeness of the constituency in the one case, and therefore the impossibility of corrupting, has much to do with the absence of bribery at the Parliamentary elections?—I think not.

THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. ROBERT STANLEY, called in; and Examined.

Mr. R. Stanley. 20 April 1869.

2171. Chairman.] Do you live at Staleybridge?—I do.

2172. Staleybridge has now a charter of incorporation, has it not?—It has.

2173. Have you had any experience of the municipal elections which have taken place at Staleybridge?—I have.

2174. Since when?—These last 20 years.

2175. Has Staleybridge had a charter for the last 20 years?—No, the charter was granted in 1857.

2176. How do you mean that you have had experience for the last 20 years?—We used to be governed by the Police Commissioners, previous to the charter of incorporation, under the Police Act.

2177. Have you had experience of the working of the municipal elections since their commencement? — Yes, since the charter was granted.

2178. Have you any facts which you wish to state to the Committee, in connection with those elections? — I wish to state this, that, as the elections are at present conducted, there is a great deal of intimidation, and a great deal of coercion used; and that, to some extent, the elections are a farce.

2179. Is there any bribery?—I am not aware of any bribery.

2180. Or treating?—Treating has been very prevalent.

2181. How has the treating been conducted? —Generally, for some weeks before the election, the voters have been enticed into public-houses and treated with liquor, and they have been talked over; and, in consequence of their treating, it has been a very common thing for them to vote for the parties who have treated them.

2183. Can you form any opinion as to the sums of money which have been spent in this way on the municipal elections?—The municipal elections have generally cost several hundred pounds, where there has been a contest in all the three wards.

2184. Do you mean several hundred pounds by each party?—It has come from one party more particularly than the other.

2185. Do those elections generally turn on political questions or local questions?—We have only had a Member for Staleybridge under the last Reform Act; but they have turned upon political questions recently, since it was likely that we should have a Member.

2186. Previous to that, they did not turn upon political questions? — Not upon political questions.

2187. You have spoken of the intimidation which prevails at these elections; will you state to the Committee what the nature of that intimidation is?—The overlookers and managers of the different mills have gone round to the men under them and canvassed them, and told them how they must vote; told them they must vote in the way that they wished them to do.

2188. Is that the universal practice?—It is carried on by one party almost without exception; it is very universal on one side.

2189. But you think it is not so universal on the other side?—It is not so much practised on the other side.

2190. Does this intimidation proceed any further than this intimation of the wishes of the master; are proceedings ever taken, after the election, against the workmen?—In many cases, if they vote contrary to the wishes of their masters, the men are discharged, and their families as well.

2191. Do you know of your own knowledge any cases in which workmen have been discharged?—Yes, many cases.

2192. So that the consequence is that the workmen do almost universally vote according to the wishes of their employers? — At some men's mills there are very few of them that do anything else but vote as their employers wish them.

20 April 1869.

2193. Has the system of intimidation always prevailed since your recollection, or only since the borough got a Member of Parliament?—Always since I have had anything to do with public matters in Staleybridge.

2194. Before the elections assumed a political character was that the case?—Yes, before the elections assumed a political character.

2195. Does the system extend to any establishments besides private mills?—I have known cases in which the clergyman and the schoolmaster have been canvassed, and the clergyman has been told distinctly that he would make a mistake if he voted a certain way; he did so, and he found that the half-time factory children have since been taken from his school.

2197. Do you consider that those municipal elections have any reference to the Parliamentary elections?—Since there was the probability that we should have a Member for Staleybridge, they have assumed that character, and the municipal elections have been fought upon the ground of influence in the Parliamentary election.

2198. Do those same practices prevail at the Parliamentary elections as in the municipal elections?—Yes, to a greater extent, I think.

2199. Do you believe that any bribery takes place?—Not to my knowledge.

2200. Or treating?—Yes, with respect to treating for the Parliamentary election there was a considerable amount of treating previous to the November municipal election, and when the time for it was gone by the treating was done away with in the interval between the municipal election and the Parliamentary election.

2201. Is it your opinion that the treating at the municipal election went on with a view to the Parliamentary election?—Certainly; that was the view we took of it, and the view that was generally taken.

2203. Is any political influence exercised by the members of the town council?—Yes, they have canvassed the employés of the town council, accompanied by the surveyor, and they use a considerable amount of influence over them, and in some few instances the men have been discharged since, in consequence we suppose of their voting contrary to the wishes of the members of the council.

2204. Then it is an object in a political point of view for one party to obtain a majority in the town council?—It is.

2207. This was with regard to intimidation at the Parliamentary election, was it not?—Yes; there have been no proceedings taken in reference to the municipal elections at all, in the shape of legal proceedings.

2208. What was the result of those proceedings?—The cases were fixed for hearing a day after the Parliamentary election, and of course the parties taking the proceedings having won the Parliamentary election withdrew the prosecution because they did not want to carry on any ill feeling, or be revenged upon the men for what they had done, and so they withdrew the proceedings.

2209. Have any other proceedings been taken to stop those practices?—Yes; what was called the Anti-Screw Association was formed.

2210. Will you describe the nature of that society?—It was of this nature. The working classes subscribed among themselves in order to support each other in case they should be discharged, or advantage should be taken in consequence of the manner in which they gave their votes.

2211. When was that association formed?—The secretary of the association is here. I have not the exact date of it, but he will be able to answer that question; it was some weeks before the election.

2213. Is there any general desire in Staleybridge to put a stop to those practices?—Yes, on the part of the working classes; and I think that the tradesmen generally are very anxious that something should be done to get rid of this state of things.

2214. What do they suggest should be done?—For my part, I think that if we had the ballot in the municipal elections, it would be sufficient so far as they are concerned, and so far as the Parliamentary elections are concerned, if we had a public prosecutor, or some one that would take the responsibility of taking those cases up.

2215. Are you not in favour of adopting the ballot in the Parliamentary elections?—I am not personally.

2216. Why do you make a distinction?—Because the evil that would result in the municipal elections is comparatively small to what would result in the case of the Parliamentary elections; in the municipal elections, if it should be found that the wrong sort of men were chosen, it would be very easy for Parliament to remedy it; but in the case of the Parliamentary election, the thing would be more difficult, because there would be the same body; in fact, the body would have to reform itself.

2217. You think that if the ballot were employed in the Parliamentary elections, very likely the wrong men would be chosen?—That is my view of it.

2218. Still you desire that it should be adopted in the case of the municipal elections?—In the case of the municipal elections I think that it would be a great advantage.

2220. Are the boundaries of the borough coterminous?—No; in the Parliamentary borough of Staleybridge, there is the township of Duckinfield included.

2221. Then the Parliamentary borough is larger than the municipal borough?—Yes; the Parliamentary borough is larger than the municipal borough.

2222. Will you give the numbers in each?—In the municipal borough the number is 2,377, and in the Parliamentary borough the number is 5,339.

2223. Will you explain to the Committee exactly, why you wish that the ballot should be adopted for the municipal elections?—I wish it in this sense, because the people can then really choose the best man.

2224. But I understood you to say just now, that there was great probability that they would not choose the best man?—However, they would choose men that they liked best, at all events.

2225. Why do you object to the ballot as applied to the Parliamentary elections?—Because I think that the result would generally be that a worse class of men would be chosen.

2226. You think that they would not choose the best men?—I think they would not choose the best men exactly.

2227. Do you think it better that a candidate at the Parliamentary election should be chosen by this system of intimidation, which you have described?—No, I wish some remedy to be adopted that would deter those men from using this intimidation.

2228. But the ballot is not the remedy which you would suggest in the case of Parliamentary elections?—No, it is not.

2230. But you do not think that under the ballot, the best men would be chosen in the Parliamentary elections?—I do not think so.

2231. Mr. Villiers.] Are you a councillor yourself?—I have been a member of the council.

2233. Has there been any complaint of the way in which they have acted in the municipal corporation?—I cannot say that there has; I do not know that we can make any great complaint upon that ground, but we do complain of this, that they will not have anyone of the opposite political creed to their own, on the council, if they can possibly help it.

2234. Who do you mean by that?—The party who is at present in the majority, the Radical party, of course.

2236. Are the majority of the mill-owners of one complexion?—Yes, the majority of the mill-owners are of one complexion.

2237. Have you any reason to suppose that the people would choose better men for the council, than are now elected, if they acted freely?—Not at all; only they would be upon the other side in politics.

2238. So far as the municipality goes it would be the same, they would make a good choice?—Just so.

2240. But is that impression founded upon the law not having been applied, or upon the notion of what the law is?—Upon the notion of what the law is; in fact there never have been any proceedings taken in municipal matters, because people seem to think that they cannot do anything; that there is very little law for it.

2241. It was under that impression, and with a view to the Parliamentary election, that treating and other illegal means of influencing voters was increased in the municipal elections?—Yes.

2242. But they had the idea that there was greater strictness in the Parliamentary elections?—Yes.

are under the apprehension of being made subject to the law and are more careful in their conduct?—Yes, I should say so.

2246. The experiment never has been made, has it, with respect to the municipal elections, of enforcing any Act or law against them?—Not that I am aware of.

2247. Was there an inquiry after the last Parliamentary election as to what took place at that election?—There was an inquiry afterwards.

2248. There were illegal practices at the Parliamentary election, were there not?—Yes, but they were not practised by the persons against whom the inquiry was directed.

2258. But you are of opinion, are you not, that when people have a vote they ought to use it freely?—Certainly.

2259. They are assumed to be fit for it when it is given to them?—Certainly.

2261. They have never voted for a man whose character is bad upon any occasion, have they?—No, not particularly so.

2263. Have you any doubt that that is with a view to escape the influence that is used upon them at those elections?—Yes, that is the reason why they wish it, to escape this influence.

2264. You are of opinion that they ought to vote freely; is there any other way by which they would vote freely, but by the ballot?—My opinion has always been that people should form associations, as they did in this instance (in fact, I suggested the idea of this very association being formed), to support each other, and prevent this intimidation.

2265. That would enable them, you think, to vote for the man of their choice?—It certainly would do so; but then at the same time, a working man, even although you promise to keep him if he should be discharged, still feels an uncertainty; I know, as I had to do with these matters, that in the case of those very men in whose names we took out those prosecutions, we had great difficulty to get them to consent to be prosecutors, from the fear that they would be unable to get employment after; they thought that that the society might not be able to maintain them as long as they remained out of work, and we had to use a great deal of influence, in the shape of persuasion, to get them to consent to those prosecutions in their names.

2266. That Anti-Screw Association has therefore not answered completely?—Not completely.

2267. There is a difficulty, is there not, about getting evidence?—Yes, there is a difficulty about getting evidence; people are afraid of being injured after the election, as a number of persons have been discharged that did vote for the man of their choice, in consequence of the promise of support from the association; a great many of them have been discharged since, and others were afraid even to do that.

2268. But I think I understood you to say, that whether with the ballot or without the ballot, they would choose the person that was elected?—Yes.

2270. Have you always had contests for the municipal offices?—No.

2271. You say that there has been a good deal of feeling at those different contests?—A considerable amount of feeling. We have been in what I may call an excited state for a great number of years in Staleybridge.

2272. The majority of the town council is decidedly on the Liberal side, is it not?—Yes.

2273. Will you state the reason why you prefer the ballot for the municipal elections, and do not approve of it for the Parliamentary elections?—Because, in the case of the municipal elections, it is only a matter of local interests. The question turns upon just simply the amount of the rates; that is, I think, about the most important question in the local contests, and who will conduct the affairs of the town in the most economical manner.

2274. It is economy against extravagance?—Yes. In the case of the Parliamentary elections the result is far wider than that; that is merely one, and perhaps a very small, part of the question, in my idea, compared with the general politics of the country.

2275. Did you find that there was any intimidation at those municipal contests?—Yes.

2276. Did you hear of men being discharged from their work?—It is a very common thing, indeed. I have seen, at those municipal elections, the overlooker bringing all the men under him, like a troop marching after him, going up to the poll and watching them, and seeing them vote, and taking care that they voted the right way.

2277. If any voted contrary to his instructions, were they discharged?—They were discharged on some trivial pretext or other.

2278. The Committee will be glad to hear whether those were isolated cases, or whether there was a general system of intimidation prevailing at the municipal elections?—It was a general system with one portion of the millowners.

2279. It is only fair to suppose that if it was exercised on one side it would be exercised on the other?—To a very slight extent, indeed; I am speaking now of the Parliamentary elections, but at the municipal elections it was very little indeed, compared with the other side.

2281. Then there was a period in the municipal elections at Staleybridge when the Conservatives had a majority?—Yes.

2282. And that was owing, as you say, to their adopting the popular side?—Just so; on questions of economy, and so on.

2283. Did intimidation prevail at that time in the same way?—Very extensively on one side.

2284. Was it applied by both sides upon that occasion?—No, it was not necessary at all on one side.

2285. Staleybridge had notice for a great many years, had it not, that it was likely to be made a Parliamentary borough; I think Staleybridge has been in every projected Reform Bill?—It was offered to be included with Ashton in 1832, but in all the other Reform Bills it has been mentioned.

2286. So that the attention of the voters in Staleybridge was pretty well called to the fact that it would probably be a Parliamentary borough?—Yes, it was generally understood that when the Reform Bill did pass it would be so.

2287. I think you told us that there was very little treating at the time of the Parliamentary election in Staleybridge?—Very little, compared to the municipal election.

2288. In fact, the judge made a report to that effect, that he had no reason to believe that there was any extensive treating?—I think he did; there was none on one side at all.

2289. And the Member was seated?—The Member retained his seat.

2290. Just tell me about the intimidation which prevailed at the time of the Parliamentary election, with a view to the municipal election?—The overlooker in many mills canvassed the men and told them that they would have a voice to vote, and that they should vote as the master wished them.

2291. Did they canvass the men in the presence of the candidate?—No, not in the presence of the candidate.

2292. Were there public meetings held?—Yes, several public meetings were held.

2293. I suppose the men had the liberty of attending any public meetings they liked?—They had.

2294. How was the show of hands at the nomination in Staleybridge?—There was a considerable majority in favour of the present Member.

2295. What was the majority on the day of the election?—327 out of 5,339.

2296. So that the intimidation does not seem to have been very successful?—It did not answer.

2297. When was the Anti-Screw Association formed, formed, that you have told us about?—A few weeks before the election we heard what was going on in the mills, and at a public meeting, I suggested the idea, and it was taken up by the public generally, and one manufacturer offered to give a sum of money, if it was necessary, as a sort of starting point. From that we commenced to collect subscriptions, and we supported all those that were discharged, till we could find them work.

20 April 1869.

2298. Did this intimidation on the part of some of the overlookers create a strong feeling in the borough?—A very strong feeling indeed.

2300. When were those summonses taken out against the overlookers, was it during the canvass previous to the election?—I think it was a fortnight before the Parliamentary election.

2301. Did the knowledge that those summonses were taken out have any effect in putting down intimidation?—I believe it did; I think it entirely prevented them from using the intimidation that they had done before. I could not hear of any cases after that, because the offence is a very serious one, under the Act of Parliament under which the informations were laid.

2302. Was any public meeting called, at which it was determined to take out those summonses?—No.

2303. But was it made known to the inhabitants of Staleybridge generally?—Yes; the summons was applied for publicly, with the object that the thing should be publicly known.

2304. And it was generally known in Staleybridge that efforts would be made to stop this intimidation?—Placards were published, immediately upon the granting of the summons, stating that it had been done.

2305. And you think that that had the effect of putting down intimidation?—It had great influence upon the intimidation.

2306. Do you think that making the law more stringent as regards both bribery and treating, and enforcing the provisions of the existing law, would be likely to be as efficacious in protecting voters as the ballot?—The difficulty is in prosecuting; no one likes to take up these matters. For instance, in my case I know that I am very ill thought of by people of my own class on the other side for taking an active part in those prosecutions; people always look at it as a thing against me. For many years some of them have looked upon me as a sort of meddler interfering between master and workmen, and a sort of dangerous character.

2308. I want to ascertain from you whether the state of feeling amongst the respectable inhabitants, on both sides of politics in Staleybridge, is such that they would support any effort which was made by a public prosecutor to put down intimidation?—I think they would.

2309. You think it is against the wish of the respectable people on both sides in politics?—Yes, it is against the wish of respectable people on both sides that those things should be done.

2310. There are a great number of millowners, are there not, in Staleybridge?—Yes; the people entirely depend upon the cotton manufacture; it is all a cotton manufacturing district.

2311. Mr. Raikes.] Did I rightly understand you to say that public opinion exercises a healthy influence in the Parliamentary elections upon the voters, which it does not do in the municipal elections?—Yes.

2312. I think you said that men would sometimes be ashamed of voting for a bad character who was a candidate in the Parliamentary election, and that public opinion, therefore, exercised a healthy influence over them?—Yes.

2313. As you consider that the municipal elections are the ones in which the ballot ought to be applied, are you of opinion that the corruption, bad practices, and so on, at the municipal elections, tend to demoralise the constituency to a certain degree?—I am of that opinion.

2314. If you could stop them at the municipal elections, that would probably go a long way towards stopping them at the Parliamentary elections?—I think so.

2315. You have often said, have you not, that money was spent upon the municipal elections colourably, merely for the municipal election, and with a view to influence the Parliamentary election?—Yes, I have.

2316. Of course, if the ballot was in force at the municipal election, it would cease to have any influence upon the Parliamentary election?—Yes; it would have great effect in doing away with treating and intimidation at the Parliamentary election.

2317. Have you ever considered what would be the effect upon those illegal practices at the Parliamentary elections, if the judge who tried the petition always, as a matter of course, committed for trial persons who, in his opinion, were guilty of them?—No doubt that would have a great influence in putting it down.

2318. Do not you think that it would have as good an effect, if the judge committed persons who, in his opinion, had been guilty of illegal practices, as if there was a special officer appointed like a public prosecutor?—But that would apply only in the case of a petition, and people do not present a petition in a hurry.

2319. Mr. Locke.] You think that the judge, having the power himself to commit then and there during the inquiry, would have a beneficial effect?—Undoubtedly.

2320. Now, he merely suggests that there should be a prosecution, is not that so?—Yes; that is so.

2321. What description of men are those that work in those mills; what are their wages?—Their wages vary from 12 s. or 14 s. a week (we have had men on our committee that have only earned 12 s. a week) up to 30 s. or 34 s. a week for spinners.

2322. Mr. Edward Egerton.] That is merely the head of the family?—Yes; the head of the family, family, in addition to the children that are employed.

2323. Mr. Wright.] Do you include the women?—No, the men only.

2324. Mr. Locke.] Do you mean that there are men working in those factories who only earn 12 s. a week?—Yes.

2325. What is their employment?—Of course they are an inferior class of men who job about and run errands, and things of that sort.

2326. But they are not men who actually work in the manufacture?—Not skilled labourers; they merely mix the cotton, or something in that way; something which requires no skill, but merely labour.

2327. What proportion should you think that those men who only earn 12 s. a week, bear to the number of electors?—Those are very few; there are only a few men of that class in each mill.

2328. How many do you suppose there are?—I am not practically acquainted with the working of a mill, and I cannot answer the question. The secretary of the Anti-Screw Association is here; he works in a mill, and he will be able to answer the question correctly.

2329. What are the highest wages that are paid to any man?—I fancy that the fine spinners get up to 35 s., or may be more; but I am a tradesman, and I am not acquainted with the exact details of mills.

2330. You stated that you thought the ballot would not be beneficial in the Parliamentary elections?—I think not.

2331. Is that, do you say, in consequence of the questions which arise at the Parliamentary elections?—In consequence of the questions which arise at the Parliamentary elections.

2332. Can you specify any particular question that might arise at the Parliamentary election, where you think that if that question were raised by a candidate, it would not be beneficial that the voter should vote by ballot?—In the case of trades' unions, for instance, I think under the ballot many men might be induced to support a man that would bear them out in their trades' unions, who openly they would not support.

2333. Why would not they support him openly?—Because the members of trades' unions are, like all other classes of society, selfish, and when there are two courses to choose they would choose the one that is most for their own interest, sometimes when it is not a very just course.

2334. What do you mean by the one that would be most to their own interest?—That which would give them more power.

2335. Why should not they support it openly if it is to their own interest?—Because when it is a question of a man's own interest, he will do many things; in fact, a tradesman has to do, and a manufacturer has to do, many things that he would not openly avow.

2336. If it is to his own interest, could there be any reason why he should not openly avow that he voted for the candidate who supported his interest; what harm would there be in his doing that?—I do not exactly understand the question.

2339. Can you give an instance of what you mean by their going beyond?—Supposing a trades' union wanted to restrict the number of apprentices taken by a master, that being contrary to the public interest, though it is to the interest of the union; and there are many other instances, if I could think of them, where they would not like, perhaps, to support a man openly who professed to go to that extent, while, if a man could vote secretly, he perhaps would do so.

2340. But in the case of a man who came there as a candidate, that would not be the only question that he would advocate?—Certainly not; there may be many other political questions.

2341. Then they might happen to vote for him under the other system just as well as under this?—Certainly.

2342. Then, under those circumstances, why should not he vote openly?—In my evidence before, I have advocated the principle of open voting, and you say, "Why should he not vote openly?"

2343. Why should he not?—I say he should.

2344. But why would he not?—Because by appealing to the self-interest of the working classes they are neither better nor worse than any other class. We find that tradesmen will support a man that proposes to reduce taxation, though upon other questions they may perhaps differ from the man that they support; that is to say, the voter goes according to his self-interest in that case.

2345. Is it not the fact that tradesmen generally vote openly for the man who will reduce taxation?—As a rule they do.

2346. Why should not a working man, unless he is intimidated by somebody, vote openly for the man who supports the views that he entertains?—Because of the general influence of public opinion.

2347. Why does public opinion interfere with him then?—Because, as I said before, working men are like all other men, they will do many things that they should not do, and which they would not do if they knew that they would become public.

2348. But what I ask you is this; do not other men always vote for the candidates who they think will support their interests?—Generally, I suppose it is so.

2349. However, you object to the ballot for the Parliamentary elections?—Yes.

2350. You said, did you not, that in your opinion, a worse class of men would be returned?—That is my opinion.

2351. Your present Member, I think, was returned by the municipal voters, was he not; has he he not been mayor several times?—He has been mayor several times.

Mr. R. Stanley. 20 April 1869.

2352. And he was an alderman, I suppose?—Yes, he was an alderman.

2353. Was he a common councilman?—No; I think he was elected alderman first.

2354. That was by the town council?—Yes; that was by the town council.

2355. Then has he never been elected to any office by the municipal electors?—No, except as a Member of Parliament.

2356. Are you on the same side as the present Member?—I am.

2357. You think that he was too good a Member to have been elected by the municipal electors?—Certainly not.

2358. He never tried, but would he have been elected, do you think, by the municipal electors if he had?—I have not the least doubt of it.

2359. Then it stands upon precisely the same footing, with regard to the municipal electors and the Parliamentary electors, that they each would have elected Mr. Sidebotham, would they not?—There is no doubt about it; he is so popular a man, that he would have carried the election in spite of all influence; there was no contest at the municipal election this last November at all.

2360. Mr. James.] Have you had any experience in the Parliamentary elections, excepting in Staleybridge?—No.

2361. Then your experience is confined to this last election?—To this last election only.

2362. I think you say that you do approve of vote by ballot at the municipal elections?—Yes, I do.

2363. Because it would allow the voters to vote freely according to their own opinions?—Yes.

2364. That you consider an advantage?—Yes.

2365. Would it not have the same result in the Parliamentary elections?—Yes, certainly.

2366. Do you consider that an advantage in the Parliamentary elections?—No, because there would be another class of men altogether who would be brought out for Members of Parliament.

2367. Then the reason why you object to the ballot is this, because if the system of vote by ballot took place, persons would not be able to vote according to their own opinions?—No; what I mean to say is this, that in the Parliamentary elections you have another class of men entirely to what you have in the municipal elections as candidates, and the question takes a far wider range.

2368. I want to keep to the voter, whether he exercises his opinion rightly or wrongly; you agree that, if he voted by ballot, he would be able to vote according to his opinion?—Yes, certainly.

2369. Do you think it an advantage that a man should vote according to his own opinion?—Of course to some extent I do; I think it ought to be so.

2370. Do not you think so to the full extent?—I think that a man ought to be influenced by public opinion too, to some extent.

2371. Public opinion brought to bear upon him so that he should vote against his own opinion and his own conscience?—Not at all.

2372. Assuming a man to have an opinion, ought he not to vote according to that, without the opinon of other people?—There are many things, as I said before, in a man's trade and business that he does, that he would not do at all if he knew that the public would know.

2373. Do you not assume that a man who has the franchise is fit to exercise it, and voting according to his conscience, votes rightly; and is it not fit that he should so vote rather than according to influences brought to bear upon him?—Sometimes, probably, a man is influenced entirely by self-interest; and it is very necessary that public opinion should have some influence upon him, and very properly so.

2374. You approve of open voting in the Parliamentary elections, lest, as you say, a man should vote, not according to his own opinion, but be influenced by external influences?—That is to say, that his self-interest should not rule him entirely.

2375. Or his own opinion?—You may call it his opinion, if you like.

2376. In the municipal body now, the majority are opposed to your views, are they not?—No, the majority are with us; there is no question about it; but the undue influence that is brought to bear upon them causes them to vote contrary.

2377. You want to get rid of that by the ballot?—As far as the municipal elections go, I think it would have a beneficial effect.

2378. You agree in opinion with the sitting Member, and you do not want any change in the mode of electing the sitting Member for Staleybridge?—No, except so far as this: that I think there ought to be some more stringent measure adopted to prevent this intimidation.

2379. Mr. Staveley Hill.] Do I rightly understand you to say that, in an important matter like a Parliamentary election, you think that the influence of public opinion is a good thing, but undue influence and intimidation are bad things?—Yes.

2380. And you think that open voting, guarded by strong and stringent corrupt practices laws, would bring to bear that middle course?—I do. I look upon the Parliamentary vote more in the light of a trust, and the municipal vote I look upon as a question of self-interest only; that is about the extent of it.

2382. Does not a man mainly associate with those of his own class?—Generally speaking, it is so.

2383. It is so in 99 cases out of 100, is it not?—Not to that extent, but generally so.

2384. Then, the opinion of that class would probably influence the vote?—I do not think it would altogether, because a man, in addition to what you may call his familiar friends, has a large circle of acquaintances that are not exactly in his own class. Therefore, as he is in the habit of talking these matters over, he would be, to some extent, guided by their opinion as to what was right and wrong. There is no working man whose acquaintances are entirely confined to those of his own class. He is in the habit of talking to tradesmen; he goes to their shops, and goes to inns and different public-houses, and things of that sort, and talks these matters over, and he is, to some extent, guided by the opinions of those that are in a better class of life than himself.

2385. But not mainly?—To some extent it is so.

2386. But that would be to a very small extent, as the great bulk of his friends and acquaintances belong to his own class?—No, to a very considerable extent in the case of right and wrong.

2387. Have you trades' unions in Staleybridge?—We have.

2388. Are they powerful associations?—I cannot speak to that.

2389. Do you know anything of their proceedings; whether they attempt to influence the votes of members of the union?—I do not; I cannot speak to that.

2390. You spoke of a public prosecutor; do you think that he would have any difficulty in obtaining evidence?—I think he would have less difficulty than in the case of a private person taking the matter up, because they would feel that there was some one to defend them, as it were.

2391. You do not think then that the intimidated men would shrink from giving evidence?—In a great number of cases they would; generally they would.

2392. This Anti-Screw Association was a failure, I think you said?—No, it was not a failure.

2393. To any very great extent was it successful?—It induced a great number of people to vote for one candidate that would not otherwise have done so, but not all; there would have been a greater number voted for our candidate if some of the millowners had done the same as others did—put placards up in the mill, saying that they did not wish to influence in any way the votes of their workmen, and that no advantage would be taken of them if they voted as they thought proper.

2394. But many of those men you say were sent off afterwards?—Yes, many of them were sent off afterwards, but none from the mills where the notices were put up.

2395. Did you raise a large sum in order to recompense them?—We raised somewhere about 160 l. altogether, principally by the working classes subscribing 2 d. and 3 d., and so on.

2396. How long did that sum hold out?—We paid money for 14 weeks in succession.

2398. Were all your committee-men of one way of thinking in politics?—They were.

2400. Mr. Beard.] If the ballot were applied to the municipal elections and proved successful, would you have it extended to the Parliamentary elections?—If it was found successful I should; in fact, I merely suggest the ballot in the case of the municipal elections as an experiment.

2401. Sir George Grey.] You spoke of intimidation by employers; has there been any intimidation by workmen against their fellow-workmen in Staleybridge?—I am not aware of anything of the sort.

2402. Are there a great many public-houses in Staleybridge?—Yes, a considerable number.

2403. You said that there was a good deal of treating; was that generally extended through the public-houses?—Yes.

2404. Were the public houses kept open?—It was in this way: committees were held at different public-houses, and those committees made it a habit of getting voters on the other side in, that they thought could be influenced by drink and treating them, and so on, and persuading them over to support their side.

2405. Is it the practice in the municipal and the Parliamentary elections that the committees are held at public houses?—Yes, invariably so.

2406. How many public houses do you suppose were open at the municipal election the last time there was a contest?—I cannot speak to the number, but it was a very large number.

2407. Am I right in understanding you to say that there is a local public opinion in Staleybridge, quite apart from intimidation, which under open voting would deter men from supporting a candidate who advocated measures which, according to that local public opinion, are unjust or injurious to the general interests of the country?—Certainly, I do think so.

2408. And that under secret voting, the beneficial effect of that influence would be removed?—I think so.

2409. Mr. Villiers.] Supposing a Conservative millowner influenced, unduly, his men to vote, or supposing that they are turned out of employment, does this Anti-Screw Association interfere in such a case, seeing that it is a Conservative mill?—We never had a case of that sort; and I do not think there is a single case in Staleybridge of that sort; I should have heard of it if it had been so.

2410. You interfere to protect the men, do you not, if such should be the case?—No, there is not a single case on our side of a man being influenced or discharged in consequence of his voting. I know myself of my own personal knowledge, that in the case of a millowner, who was a candidate, there were two of his men on the opposite committee canvassing for the opposite candidate, without interference, and without having a single word spoken to them, and the candidate did not know of that circumstance till I told him myself.

2411. And nothing followed from that?—Nothing followed from it; he was not aware of it; he asked the manager about it. I was present in his counting-house at the time, or rather I should say it was not the candidate, but the candidate's two brothers, who are partners with him. Some one published a placard, attacking the partners for using undue influence in their mill. I happened to be there on election business, and they read this placard to me, and asked me what I thought of it. I said, "It is certainly a thing that is very wrong for them to say, and there is no truth at all in it, and you ought to answer it; and you ought to state at the same time, in your placard answering it, that two men in your mill are on the opposite candidate's committee, and are canvassing for him;" and they made the remark to me, and asked me if that was so. I said, "It is so; I know it to be so." The manager came into the room, and then they asked him, and he stated that it was so, and told the names of the parties; but he said of course it was not his duty to say anything to them, and that he never had spoken to them about it.

2412. Are there two Anti-Screw Associations in Staleybridge?—No, only one.

2413. May I ask if you apply that principle to a councillor that you apply to a voter, that he is to serve himself if he has a vote at an election, because you say that a municipal voter can vote to serve himself, or how he likes?—Yes, certainly.

2414. And with respect to a councillor, is he to do the same?—No, in the case of a councillor it is a public trust; in the case of a voter it is his own, or it merely concerns his own party, but a councillor is a part and parcel of the corporation.

2415. The voter has to be rated, and he has to reside a certain time, has he not?—Yes, certainly.

2416. It is not everybody who is a voter?—No.

2417. Then I suppose those who have not got votes, look upon him as a trustee, to a certain extent, do they not?—I do not exactly see that, because the number is so few, comparatively; and not only that, but the number who do not reside a sufficient length of time are generally a very low class of people; people who some morning the landlord comes and finds that they are gone; as a rule, the great bulk of the working people live in one house for years, and do not remove about so much.

2418. Do you mean that the people who have not a vote are so few?—Yes.

2419. Mr. Bright.] Were there a good many people who attended the nomination at Staleybridge?—Yes, many thousands.

2420. Of course both parties would be fully represented there?—Yes, both were fully represented.

2421. Where was the nomination held?—On a vacant piece of ground behind the market in the town.

2422. Was there much speaking?—Nominations are generally noisy affairs; there was not much speaking, only just sufficient to do the business.

2423. If there was little speaking, probably there was less hearing?—No; the speaking was quite distinct, I think; at least, for the people in front; I happened to be on the platform; it is very bad hearing, when you are at a person's back, but I understand that the people in front could pretty well hear what was spoken.

2424. Were there any skirmishes during the nomination?—Nothing in the shape of rioting; there were no fights.

2425. It was very tranquil, on the whole, was it?—Very tranquil.

2426. Considering that it involves, very often, the loss of a day's labour and wages, and sometimes ends in a good deal of tumult, and that very rarely there is much discussion, would there be any disadvantage in getting rid of the nominations altogether?—I think there would.

2427. There would be harm in it, you think?—Yes, there would be harm in it.

2430. Therefore, unless the committees are very remiss, they know pretty well what may be looked for at the election?—They do know pretty well.

2431. How many meetings do you think were held in Staleybridge for the election; taking in all, the committee meetings and public meetings of all kind?—I should not like to state the number, but it was considerable; a large number of meetings took place in different parts of the borough.

2432. Do you think that the candidates attended twenty meetings from the time of their first coming out to the day of the election?—I think one of the candidates only attended one public meeting; he attended many meetings of his supporters, but only one public meeting.

2433. Of course the meetings of his supporters were not closed against anybody who would conduct themselves fairly?—They were looked upon as intruders generally; they were looked upon as having come there for the purpose of kicking up a disturbance.

2434. Was there a great deal of placarding and newspaper writing?—Yes, a great deal of placarding.

2335. There are no nominations in the municipal elections, are there?—Occasionally there are; occasionally the alderman calls a ward meeting and then there are nominations; it is not the rule always; it is only done occasionally.

2436. It is not the rule at all?—No, it is not the rule at all; but it has been done occasionally.

2437. Sir George Grey.] Was there a personal canvass of the electors of Staleybridge made by the candidates?—After the canvassers had done their work, there were a number of people who said they would be neutral or would not give any answer at all, and one of the candidates on our side saw those persons.

2438. Was there a personal canvass made of the voters, or was the canvass merely made by means of public meetings?—There was a personal canvass of the voters by canvassers for the Parliamentary election.

2439. Mr. Villiers.] There has been an amount of political feeling, has there not, at the municipal elections?—Yes, that has been so in the last two or three years.

2440. Politics enter into everything at Staleybridge, do they not?—They had not done so much till there was a probability of there being a Member of Parliament for the borough; formerly we used to be divided into Whites and Yellows; and there used to be Conservatives and Liberals on one side; they were all mixed up together; in fact you may say, that it was the public against the millowners that used to be the division at one time.

Mr. JAMES SAVILLE, called in; and Examined.

2441. Chairman.] You were the Secretary, were you not, of the Anti-Screw Association which we have just heard described?—Yes.

2442. Can you state to the Committee when it was formed?—Not the particular date; but it was some time before the election.

2443. What sum of money did you raise for the purposes of the association?—The amount altogether was somewhere about 160 l.; and the amount that was paid to parties that were discharged was 143 l. 3 s.

2444. Do you know to how many persons payments were made?—Thirty-eight; there were a number that were discharged that got employment before they came on to the association, who did not require any amount from the association at all; the 38 that I have mentioned were only those that came under the observation of the committee; others were discharged, but they immediately got work, and therefore they did not require any aid from the association.

2445. What steps did your committee take to discover whether the applicant had really been discharged on account of his political principles?—In cases where we had any suspicion, we demanded a written statement from the applicant himself, to be written in his own hand, and signed by himself; and our committee are in possession of many of those statements now.

2446. Did the committee take any steps to ascertain the truth of those statements?—Yes; in some cases, they wrote to the very employers who were said to have discharged the man.

2447. Did you write to the employer to ask whether he had discharged so-and-so on account of his political opinion?—Not in all cases.

2448. In any instance, did the employer confirm the statement of the workman, that he had been so discharged?—No.

2449. Then, what other steps did you take to ascertain the truth of the statement?—We took no particular steps beyond what I have already stated; our own observation, and knowing the employers by whom they were employed; but their own statements were in most cases sufficient to get aid from the association.

2450. When you applied to the employer, did he, in any instance, give any other reason for the dismissal of the workman?—No.

2451. Did you get any answer from any employer at all?—Yes, in one case, an employer wrote and said that he did not know that the party had been discharged from his mill at all; and if he was discharged, he said he was afraid that it was for some other reason than the one alleged by him.

2452. Did you make further inquiry in that case?—No, not in that case; I believe that that person only received two weeks' support from the association; he got work, and therefore there was an end of his case.

2453. You did not think it necessary to make any further inquiry?—No; in fact, while we were making that inquiry the person had almost got work, and there seemed to be no further need.

2454. Some legal proceedings were taken a short time before the election, were there not?—Yes, there were.

2455. But were they not dropped immediately after the election?—Yes, they were withdrawn.

2456. Can you explain why they were withdrawn?—It was presumed that the intimidation that was then practised was about ceasing, and it was no use prosecuting the party that the summons had been taken out against.

2457. Then, we may assume, may we not, that those legal proceedings were instituted with a view to that election only?—The proceedings were instituted for the purpose of checking the intimidation that was being practised at that election.

2458. It was not from a general desire to stop the practice of intimidation, but it was to prevent intimidation from being practised at that particular election?—It was found that intimidation was being strongly used against many workmen, and on the part of the workmen, in many instances, they desired that some action should be taken.

2459. If you had had a good case against those persons, would it not have been a good example to have continued the prosecution, even after the election was over?—Perhaps so. Many of us regretted that the prosecutions did not go forward.

2460. By whom was that prosecution undertaken?—It was undertaken at the instance of two men who had been intimidated; those two men themselves were the parties who laid the charge.

2461. Who found the money?—I am not prepared to state who found the money.

2462. Those men did not, I presume?—No, I do not presume they did.

2463. And you do not know who did?—No.

2464. It was not found by the Anti-Screw Association was it?—No.

2465. Do you know who decided to discontinue the prosecutions?—Not exactly.

2466. Have you heard the evidence of the last witness?—Yes, I have.

2467. Do you concur in the statements of fact which he made?—Generally, I do.

2468. Is there anything which you wish to add to his evidence?—Nothing particular.

2470. But do you agree with him that there is a great deal of influence used?—Entirely.

2471. Are you afraid of the bad choice of the people if they were to be allowed to vote freely?—No, I have no fear myself of that.

2472. Do you think they would make a good choice?—I think so.

2473. They would not choose a man of bad character?—No.

2474. Do you think that a man has got the right of choosing freely when he has the franchise?—Decidedly so.

2475. Are you quite sure that they do not do that now at Staleybridge?—I feel quite sure that they do not.

2476. Sir George Grey.] Why do you object to the ballot?—Of course, I can only give my own personal view of the matter, and that is, that I believe the vote to be a public trust, and that they ought to freely exercise it. With regard to any preventive measure in lieu of the ballot, ballot, I would make the law more stringent, and be sure to enforce it.

2477. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Was it to enable voters to vote freely at Staleybridge that you formed this association?—Decidedly.

2478. And to prevent this intimidation which prevailed on the part of the masters?—Just so.

2479. Do you concur in the opinion of the last witness, that the instituting of proceedings in those two cases to which he referred had a beneficial effect at Staleybridge, as showing that the law was to be enforced?—I do think so.

2480. And you say, I think, that you, in common with many other inhabitants of Staleybridge, regret that those proceedings were discontinued?—Yes.

2481. You thought that it would have had a very beneficial effect if the law had been allowed to take its course?—Yes.

2482. Mr. James.] Would you agree that this intimidation at the municipal elections is a very great evil?—A very great evil. I conceive it to be an evil in either the municipal elections or the Parliamentary elections.

2483. If you had the ballot, how would the masters be able to intimidate their workmen?—I cannot answer that.

2484. Mr. Leatham.] The fund that you have spoken of was subscribed by the workmen themselves and others?—Yes.

2485. How much of the fund was raised from the workmen themselves?—About 40 l., I should say.

2486. Then about 120 l. was raised by others?—Over 100 l. was raised by the workmen themselves.

2487. What has induced you to alter your estimate; you told me that 40 l. was the amount subscribed by the workmen?—I have not just got the particulars of the amount paid, and who paid it, here; but the amount was over 160 l., and I remember that, with the exception of 30 l., the whole was subscribed by the general public and by the workmen themselves.

2488. How much was subscribed by the workmen themselves?—I am not able to say.

2489. About 40 l. you said just now?—Yes, but when I made that statement my idea was on taking the amount that remained, but I meant to say the whole amount with the exception of private subscriptions.

2490. Excluding all private subscriptions, and all subscriptions by the general public, I want to know how large a sum was raised from the workmen themselves?—I am not able to say.

2491. Can you not give me any idea?—No.

2492. Not within 10 l.?—No, I do not presume I can from memory.

2493. Was 10 l. raised from the workmen themselves?—Yes, more.

2494. Was 20 l.?—Yes.

2495. More than that?—Yes, I should think so.

2496. Was 30 l.?—Yes, I should think 50 l. was subscribed by the workmen themselves.

2497. Then you had 110 l. raised from the general public?—Of the 160 l. raised by the association, about 100 l. was subscribed by the workmen themselves, about 30 l. by shopkeepers, &c., and 30 l. of a private subscription.

2498. The committee-men, of course, would subscribe to this fund?—Yes.

2499. Handsomely?—I do not know that; it would be according to their means.

2500. The candidate subscribed, of course?—I am not aware that he paid a penny.

Mr. James Hampson, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Hampson.

2501. Chairman.] Do you live at Ashton-under-Lyne?—Yes.

2502. What is your profession?—I am a general agent.

2503. Are you in any public capacity?—I look after the affairs of the Conservative party, municipal, Parliamentary, and county.

2504. You are not a member of the town council?—No.

2505. Has Ashton a municipal corporation?—Yes, it has.

2506. Have you had much experience in the management of the municipal elections?—Yes, for the last five years.

2507. How are they conducted?—Very badly, indeed; there is gross intimidation, bribery, and corruption.

2508. To begin with bribery; how is that carried on?—Giving voters pay as messengers, or as canvassers.

2509. Are large sums given to the voters?—They are paid very liberally by one party.

2510. Do we understand that this bribery takes place on one side only?—On one side only, to my knowledge.

2511. Is that the side with which you are connected?—No; there is no bribery takes place on the side with which I am connected; there is no necessity for it.

2512. But it is within your knowledge that it does take place on the other side?—It is.

2513. How have you acquired that knowledge?—By personal knowledge of the parties.

2514. Do you mean that it is notorious; is there no attempt at concealment of the way in which this bribery is carried on?—It is acknowledged by the parties themselves, upon one side, that they have been bribed, and received so much a day, and they have canvassed for them.

2515. Is this description of influence successful; does it enable that party who uses it, to carry the election?—It is successful. It is confined to two wards in the borough. The municipality is divided into four wards; two wards are represented by Conservatives, and the two others, Portland-place Ward and St. Peter's Ward, are represented by Liberals.

2516. Is it in those two latter wards that corruption prevails?—It is in those two wards that corruption does prevail.

2517. In spite of the success which has attended those corrupt practices, they have not been adopted by your party?—No, not to my knowledge.

2518. Does treating also prevail?—Treating prevails to a very great extent.

2519. Is that also confined to the one party?—To the one party.

2520. Are there contests at every election?—No; we had a contest, three years ago last November, for Market Ward; but, independent of that, we have not had one for four years, not since 1864.

2521. Did you say that intimidation also prevailed in the municipal elections?—Yes, it does.

2522. How is that applied?—It is applied to people working in the several mills; in fact, we had a case where several voters working in a mill requested the protection of the Conservative party, and in one case we got a private house, in Welbeck-street, and we got five or six voters, and the Liberal roughs came and demolished the windows and the whole of the forms and benches in the building, and nearly killed one man.

2523. Intimidation is practised, then, by mobs, is it?—By roughs; by a mob engaged by the Liberals.

2524. You do not refer, do you, to intimidation practised by masters upon their workmen?—Yes, I refer to that also.

2525. Will you explain how that was?—In the municipal elections the mill-owners send a list from one mill to another, but I do not allude so particularly in respect to that as in respect to the corporation. In the corporation they are all on one side, and there it is used to a great extent as undue influence. I have known people during the cotton famine who were working as labourers, taken from their work, and tried to be what we called "bottled," but the cab windows were demolished in which they have been taken away.

2526. Did you say that the corporation was all on one side?—The corporation is all on one side, from beginning to end; there is not a single person connected with the Conservative cause amongst the whole of the officials of the corporation of Ashton-under-Lyne.

2528. Then the Liberals have a majority on the council?—No; in the council there are 12 Conservatives and 12 Liberals; but the Liberals had some years ago before my time stolen a march upon them, and got the eight aldermen, and they have got the election of the mayor, and consequently they have got 20 or 21; this year it is only 20, because the mayor is an alderman as well, but there are 20 to 12 of the others.

2529. And undue influence, you say, is used by the officers of the town in the municipal elections?—To a very flagrant extent.

2530. Will you state precisely what the nature of that undue influence is?—In every department, whether it would be working in the sand, or at a gravel-hole, or sweeping the streets, in nearly every form and shape that they can possibly use any influence, they have done it, both at the municipal and the Parliamentary elections.

2531. In what way do they use it; what is the nature of the influence?—They have gone to the people and told them they must vote so and so, or they will discharge them.

2532. Do you know that those threats of discharging certain workmen have ever been made?—Yes, there are several who have been discharged. I cannot just call to mind the names of the persons discharged; I have here our first list, published after the election, of people that have been discharged from cotton mills principally, but it embraces other works as well (handing in a list to the Committee).

2533. Will you state to the Committee what this list is?—That is what we call the Victim Fund List, persons who have been discharged for voting in the Parliamentary election.

2534. I presume this has no reference to the municipal election?—No, not to the municipal.

2535. Did I correctly understand you to say that, to your knowledge, intimidation is not practised by the masters on their workmen with respect to the municipal elections?—I will not call it intimidation, but from the position of the masters, and from the nature of the voting by the persons residing on their premises or working in their mills, there is some kind of influence which you can only account for on the principle of undue influence: for instance, there is a large property in Ashton-under-Lyne belonging to Mr. Hugh Mason. In one street called Hamilton-street, there are 26 houses, and the occupants of those 26 houses recorded their votes for Mr. Milner Gibson, but the same applies to the municipal as well as the Parliamentary elections. In Oxford-street there are 22 houses, and 22 votes were recorded for Mr. Milner Gibson. In Ann-street there are 23 houses, and 21 votes were recorded for Mr. Milner Gibson; the other two were not on the list.

2536. I am asking you now with regard to the municipal elections?—The same remark would apply to the municipal; if we have a contest in that ward, those persons invariably vote alike; we have not had for six years, to my knowledge, a person upon the property who even remained neutral, or only one, and he had to remove from the property.

2537. Have you ever heard of workmen being discharged for voting against the wish of their employers at the municipal elections?—I will not go so far as that; it was the Parliamentary elections that I spoke to.

2538. Do you think it has been threatened?—It has been used, I am satisfied, to a great extent; only I do not speak to that of my own personal knowledge.

2539. The chief evils which you think prevail in the municipal elections are bribery, treating, and a certain amount of undue influence used by owners of property?—Yes.

2540. Will you now go to the Parliamentary elections; has there always been a contest at Ashton?—I do not remember any for a number of years for the Parliamentary borough.

2541. You can only speak of the last contest?—Only the last one; there has not been one before, I think, for six or eight years, under the old Act; The Ten Pounder Act.

2542. Are the voters for the Parliamentary borough much the same as those at the municipal elections?—Yes, I take them to be literally the same.

2543. Is there not a different qualification?—I do not think there is a difference in Ashton of twenty in the whole borough.

2544. Did any improper practices prevail at the last Parliamentary election?—To a very great extent, in every shape and form.

2545. Did bribery exist?—Bribery I cannot charge, but intimidation and undue influence I know prevailed.

2546. Did treating prevail?—Yes.

2547. To a very great extent?—To a certain extent, but not very much.

2548. Was it practised by both sides?—The

20 April 1869.

Conservatives had no requirement to treat at all; it was a dead certainty.

2549. You say that they did not require it, but did they do it or not; were not the public-houses open?—The public-houses were not open at all; not for the Conservative party, except for the canvassers at night, when they had done their work, to meet together and compare notes; that was all the public-houses accounts that we had. I do not know of a single penny piece that was thrown away in treating.

2550. But, on the other side, you think that it did prevail to a certain extent?—Not extensively.

2551. Then the chief evil which you think prevailed was the system of intimidation?—Intimidation, and undue influence of masters with their hands, and property-owners with cottagers owing rent, and going to them.

2552. And also by the Corporation upon their subordinates?—By the Corporation, to every available extent that they could make use of.

2553. Will you state what you know of the undue influence which took place, as applied by the masters upon their workmen in the mills?—Perhaps it would be as well if I were to refer to one or two of those cases that I have brought with me; the declaration of parties who have been upon our fund, to whom we paid money, and who have given declarations before the magistrates; if you refer to number two on the list I have handed in, I will call attention to that case.

2554. Will you explain first to the Committee, what this Victim Fund was?—It was in consequence of a great quantity of people who were discharged for voting according to their own conscience and feeling.

2555. By whom was this fund got up?—I raised it amongst several gentlemen in the town. I had a meeting of gentlemen, who gave contributions, and we had very little trouble at all in raising the fund.

2556. Was it raised by the Conservative gentlemen in Ashton?—Yes, it was raised by the Conservative gentlemen in Ashton; I called a meeting of them when I found that so many people had suffered.

2557. You did not get subscriptions from the workmen?—No; from no person excepting some 14 or 16 gentlemen.

2558. What was the amount that was subscribed?—About 290 l.

2559. Who had the management of it?—The management was under the committee of the Ashton-under-Lyne Working Men's Church and Conservative Association, of which I was secretary.

2560. Will you explain how the operations of this fund were conducted?—A committee of 12 were appointed from the body of working men, and all the cases of application to us were looked into by them before we gave them any relief; if they had any doubts upon their minds, they went to the places themselves and ascertained the truth or the untruthfulness of the statement.

2561. Did what you saw in managing the affairs of this association lead you to suppose that intimidation had been practised to a great extent?—I am perfectly positive of it.

2562. Will you explain those depositions which you have there; how did the parties get before the magistrates to be sworn?—I took them before the magistrates; it is simply a declaration.

2563. Sir George Grey.] A voluntary declaration made by the voter?—Yes, made by the voter voluntarily.

2564. Chairman.] There were no proceedings taken?—No, I am not sufficiently fond of the law to take proceedings if I can avoid it. This is one of the declarations: "I, James Sumner, now of Alderley Edge, in the County of Chester, late of Carrs, Hurst, Ashton-under-Lyne, in the County of Lancaster, do hereby solemnly and sincerely declare that I was gardener to Mr. Oldham Whittaker, of Hurst, up to the time of the election for the borough of Ashton-under-Lyne, the 18th day of November 1868. On Friday, the 13th day of November, William Pleasant, Mr. Whittaker's second gardener, came to me and said he would tell me how far Mr. Whittaker intended to carry out the 'Screw System.' Any of his servants who stood neutral he should take no advantage of, but any who voted against him he should put the screw on; and Pleasant stated that Mr. Oldham Whittaker had used those words at the committee-room, and he further told us that Mr. Whittaker would come and see about it himself. Mr. Oldham Whittaker came soon after, and he said, 'Well, Sumner, are you going to give us your vote?' I told him I had pledged for Mr. Thomas Walton Mellor. He replied, 'What! will you go against your master?' And I said, 'It will have to stand as it is now, sir.' And to confirm his words, he came to us, myself and fellow-servant, or the 19th of November, the day after the election, and told us to put on our coats and walk off about our business at a minute's warning, but I afterwards recovered a week's wages through the county court. And I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true: James Sumner. Declared at Ashton-under-Lyne, in the County of Lancaster, the 10th day of April 1869; before me, S. D. Lees, Justice of the Peace for Lancashire."

he would give me a character; he said he had nothing to do with characters, they came from the office. On the same day, after dinner, he sent for me again, and told me that the master said he would stop all that went in face of him. I said, 'Then I am bagged for voting.' He said, 'You may call it so.' Robert Whittaker is cousin of Mr. Oldham Whittaker. On the Tuesday he sent for me again, and asked me if I was ready to go that night or on Saturday; I said, 'Neither, I want a week's notice.' He said, 'Then take a week's notice from to-night,' which I agreed to do, although I was entitled to a week's notice from the pay-day. I have been in the employment of Oldham Whittaker 16 years; I continued to work until the Tuesday night, when my notice expired; but on the Saturday previous, another person, Frank Taylor, was brought to my duties, and he continued there about three weeks, when he was removed to another place. The looms of which I had charge continued to work after I left, and are still working. I have a character signed by the cashier for Mr. Whittaker, which states that I have left owing to the stopping of the looms. I have a wife and two children, one a month old when I was discharged. And I make this solemn declaration, conscientiously believing the same to be true: Joseph Gee. Declared at Ashton-under-Lyne, in the county of Lancaster, the 10th of April 1869, before me, S. D. Lees, Justice of the Peace for Lancashire."

2566. Do all the declarations refer to Mr. Oldham Whittaker?—I have two others that refer to Mr. Oldham Whittaker, but I have another from another party which refers to Mr. Buckley, of Ryecroft:—"I, Plant Chadwick, of Ashton-under-Lyne, in the county of Lancaster, do hereby solemnly and sincerely declare that I have worked at Mr. James Buckley's mill at Ryecroft, Ashton-under-Lyne, for 22 years, 18 years of which I have been a self-acting minder, but was discharged on the 30th of December 1868. William Chadwick, the manager, told me that I was to stop work when I had doffed my mules; and on asking him who had ordered my discharge, he told me that it was Mr. William Buckley, brother of the owner of the mill. I told him I would see Mr. William Buckley, but previous to my being able to do so, Mr. William Chadwick again called upon me, and said he had seen Mr. William Buckley at No. 2 mill, when he told him that I wanted to see him, but Mr. Buckley informed him that he did not want to see me, but I must go to the office and get my wages; and the manager said I might as well dress myself at once, and go to the office and receive my wages. I said, 'No; I would rather see Mr. William Buckley myself before I left.' Afterwards I went and saw Mr. William Buckley, and asked him the cause of my being discharged. His answer was, 'Why, has not Mr. Chadwick told you?' I said he had not done so; when Mr. Buckley said he had nothing to do with it; the manager had done it on his own responsibility; but I feel perfectly assured that the reason of my being discharged from my employment was owing to my having voted for Mr. Thomas Walton Mellor at the election the previous November. I have a wife and five children, and am now only earning 10 s. per week as a piecer, instead of 24 s.; and I make this solemn declaration conscientiously believing the same to be true.—Plant Chadwick.—Declared at Ashton-under-Lyne, in the county of Lancaster, the 10th day of April 1869, before me, S. D. Lees, Justice of the Peace for Lancashire."

Mr. J. Hampson.

20 April 1869.

2567. Are Mr. Whittaker and Mr. Buckley aware of the existence of those declarations?—I am not acquainted with that myself.

2568. How were those declarations obtained?—By the men coming forward themselves; they made statements to me before we gave them any relief at all, and those statements are embodied in those declarations. We did not want to have any bother about it ourselves; we wanted everything to die away quietly, but still, at the same time, we must relieve them, and consequently we had their declarations made, and we saw that they were correct before we gave them any relief.

2569. But those declarations on oath were made a few days since, were they not?—Those declarations are exactly in unison with the first statements made by the individuals discharged.

2570. But those declarations were only made a few days since?—Yes, on the 10th of April.

2571. Probably you obtained them for the purpose of bringing them here?—Certainly.

2572. You are not aware whether Mr. Whittaker and Mr. Buckley knew that those statements affecting them have been made?—I am not aware of that.

2573. Mr. Bright.] There was nobody to make any reply or explanation when those men went before the magistrates?—I am not acquainted with that.

2574. Sir George Grey.] Who took those people before the magistrates to make the declaration?—I did.

2575. How did you collect them?—I sent for one from Alderley Edge.

2576. You knew the cases. did you?—Yes, I had got their statements.

2577. How were the statements originally made?—By themselves in their own handwriting.

2578. Did they come voluntarily in the first instance?—They came voluntarily to me.

2579. Mr. Edward Egerton.] They came to get a portion of this fund, and in order to satisfy yourselves that what they stated was true, you got those statements taken down?—Yes, that is how it was.

2580. Chairman.] Was the election, upon the whole, conducted quietly?—It was remarkably quiet, and far more so than the municipal elections are; in fact, the whole town was decidedly in favour of one person.

2581. I presume there was no violence?—No, there was not a single individual taken into custody; and not a single case of drunkenness that I know of; in fact, the whole body of the police themselves say they never saw anything so quiet.

2583. What sort of violence is that; are voters prevented from going to the poll?—Yes, and bottled; kept in public-houses. They hold committee-rooms in public-houses, which we do not do in the Parliamentary election; and it is a great evil having committee-rooms in public-houses. In the municipal elections there is no controlling power over them the same as in the Parliamentary election, each man will do as he thinks proper, and they are not afraid of the expense; in fact, I believe, that the election in one ward in the town has cost as much money as the Parliamenary election did this last time; I am speaking of the Portland-place Ward.

20 April 1869.

2584. Do you mean to say that committees were not held in public-houses for the Parliamentary election?—No, they were not.

2585. Why not?—We had rooms on purpose for that; there was no necessity for having committee-rooms at public-houses.

2586. What is the necessity of having them in public-houses at the municipal elections?—Because they will do as they have a mind; there is no fear, they can spend what money they have a mind, and carry on any bribery, corruption, or intimidation, or drinking, or whatever it may be in the municipal elections; there is no controlling power municipally. It wants altering all together, there is no doubt about it.

2587. Have you ever attempted to stop the practices which you have described by putting the law in force?—I have always determinately set my face against them, because I am satisfied from the position of parties that we have nothing at all to fear by carrying a pure election.

2588. How have you set your face against them?—In meetings amongst gentlemen, or working men, or whatever it might be.

2589. That is to say, you have attempted to conduct the elections without any such practices on your side?—I have, and we have stopped them on our side.

2590. But have you ever attempted to put the law in force against such practices on the other side?—No.

2591. Why not?—I am not fond of law sufficiently for that.

2592. Should you not appeal to the law if a man picked your pocket?—I do not know; I should question whether or not.

2595. Do you state that it was perfectly well understood that such intimidation prevailed at the Parliamentary election?—Yes.

2596. Is there not a law against that?—Yes.

2597. Could you not have prosecuted the person who used such intimidation?—I could.

2598. But your dislike to appealing to the law prevented your doing so?—Yes, we had gained a victory, and consequently we rested satisfied with our gain.

2599. Did this intimidation prevail only when the election was going on, or did it prevail previously?—It prevailed for a week or a fortnight before.

2600. But you did not consider it worth while to put the law in motion?—No; I was satisfied with the victory.

2601. Are you and other gentlemen in the borough satisfied with the existing state of things, or do you wish to see any remedy adopted for this system of intimidation?—So far as I am concerned, I have always been opposed to the principle of the ballot, thinking that it was un-English, but from the conduct exhibited at Ashton-under-Lyne, during this last time, and during all our municipal contests, and also in the county, I do thoroughly believe that it will be better, and more advantageous to the country, for the ballot to be carried into effect. I believe that with the franchise being extended so widely, and so liberally now, working men require some protection to guard them in giving their votes, whether it be by the ballot, or any other means. I do not know, only from my knowledge of Ashton-under-Lyne, I am satisfied that things will always be unpleasant, excepting they have the ballot. It is a very hard thing to think of people working 22 years for a gentleman, and then that they should be discharged for recording their votes according to their own conscience.

2602. Is it the extension of the franchise which has changed your opinion upon the subject?—No; it is the extension of the franchise that necessitates the operation of the ballot.

2603. Are you in favour of adopting it for both the municipal and the Parliamentary elections?—Yes, both for the municipal and the Parliamentary.

2604. And you are in favour of making the law affecting bribery, treating, and intimidation at the municipal elections the same as with regard to the Parliamentary elections?—I am.

2605. Those are the two changes which you would recommend?—Yes.

2606. I think you said there was gross intimidation by roughs in the municipal election?—Yes.

2607. Are those men paid?—Yes; those roughs were paid, to my certain knowledge.

2608. You never employ roughs on your side, I suppose?—I never employ roughs on our side; I believe there were some employed by some private individual, but I had nothing to do with it; it was contrary to the feeling of the people generally, only he took it upon himself, upon his own private account, to employ some few at the municipal election.

2609. What was the object of the exercise of the intimidation that you have spoken of by the millowners and the Corporation servants?—To keep the power of the Council in the hands of a certain party. They have got, as I stated before, twelve councillors on their side and all the aldermen, but they were afraid of two of the councillors being taken from them, which would not have given the other party the majority, but they were in fear of it, and they are in fear of it at the present time.

2610. What power does the Corporation possess?—Over the men simply as labourers; some may be sweepers of the streets, some may work at the gravel pits, some may be paviors, some may be cutting sewers, or such as that; they employ a great number of servants.

2611. Has this list, which you call the Victim Fund List, been published and circulated in Ashton?—Yes, amongst all the millowners; but only amongst the millowners, in order to get work for the people who were discharged.

2612. So that the millowners names who are stated here as having discharged men, are known generally?—Yes, they are so.

2613. Has this list been placed in the hands of the gentlemen whose names are given here?—No, I have merely sent it out to parties who I thought would employ the men.

2614. When was this printed?—It is dated December 2nd.

2615. Mr. Bright.] The statements were got up in December, but was that little pamphlet printed in December, or not till a later period?—The statements were got up in November; we paid a portion of the people in the week of the election, that is on the Saturday after, to the amount of 5 l. 12 s., which was their first half week.

2616. When was it actually printed and circulated?—It was printed on the 2nd of December, or the day after; I gave it in to the printer on the 2nd of December, to be printed the day after.

2618. Then to what extent has this been published?—To the amount of about 50 copies; we have had several editions of them.

2619. Has it been printed and circulated privately, but not publicly?—It has been merely sent to the millowners, and it is merely an application to them to find employment for the men in consequence of their being discharged by certain individuals.

2620. Has there been any answer to those statements on the part of the persons charged?—No; I have a copy of a statement made here which will bear upon the case. It is from Mr. Oldham Whittaker himself, the gentleman who has discharged the greatest number of hands; it is a notice signed by himself, and it is dated the 19th November 1868; it was posted in the workshop windows, "Notice. James Andrew stated, at the meeting held in the Saint John's church school, that he knew that despicable and iniquitous means were being used to obtain votes for Mr. Gibson, and he hoped that the electors would not be bribed by 8 lbs. of beef. Enos Andrew went into the Saint John's church school and kicked and smashed the polling-booth erected by Mr. Reginald Whittaker, under the authority of the mayor and by permission of Mr. Greenwood. The Rev. La Fontaine almost spat in my face, and pointing at me, shouted across the street in front of the blue committee-rooms, that I ought to be in a lunatic asylum, and subsequently ordered me out of a polling-booth, although I had the authority of the mayor for being there. When James Andrew has proved that there was one single case of a vote being obtained by despicable and iniquitous means, and when he has proved that there was a corrupt motive or an intention to bribe in giving out the beef; when Enos Andrew has made ample apology for smashing and breaking the polling-booth; when the Rev. La Fontaine has expiated the insults he has offered to me, those hands that have been discharged from their work for aiding and abetting these slanders shall be taken on again. November 19, 1868, Oldham Whittaker. The above is a correct copy of the notice posted by Mr. O. Whittaker, Joseph Gee. Declared at Ashton-under-Lyne, in the county of Lancaster, the 17th day of April 1869, before me, S. D. Lees, Justice of the Peace for Lancashire."

20 April 1869.

2621. You allege that the statement, a copy of which you have read, acknowledges that certain persons were dismissed for being parties to practices of which their employer disapproved; is that so?—That is so.

2622. And you take that as being, to a certain extent, an acknowledgment of the fact that they were dismissed for voting?—Certainly.

2623. That is your allegation?—Yes.

2624. Then the gentleman to whom you refer is aware that he is charged with having dismissed persons for having voted?—No, I have had no communication with any party; I have done my business in a straightforward manner between man and man; I am satisfied in my own mind, and I have no occasion to refer to Mr. Oldham Whittaker or any party, that the statements given by the working men were perfectly correct.

2625. You stated that the occupants of the houses in three streets in Ashton voted in one particular way; were those streets the property of certain millowners?—Yes, all three streets were the property of one millowner, and the persons living in those streets worked in the mill.

2626. That is a common practice in Lancashire, is it not?—Yes.

2627. You state that in one case, where a man went against his employer, that person was discharged, or removed from the street?—Yes, that was where he remained neutral.

2628. Because he remained neutral he was removed from the street?—That is the only reason that I ever knew for it.

2629. You do not know whether he was a bad workman, or anything of that sort?—No, he is working in the town at the present time in the same position.

2630. Was this millowner at that time an active member of the committee of the candidate?—Yes, a most active member.

2631. You say, with regard to the Parliamentary election, that improper practices prevailed in every shape and form excepting bribery?—Yes, excepting bribery.

2632. Treating was general, but not extensive on the other side?—Not extensive.

2633. Intimidation and undue influence prevailed?—Yes, to a great extent.

2634. Was it confined to the millowners?—No; property owners and others belonging to the Corporation practised it.

2635. Are the millowners and the property owners the same people in Ashton?—No, a person may own 10 or 20 houses, and yet have nothing to do with a mill.

2636. But was there any intimidation on the part of the workmen against each other?—No; the workmen would have been all right; at least it was, as I said before, a remarkably quiet election, because the working men will not go against each other except they are excessively bribed.

2637. When you say that they would have been all right, do you mean that they would vote in a particular way, or that they would permit permit each other to vote as they pleased?—They would vote according to their principles.

20 April 1869.

2638. No pressure is exercised in Ashton by one workman over another, or by any body of workmen over other bodies of workmen?—There is not.

2639. The trades' unions, for instance, have they no influence?—No; they eschew interference with political matters altogether, because they are composed of the two parties. I do not belong to that body myself, but I may say, from information, that I have been told they never bring forward or moot politics at their meetings at all, so far as the workmen are concerned.

2640. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You have spoken as to the considerable pressure that is exercised by the Corporation upon different people; is it a fact that the town of Ashton has borrowed a very large sum from the Public Works Loan Commissioners for the relief of the cotton operatives who were thrown out of employment?—Yes, it is a fact; I do not remember the amount.

2641. In consequence of those funds, is it not the fact that the Corporation are engaged in very extensive works, making fresh sewers and so on?—They have borrowed funds for several purposes, for necessary public works in the cotton panic, to the amount of 217,000 l.

2642. That gives them the command of a great number of workmen?—Yes, and vast influence.

2643. Therefore the influence of the Corporation, very extensively exercised, has very great effect upon any election?—It has.

2644. You have stated to the Committee today that you believe the whole of that influence was exercised on one side?—Distinctly so.

2645. And you stated to the Committee that you were the first person who thought of starting what you call the Victim Fund?—I was.

2646. I presume you talked and consulted with other gentlemen in the town before you started it?—Yes, I did.

2647. What is the general feeling in Ashton-under-Lyne?—I saw one or two gentlemen who told me to call a meeting of gentlemen. Then they gave me instructions what to do to form a committee out of our association, and left them to act as a committee, and have the controlling power of the fund, and they amongst themselves contributed 10 l. or 20 l., whatever it might be, to relieve them.

2648. Have you found any assistance from gentlemen on the other side who were anxious to put an end to this system of intimidation?—No, I have not; they would be very sorry to lose the power.

2649. Did you make any application to any one on the other side?—No, I did not.

2650. Have you any suggestions to make to the Committee with a view to putting an end to such a state of things as you say exist?—I do not know that I have, except what I mentioned to the Chairman, namely, the ballot. Some parties do not believe in the ballot, but so far as I am concerned, from my knowledge of the facts as they have occurred in Ashton, I think it would be a great boon and blessing to the working man in protecting them in their votes.

2651. Do you think that the ballot would put a stop to this state of things which you have described?—Either the ballot or some other form of secret voting, but I am not able to judge of any other form; I only know that it is a very bad state of things that exist at present in Ashton.

2652. I think you stated that at the last Parliamentary election at Ashton there was no bribery of any sort?—No bribery at all by either party.

2653. Was there much demonstration of feeling?—There was very much demonstration of feeling; in fact, the whole town was blue, men, women, and children.

2654. That was the colour of the Conservative candidate?—Yes.

2655. Mr. Mellor has resided for some time, has he not, in Ashton?—Yes, all his life, I think.

2656. Is he a large employer of labour?—Yes.

2657. And very much respected?—Yes.

2658. There was a general feeling, was there not, on behalf of him as a townsman?—Yes, there was throughout the town, and there is at the present time.

2659. Do you think that in the case of a stranger coming down to contest Ashton there would be the same pure feeling which was evinced at the late election?—Yes, we could have carried a stranger.

2660. Then you do not think that the state of purity was entirely due to the confidence which the town had that they should be able to return Mr. Mellor?—I believe it is due to the majority of the working men being Conservative in feeling. The two wards that are represented by Conservative parties number some 300 or 400 more than the other two wards, which are represented by Liberals.

2661. As secretary to this society, I suppose you have the means of ascertaining the opinions of the working men?—I have.

2662. What are their opinions generally with regard to the ballot?—The Conservative working men are in favour of the ballot.

2663. Do you think that that is the general feeling, without reference to politics?—Yes, it is.

2664. Did it form the subject of many discussions at the public meetings, previous to the election?—Not the public meetings; we do our business very quietly amongst the committee and the general body.

2665. Were there no large general meetings held by the two candidates?—Yes; but I never heard that question mooted.

2666. How did you arrive at your knowledge?—By the members of our association, which are over 600 or 700.

2667. The members of your association are all Conservatives, are they not?—Yes; they are working men, and they meet there sometimes three or four days a week; but I may say that the same feeling is on the other side amongst the working men.

2668. What is Mr. Mellor's opinion with respect to the ballot?—I believe his opinion is in favour of the ballot.

2668*. Did he pronounce himself to be so?—He did.

2669. Mr. Raikes.] Is it not the custom in the municipal elections at Ashton to send to the mill-owners a list of the persons in their employ?—It is known that they send them as far as to Oldham, to Messrs. Hibbert and Platt.

2670. Who send them?—I do not know who sends them, but they go there; whether they go from from the Reform Union, or where it is, I do not know, but we have had a number of men discharged from Hibbert and Platt's on the same principle, as from Mr. Oldham Whittaker.

2671. Mr. Bright.] Will you undertake to say that anybody has been discharged from Mr. Platt's works on account of his voting?—I do not say so; I have got no case.

2672. But you did say so?—I have got the persons names.

2673. You say that, do you?—Yes, we had them on our Victim Fund.

2674. Is it within your knowledge that at the last election for Oldham, more than 400 persons who worked for Mr. Platt, voted against him?—I do not know that; I had nothing to do with Oldham; I was confined to Ashton.

2675. Has Mr. Platt any works at Ashton?—No; he has not.

2676. Has he workpeople living at Ashton?—Yes; there are a number of workpeople living at Ashton and working at Oldham.

2677. Mr. Raikes.] With respect to Messrs. Hibbert and Platt, is it the custom amongst the millowners where they have those lists sent to them, that they influence the persons in their employ?—Yes.

2678. Have you seen overlookers bringing up men in a body to vote?—No, I have not seen that; I have heard of it, but I do not know it of my own knowledge.

2679. Has your attention been called to a placard to this effect: "Election of Members of the Local Board. As the masters in these mills pay all the rates of tenants living in their cottages, it is expected that they will vote for the persons nominated by Mr. Whittaker; the other workpeople are requested to do the same. By order; Hurst Mills, April 12th, 1869?"—I have seen that placard.

2680. Mr. Bright.] You say that you have seen that placard; have you seen it before you came to-day into this room?—I have seen a copy of it from there.

2681. Have you seen the placard itself?—Not in the mills.

2682. Have you seen it at all as a printed placard?—I have seen two copies got by two individuals exactly similar; I offered a person 5 s. to bring me the original copy, but I could not get it.

2683. You have not been to the mills at Hurst, and seen it upon the walls?—No.

2684. Mr. Raikes.] You put confidence in the person who shewed you the copy?—I am perfectly satisfied that the copy is a correct copy; I have got it from two different parties.

2685. Mr. James.] When did you get the copy?—At the beginning of last week; on the 13th, I think it was.

2686. You knew of those men being discharged, and you established the Victim Fund in November?—Yes.

2687. Did you go on the 10th of April before a magistrate and get those declarations?—Yes; because I thought there was a necessity for it.

2688. In what respect?—To shew to this Committee the reason why they had been discharged; to make it properly official; I got it for this purpose.

2689. Were the people sworn to it?—The declaration was made before a magistrate.

2690. But nobody seems to have been sworn at all; it was simply a statement?—Simply a declaration, not an oath.

2691. Is Mr. Lees a magistrate of the borough of Ashton?—For the county of Lancashire, not for the borough.

2692. Mr. Dalglish.] In the printed list which you gave in, I find there are 29 victims coming out of Mr. Whittaker's mill, and there are only 42 altogether; how do you account for that immense per-centage coming out from Mr. Whittaker's mill?—But we had more than those; we had upwards of 40 from Mr. Oldham Whittaker's; that which you have before you is merely the first edition of the publication; we have had two other publications since that; we have had about 70 to relieve.

2693. Seventy out of Mr. Whittaker's mill?—No, about 40.

2694. How many hands does Mr. Whittaker employ altogether, do you suppose?—I am not prepared to state that; they employ a great number of men, they have got two very large concerns.

2695. Do they employ 400?—Double 400, I should say.

2696. Therefore, if they have 800, they have turned away one-twentieth of the whole of their hands from political motives?—They turned away near upon 50, but 40 we relieved.

2697. Then there would be a still greater proportion; was it not stagnation of trade, or any other cause which led to the dismissal of those hands; no stagnation of trade?—Not to my knowledge.

2698. Mr. Cross.] You say that you think you ought to have the ballot now in consequence, as I understood you, of the increase of the constituency?—In consequence of the power which the masters exercise over the increased constituency, that is to say, the working men.

2699. You mean over the lower class of voters?—Yes.

2700. Are the working class in Ashton-under-Lyne rather educated for their station in life or not?—They are.

2701. You do not think that they are in danger from their masters, simply from want of education?—No; they are better educated than their masters, some of them.

2702. You say that you could have returned for Ashton-under-Lyne even a stranger, if he had been a Conservative?—We could.

2703. How was it that, under those circumstances, Mr. Milner Gibson represented Ashton for so long?—Because it has never been in the hands of the working men before. The extension of the franchise has given us that. It was the 10-pounders formerly, the shopkeepers and others, and therefore they had a majority of something like 100 or so in that constituency; but the moment it was extended to the working men, then it was extended in the proper direction to the Conservative element of society.

2704. You mean that the working men of Ashton-under-Lyne are more Conservative than the old 10-pounders?—Most undoubtedly.

Mr. J. Hampson. — — 20 April 1869.

19th November 1868"; she was a relation to parties who are voters.

2706. What relation?—I cannot exactly say the relationship, but she was a relation.

2707. If you look at No. 37, it is stated that Jane Salt was discharged for wearing a blue ribbon on her neck; do you believe that to be the fact?—She is a relation to a person who voted for Mr. Milner Gibson, and daughter to a person of the name of Ford.

2708. You believe that not only voters themselves were punished for the exercising of their franchise, but even their relations?—Yes, even their relations.

2709. Mr. Staveley Hill.] What was the date of your beginning to get up this association?—After the election.

2710. How long after the election?—The same week; there were some of them discharged on the 19th. Trade has been, I believe, very bad, generally speaking, and they were out directly, and they felt the effects of it the same week, and they made an application, and I gave them something on account.

2711. About how many applications were made to you before you got up this society?—We had, I daresay, 30 in the first six or seven days.

2712. Then you got up subscriptions; what date did you begin to relieve them?—The same week as the election.

2713. You say that their cases were investigated by a sort of committee of 12 working men. Were those men who had been taking an interest on behalf of your candidate?—Part of them had, and part had not.

2714. Did they sit and investigate the cases, and have the people before them?—They did.

2715. And did they settle how much each man was to be paid?—Yes; they not only went to the parties themselves and inquired, but they made inquiries of the neighbours.

2716. Did they report to you?—Yes; they reported to me.

2717. Who was it settled what amount should be paid per week?—We settled it amongst ourselves. We paid them two-thirds of what they were earning. If they were earning 21 s. per week, we paid the 14 s.

2718. Then did you publish that list with a view of getting them situations?—We did; we sent them round by Rochdale and Oldham.

2719. There are a great number of persons mentioned in the list as having been discharged from Messrs. Oldham, Whittaker & Co.; why did not you send this list to them?—I saw no necessity for it; they would not employ the hands whom they had discharged.

2720. Do you believe that this pamphlet came, shortly after it was printed, to the knowledge of Mr. Whittaker?—I do not know anything about that; I merely published the pamphlet in order to get the people employed whom they had discharged.

2721. Do you believe that Mr. Whittaker knows now of this pamphlet?—I do not know.

2722. Nor with regard to any of the others?—No; that was not my duty.

2723. The O'Conor Don.] Was the fund that you collected for the purpose of relieving those people sufficient to meet all the demands that were made upon you, or were you unable to meet all the requirements?—While we kept it on it was sufficient.

2724. But when you left it off were any of the people out of employment who alleged that they had suffered in consequence of their votes?—There are some out of employment now, and I am relieving some at the present time.

2725. Why did you leave it off; was it because you were unable to continue it?—We were unable to raise the funds.

2726. The funds fell short?—Yes.

2727. Mr. Leatham.] You mentioned one of Mr. Mason's tenants who was discharged because he remained neutral; was that at the last election?—No, that was sometime ago.

2728. It had no connection with the Parliamentary election?—No, not with the Parliamentary election; it was connected with the municipal election.

2729. Did you ever hear of any one tenant of Mr. Mason's having been discharged?—No; they all vote one way; they do not need any discharging.

2730. But your inference was that they would be discharged if they voted the other way?—I did not say so.

2731. Do you think that they would be discharged if they voted contrary to their employer?—I cannot say; probably if it was carried on to any extent it might be so; but I do not wish to speak to anything but what I know as a fact.

2732. Did Mr. Murphy go to Ashton?—Yes, and he did a great deal of harm there when he came to Ashton.

2733. He stayed there some time, did he not?—No, he did not; he was only there a day or two. I think he visited us three or four times.

2734. You say that he did you a great deal of harm; in what respect do you mean?—He did a great deal of harm to our cause.

2735. That is to say, he induced the working men to vote against you?—No, it was not that; I do not believe in him; he did us no good.

2736. He did not produce any ill-feeling, did he, between the Irish workmen and the English workmen?—Yes, he did.

2637. The Irish workmen, most of them, voted for Mr. Milner Gibson, did not they?—Yes.

2738. And you do not from that suppose, do you, that the English workmen voted against Mr. Milner Gibson because they had an ill-feeling against the Irish workmen?—No, I think not.

2739. Mr. Brand.] Did you take any steps to ascertain the truth of the allegations contained in those declarations?—No, only that they were discharged.

2740. Did you communicate with the parties implicated?—The committee inquired about them themselves, and they brought information that their statements were literally true, and then the committee ordered a certain amount of relief to be given to them; that was the only thing that I know about it; I did not go to the mill to ask Mr. Oldham Whittaker about it.

2741. Were the declarations made upon oath?—No; it is simply a declaration, but I might have had them sworn to. It was read over in the presence of the magistrate, and he asked if it was all right and correct, and the person said, "Yes."

2742. Were they made before a single magistrate?—No, there were two: Mr. Ralph Bates, of Staleybridge, and Dr. Lees, of Ashton.

2743. Were they made in open court?—No, at their private residences.

2744. Mr. Bright.] Was Mr. Oldham Whittaker, taker, about whom you have been speaking so much, spoken of as a candidate on your own side before Mr. Mellor was brought out?—He was a supporter of Mr. Milner Gibson.

2745–6. Was he not spoken of as a candidate on your side?—No, he was not.

2747. Do you know that no offer was made to him to come out on your side?—Never officially; I did hear that two gentlemen did go to him; but if they did, they did so without any authority at all; I had no voice in the matter.

2748. But before you had agreed upon your candidate, was not that so?—I had nothing to do with it.

2749. Mr. Mellor himself did not profess to be a Liberal at the election?—No, a Conservative.

2750. The only point on which he agreed with the Liberals was that he was in favour of the ballot?—That was the only point; he went in as an independent member, elected by the Conservatives.

2751. But in favour of the ballot?—In favour of the ballot.

Mr. J. Hampson.

20 April 1869.

2753. Mr. Hugh Mason has a large business in Ashton, has he not?—Large mills.

2754. Has he not built extensive schools there and reading-rooms for his workpeople?—He has improved his property.

2755. Will you answer my question; has he not built extensive schools and reading-rooms, and a complete establishment of that kind for his workpeople?—Yes, certainly he has.

2756. Has he not laid out many thousand pounds?—I do not know.

2757. Will you be kind enough to tell me if you know whether he has laid out a good many thousand pounds in that way with a view to the instruction of his workpeople, or affording them the means of instruction and recreation?—I cannot answer that; I cannot see my way clear to answer it, because I am not acquainted with that property down there; I never go to it; I have no occasion to go to it.

2758. I thought you said that if you went there to ask any of his workpeople about any matter, they were quite ready to give you any information?—No, I say if I want any information about that property, I have no occasion to go and survey it, or anything else, but I can get information from the parties living there.

2759. Have you ever seen those schools and those reading-rooms?—No, I have not.

2760. Not even the outside of them?—I have seen what I suppose to be the outside of them, but I could not tell which was the one and which was the other.

Mr. JOHN WILSON, called in; and Examined.

2761. Chairman.] You live at Ashton-under-Lyne, I believe?—I do.

2762. In what trade are you engaged?—I am an ironmonger.

2763. Have you heard the evidence which has been given to the Committee by Mr. Hampson?—I have.

2764. Do you concur with him as to the amount of intimidation which has prevailed at both the municipal elections and the Parliamentary elections?—I do.

2765. I believe you can give some evidence yourself of the effect of voting, according to your political opinions?—I can.

2766. What are the circumstances?—For six years previous and up to the election, Mr. Oldham Whittaker, who is the owner of large cotton mills in the borough, and a very strong and active partisan of one of the candidates, was in the habit of obtaining from me large quantities of ironmongery for his mills and cottages, and I also had a current account with him for furnishing ironmongery for his house during the whole of that time; Mr. Rowley and Mr. Reginald Whittaker, the son-in-law, and the son of Mr. Oldham Whittaker, were also in the habit of obtaining from me their furnishing ironmongery from the time of their marriage. The cashiers, managers, and others also did business with me, in consequence of the firm, I believe, employing me. On the first Wednesday after the month after the election I went up as usual, and saw Mr. Robert Wallwork, the principal manager, from whom I generally received my orders, and I asked Mr. Wallwork for them. His reply was, "There will be no more orders for you here, Mr. Wilson." I then said, "How is that?" He said, "It is through the election." I said, "Can't I exercise my opinion freely?" He said, "The order is you are not to have any more orders." I said, "Can I see Mr. Whittaker?" He said, "He is from home." I then said, "Can I see Mr. Rowley?" He said, "He is from home;" he also said, "It would have been better for you if you had not taken any part in the election, as you will lose a deal by it." And from that day to this I have not received an order from Mr. Oldham Whittaker, or his son, or his son-in-law, or any of his managers. I took an active part in the late election at public meetings in favour of the candidature of Mr. Mellor, but on no occasion did I ever mention the name of Mr. Oldham Whittaker, or in any way allude to him; I can only attribute the withdrawal of his business to his displeasure at my having taken an active part in securing the return of Mr. Mellor, who was opposed to Mr. Oldham Whittaker in politics; and I am, in fact, quite certain that it is the only true cause; it has never been alleged by Mr. Whittaker, or any of his servants, that the firm was dissatisfied with goods supplied or work done by me.

20 April 1869.

2767. Have you taken any steps since that occasion which you have mentioned, to have an interview with Mr. Whittaker?—I have never taken any steps since.

2768. Then it is only surmise on your part; it is not absolute certainty?—When I asked Mr. Wallwork why I was not to have any more orders, he said that it was through the election; so of course, I then came to the conclusion in my own mind, that he had withdrawn his custom and his work from me for having voted for Mr. Mellor.

2770. Has any pressure ever been put upon you as to your vote at the municipal election?—Tradespeople in general in Ashton-under-Lyne are supported on the one hand, by Conservatives, and on the other hand, by Liberals, that is to say, they choose their tradespeople, according to their politics.

2771. Do you mean to say that customers in Ashton generally choose their tradesmen according to their political opinions?—Yes; if a tradesman votes according to his own opinion, and he is doing business with millowners, if it is in opposition to their principles, that is taken advantage of, I am certain; the ballot would, in my opinion, remedy that.

2772. It was known previously to this election, was it not, that you held Conservative opinions?—Yes.

2773. Had you voted for Conservative candidates at the municipal elections?—I am a member of the town council myself as a Conservative.

2774. That was known to Mr. Whittaker?—It was.

2776. Why do you say "of course"?—For this simple reason, that the mayor gives his casting vote, and has given the power on that side; and we find from time to time that gentlemen have become aldermen, whom the burgesses have actually rejected when they have appealed to them for their suffrages to become councillors; and therefore I should be glad if the aldermen could be chosen by the burgesses.

2777. Do you think that the town council have much influence in the Parliamentary elections?—Yes, they have.

2778. Have the officers appointed by the corporation, exercised a good deal of influence?—They have.

2780. Sir George Grey.] Have you got any additional Conservative custom since you lost Mr. Whittaker's?—No, I do not think that I have; I have not taken particular notice of that.

2781. Mr. Bright.] You would not say that you have not?—At present we could not tell; I really would not say.

2782. Do you think that this exclusive dealing as it is called, has been more shown after this election than on previous occasions in Ashton?—It has been; but we have not had an opportunity of observing it on account of there not being a borough election for some time; but at the municipal elections there has been a very great deal of intimidation and coercion before.

2784. And of course that would give the same knowledge to the Conservatives?—Yes, I say so.

Mr. Samuel Storey, called in; and Examined.

Mr. S. Storey.

2785. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Have you taken any active part in municipal affairs at Bradford?—Yes, I have been a member of the corporation of Bradford for some years; I entered it in the year 1857, and I served a period of three years; I was then out of the corporation for about two years; I entered it again I think in the year 1861, and I then served I think five years.

2786. Have you been an alderman?—No.

2787. Or mayor of Bradford?—No.

2788. What is your trade there?—I am a stuff merchant.

2789. What ward in Bradford did you sit for?—When I entered into the corporation in 1857 I went in for the East Ward without a contest; there was no opposition at all; I was elected in conjunction with Mr. Rawson, who is now an alderman in the borough.

2790. Do you speak mainly for that ward?—That is the ward that I was first elected for; my place of business is in that ward, but when I went in the second time, I went in for the North Ward, where my residence is.

2791. How many wards are there in Bradford?—Eight.

2792. What is the number of municipal electors in Bradford?—I should think over 23,000; I do

I do not know exactly; I think in the East Ward there are something like 3,700 or 3,800; in the North Ward that I afterwards represented, I think there were only 1,300 or 1,400; it is a very small ward.

2793. Are the Parliamentary and municipal boundaries conterminous?—Yes.

2794. Can you tell us the number of Parliamentary electors?—The number of Parliamentary electors is about 21,000.

2797. Was that the case during the time that there was no political excitement in the borough?—If two men struggled to get to be representatives of any ward, of course that principle was carried out; if there was any man particularly ambitious to represent a ward, there was just the same sort of feeling as if it was a political contest.

2798. Do you consider that the practice of treating, or corrupt practices generally, have increased since the political element has been introduced into the municipal elections?—Yes, I think so, decidedly.

2799. In that first period was it usual for the leading inhabitants of the town to take office in the town council?—The leading inhabitants of the town have never done so as a rule; we have had, of course, very first class men as members of the council; but as a rule the leading men in the town cannot be said to have taken their fair share in the municipal offices.

2800. Have you traced any change in that respect during the last few years?—No, I do not know that there has been any change. I think that there are many men who would be disposed to become councillors, but they will not go through the trouble of a contest.

2801. Coming down to the time of which you have spoken, in the year 1867, will you state the manner in which that municipal election was conducted?—As far as I am concerned I feel that I was defeated, not because I had done anything wrong in my position as a councillor, but simply for the part I had taken at the previous Parliamentary election. I was a member of the committee for promoting Mr. Thompson's election: in fact, I seconded him at the nomination, and this appeared to give very great offence, and many men that I am perfectly certain would otherwise have voted for me voted against me. I myself always felt that I was a victim to the part which I had taken in the Parliamentary election. Perhaps other people may think differently. I can only say that I had been two years deputy chairman of the Waterworks Committee, and the last two years that I was in I was chairman of the Waterworks Committee, and I have every reason to believe that I gave satisfaction to the committee, and also to the public; and therefore I cannot understand why I was defeated, if it was not for political considerations.

2802. Was your opponent, on that occasion, a man who had taken an active part politically against you in the Parliamentary election?—No; I hardly know who was my opponent, because one of the parties who succeeded had been colleagues with me for three years, but I declined to coalesce with him, and I looked upon him as my opponent.

2803. Were you defeated by a large majority at the election?—No, I think some 26 or 28, perhaps.

2804. Were there any corrupt practices at that election?—I think there were; I think that many inducements were held out. I do not know that there was any money paid, but of course there was no doubt a great deal of drinking on going on. In fact, I heard of one man who took a very strong part against me, who hired a cab, and he had refreshments, both eating and drinking in this cab, and he took people to the poll in the cab, and refreshed them as he took them.

2805. Is treating practised largely, to your knowledge, or the contrary?—I have no knowledge of any treating, that is, in the shape of money; but of course there were committee meetings at various public-houses, and I daresay there would be a very generous hospitality; but the same thing occurred, I think, on both sides.

2806. Was there any intimidation on that occasion?—I do not know anything about intimidation in respect of the municipal election.

2807. Was there any bribery on that occasion?—I do not know that there was; I have no knowledge that any money passed.

2808. Generally speaking, has any intimidation or bribery existed to any extent in the municipal elections at Bradford?—There is a very strong feeling that at the last municipal elections in November, money did pass, in addition to treating, on a very extensive scale; in fact, in the course of the inquiry consequent upon the petition, parties stated to me that they had received money for their municipal votes.

2809. Have any parties been prosecuted for any acts of that kind in the municipal elections?—Yes; but it generally ends in nothing. When I was defeated, in 1867, two men, I think, if not three, were sentenced by the magistrates for some period of imprisonment. I think a week or 10 days, or something of that sort, for personation.

2810. My questions have been with reference to treating, intimidation, and bribery; have any persons been prosecuted on account of those offences?—I do not recollect any person being prosecuted for treating, or bribery in any shape, in connection with the municipal elections.

2811. Speaking of personation, has that existed to any great extent?—I think it is carried on to a very large extent. We have scarcely ever a municipal election; but parties are taken up for personation; but it is generally dropped after a time; they are brought before the magistrates, and I suppose it is thought that there may be cases on both sides, and the feeling of the election having subsided, it is not thought desirable to go on with the prosecution.

2812. The general feeling is not in favour of prosecuting it too severely?—I think parties, after the election is over, do not like to go on with it; however, in the case of 1867, there were two men, I think, in the ward in which I was a candidate, who were sentenced by the magistrates for so many days' imprisonment, and they got a case to appeal to some of the higher courts in London, but I never heard that the matter ever was proceeded with.

2813. Now, coming down to the last municipal election last autumn, can you speak to any corrupt practices on that occasion?—There is a general feeling, that treating to a considerable extent took place; and I tell you that in one or two instances parties told me that they had received money.

2814. Were you a candidate on that occasion?—I was a candidate in the East Ward.

2815. Were you successful or unsuccessful?—I was unsuccessful.

2816. In the East Ward, were there any corrupt practices?—I think there were.

2817. Of what kind?—I think in the way of treating; suppers, and things of that sort.

2818. In the North Ward, are you aware of any corrupt practices at this last election?—No; I think there was no contest in the North Ward.

2820. Then I suppose the municipal election last autumn had a strong political complexion?—It had decidedly, in certain wards, particularly in this East Ward that I am speaking of.

2821. Was it a political fight between you and your opponent upon that occasion?—I did not make it a political one; when I came out as a candidate I did not come out as a candidate upon political grounds at all; and I did not make a political speech during the previous meetings that I attended, but I think that my opponent did make it a political matter.

2822. How was the treating that you have spoken of done; was it by means of drink tickets, or was it done in any other way?—Of course the committee meetings were held at public-houses, and there was a good deal of drinking, I think; and I am told that suppers took place to a large extent, both at the time of the election and afterwards.

2823. Does that observation apply to one side only, or to both?—I have no knowledge of any suppers being given on our side, but I have no doubt that at our various committee meetings drink would be dispensed just in the same way as was done on the other side.

2824. Are you aware that that was done on the other side?—I have no doubt that it was done, but I never saw it; I know nothing of it myself.

minutes before 12, simply for the purpose of annoying parties who are legitimate candidates, and who may have been chosen by ward meetings.

2828. Do you think there is any necessity, on public grounds, to nominate a man without his consent?—I do not know; I do not like the principle of nominating a man without his consent; I never believed in placing an honour upon a man as a punishment.

2829. Is intimidation practised much at Bradford, either in the municipal or the Parliamentary elections?—I do not think it is in the municipal; I do not think anybody cares about intimidating in municipal matters, but I do think that intimidation has been carried to a pretty large extent in the Parliamentary elections, and this, not done by the principals of the establishments, but I think it has been done to a large extent by overlookers and foremen in the various establishments, who have exercised a very intimidating influence over those who may be under them. I think a great deal of influence has been brought to bear upon small shopkeepers, and that by the working men themselves. In the elections that we have had, the working men have felt very strongly in favour of a particular candidate, and I think they have gone a little bit further than they ought to have done, in the way of pressure upon some of their fellow workmen who may be a little under them in the scale, and also upon small shopkeepers. That is the feeling which we have in Bradford, at least, of the party that I belong to.

2830. Did the foremen and workmen intimidate the same side, or were both sides guilty of intimidation?—I think it has only been on one side; I am not aware of any; I have heard great complaints that influence has been exercised on one particular side; but it is hardly likely that I should hear our own friends come and complain of that.

2831. Has any remedy for it occurred to you?—No.

2832. Do you think that any change in the mode of voting in the municipal and Parliamentary elections would be advisable?—Nothing further than making the law for the municipal elections as strict as it now is for the Parliamentary.

2833. I am asking you now as to the actual mode of voting; do you think that any change in the mode of voting at the Parliamentary or the municipal elections would be advisable?—No; I am decidedly opposed to the introduction of the ballot, or any secret voting; I should not like to resort to it.

2834. Has it ever occurred to you, whether it would be advisable to keep the state of the poll secret during the polling?—I cannot see anything in that at all.

2835. Do not you think that bribery sometimes takes place rather towards the end of the poll, when the candidates are known to be near each other?—If they are running neck and neck, as we say, in election matters, there is no doubt a strong inducement to exercise illegitimate influence, either in the way of bribery or intimidation; I should not care anything about that myself; it is not a matter of any importance.

2837. What kind of man do you think a public prosecutor should be?—I think, if we had a stipendiary magistrate, there would then be some chance, if a man was brought up for personation, that he would be convicted and punished. Then, in the absence of a stipendiary magistrate, perhaps a judge of the county court would do; but I have no faith whatever in any man being brought up for any political offence before the present class of magistrates that we have in our boroughs.

2838. They have strong political feelings themselves of course?—Yes; they do not like to convict a man.

2839. Sir George Grey.] I understood you to say just now, that, in two cases of personation, the people were brought before the magistrates at the last election, and were convicted; but that the matter went off upon a case being granted to a superior court?—The magistrates convicted, and the parties were sentenced to so many days' imprisonment; but they got a case to appeal to a higher court. However that never took place, and I believe the whole thing is just resting in the same way to day that it did at the time.

2840. Was that the fault of the magistrates, or the fault of the prosecutor?—That I cannot tell you. I have often wondered who was to blame for it; but I believe the thing is so; who is to blame I do not know.

2841. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Is there any feeling at Bradford about the advisability of doing away with Parliamentary nominations?—I think anybody who has had anything to do with nominations, particularly the nominations which we have had at Bradford, would try to rid the town of such a nuisance. I would decidedly do away with nominations. At the last nomination that we had, we had only one candidate before us. The other gentleman, who was a candidate, was not present; but even Mr. Thompson, who was present, did not speak; and the gentleman who was to speak for Mr. Miall, I think, did not speak. The fact is, a perfect riot ensued, arising from some boards which men were carrying about, telling them to hold up both hands for Miall, and hold up both hands for Thompson. A skirmish took place, and the result was a perfect state of riot and stone throwing, and we had really no show of hands. And it was agreed on both sides, that is to say, I, as chairman for Mr. Thompson, and Mr. Brown, as chairman, I think, for Mr. Miall, agreed that no show of hands should take place, but that both sides should demand a poll, and that was so. There was no show of hands at the last election, and that entirely arose from the state of disorder that the people got into.

2842. Has that state of things often occurred at the Parliamentary nominations?—Yes; I think, if there is no riot, it is really impossible to make the people hear. Even if the people are pretty well behaved, there is a hum and a noise which really prevents any of the speeches being heard. I should, decidedly, do away with nominations; I see no good in them whatever.

2843. You would have the Parliamentary candidates nominated by papers sent in to the returning officer, would you?—I do not know how it is to be done; of course, if it is done, they would have to be nominated perhaps three or four days before the polling day.

2846. But did not the Judge state that he was unseated on account of the enormous expenditure that there was in drink; was not that one of the reasons?—Yes, that was one of the reasons.

2847. Was not it the fact, that there was a great extent of treating at the Parliamentary election?—I think there was a great deal of money spent before the day, that is to say, there were a number of very injudicious friends in various parts, who committed practices which were perfectly unknown either to the candidate or to his executive committee.

2848. But does the stringency of the law, or what you suppose to be the stringency of the law at the Parliamentary elections, provide an effectual check upon treating at those elections?—It did during the election that we had about a month ago, so far as the candidate with whom I was connected was concerned; I do not think there was any improper practice whatever.

2849. Was that in consequence of the exposure upon the trial of the election petition, of the extent to which treating had been carried on at the previous election?—There is no doubt that that had its influence.

2850. You have stated the remedy which you suggest with reference to the municipal, have you any remedy to suggest with reference to the Parliamentary elections?—The law is now so strict, that you have done, I think, as much as you possibly can do.

2851. Then you think that an effectual check has been placed upon the corruption at the Parliamentary elections at Bradford, by the application of the law in the trial of the election petitions two months ago?—Yes, I think you have done about as much as you can do in the matter.

2852. Mr. Leatham.] You are not in favour of the ballot?—No, I am not; I do not like it.

2853. Is there a very general feeling in favour of the ballot in Bradford?—I think there is.

2854. Was Mr. Ripley in favour of the ballot?—Yes, I think he was.

2855. Was Mr. Thompson in favour of the ballot?—Yes.

2856. Were Mr. Miall and Mr. Forster both in favour of the ballot?—Yes.

2857. And they represent, do they not, the general feeling of the place upon that point?—I may tell you that there is a very large Conservative feeling in favour of the ballot, but I do not like the ballot myself, because I think that a man's whole life is a lie under the ballot; because if he is asked the question, if he speaks the truth, then there is no object in the ballot, and if he does not speak the truth, then I think that is an evil so great, that the remedy is worse than the disease certainly.

2858. Mr. Bright.] Supposing that one of the results of the ballot was, that people did not ask those questions any more than you ask a man how he has made his will; it would be a benefit, would it not?—But men will congregate together, and will talk about subjects of that sort, and a man cannot open his mouth without indicating in some way, what his views may be upon certain matters.

2859. Upon that subject you differ, do you not, from a great many intelligent people in Bradford?—I daresay the feeling in favour of the ballot is a feeling which has grown to be a very considerable one; and, as I tell you, I know a very large number of Conservatives who are very strongly in favour of it.

Mr. Edward West, called in; and Examined.

Mr. E. West.

2860. Chairman.] You are now the Mayor of Bradford, are you not?—I am.

and armed themselves with the pieces, and with sticks and stones, and other weapons that they could get hold of, and immediately commenced a riot. First one side was driven from the field and then the other, when they obtained stones, and then, as Mr. Storey has just stated, I broke up the concourse by the friends of each gentleman demanding a poll for the next day. Great fears were entertained for the peace of the town after that, and many gentlemen and others in the town were very greatly excited, and thought we were all going to be very hardly dealt with, unless an extra force was obtained; and I had to obtain a large number of police from other towns, and from the county, and from Leeds; and I also took care to have the military in readiness in case of riot the next day.

2862. What system would you propose as a substitute for open nomination?—A system very much like what we have now in the municipal nominations, a nomination by papers, only with improvements. At present there is not sufficient time allowed between the nomination and the declaration by the mayor of the polling places, and the days are too few to allow of the preparations for the election being made, for the vote being taken.

2864. Now, there may be three candidates nominated at the hustings, but if a poll is not demanded no poll takes place, but the two are declared elected on the spot, are they not?—That would be the case provided the mayor could declare honestly which had the show of hands, I suppose; but, as you see, in the last election no show was taken; each party demanded a poll, so that we had to go to it.

2865. I want to know whether you think, under the system of nomination which you recommend, by papers being sent into the mayor, a poll must necessarily take place where more than two candidates are nominated?—I do; I think that it must necessarily take place.

2867. Chairman.] Was the riot which took place at Bradford soon over, or did it leave any bad consequences?—It was very soon over; a considerable number of people were very much hurt; pieces of iron were thrown about that were very sharp in the points, and a good many people were cut in their faces, and one man had his eye cut out; I believe that was the worst accident.

2868. Was there any rioting on the polling day?—None whatever; it was the most peaceable and well-conducted election, I think, that I ever remember.

20 April 1869.

2869. Is it the feeling of the great majority of the inhabitants of Bradford, that nominations should be discontinued?—I think it is quite so; the corporation have petitioned as a body against the nominations being conducted in the future as they have been in the past, and I believe there is a general feeling in favour of doing away with them.

2870. Were the corporation unanimous?—I think they were; I do not remember a single voice against it.

2871. Sir George Grey.] Have those disturbances always taken place at Bradford, or has it only been recently, since party feeling has run high?—More particularly in the last year or two; in 1867 there was not any great disturbance; but still the speakers could not be heard, though it was in a much smaller area, and perhaps not more than 10,000 were present.

2872. Is it the habit of the candidates to hold mixed meetings before the election at which to address the constituency?—Yes, we have a hall which will hold 4,000 people, which hall is very much used by both parties.

2873. Meetings open to any portion of the constituency?—Yes, I think they have other smaller meetings; perhaps a dozen or 20 in each ward.

2874. Do you say that those meetings are held in the town-hall?—In the large music-hall.

2875. Suppose the nominations were to take place where those meetings are held now, would there be less disturbance?—The hall could only hold 4,000 people, and we have 21,000 and odd electors; therefore the views of the candidates would really not be heard by the constituency; I may explain that by this fact, that almost every meeting that was called by the friends of one gentleman who wished to represent Bradford in that hall, was unanimous in any proposition that they passed in his favour, and yet he lost the election.

2876. The question which I asked you just now was, whether the meetings which were addressed by the candidates previous to the election were meetings called by the candidates of their own supporters, or whether they were mixed general meetings of the constituency, at which the respective candidates appeared?—And my answer was, that those meetings in this large hall were open, and both sides could come if they chose.

2877. Mr. Bright.] But the different candidates did not appear at any one meeting till the nomination?—The candidates on each side did not appear, they were public meetings, but were called by one side only.

2878. Still nobody could pretend that the opinions of all the candidates were not perfectly known to all the constituency?—They were thoroughly well known to every one; we are a Radical constituency, we are not Whigs and Tories; it is merely a division among the Liberals. The Conservative element, of course, is there to aid the one side or the other, whichever they choose to support.

2879. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Has it been ever the case at Bradford that the candidate has been nominated simply for the purpose of giving him an opportunity of making a speech?—I do not remember one that I could say was so proposed. I have known those elections now for over 20 years in Bradford, and I do not remember a case of that kind. There is always too much noise for anything of that sort; no man would go there to express his opinions in order that the public might know them; they are generally known before.

2880. Mr. William Henry Smith.] Do you admit the generous hospitality which has been spoken of so often at Bradford with regard to the municipal elections?—I am sorry to say there is a very large amount of truth in what has been said of the elections, both municipal and Parliamentary; there has always been a good deal of eating and drinking; I never was in that position myself. I had three elections as town councillor before being elected alderman, but not approving of drinking, I never paid anything for it; and I once fought an election for another gentleman, as chairman for him, and returned him considerably at the head of the poll without having spent 6*d.* in ale. Nevertheless there is a very great deal of it in the town, and always has been, at such elections; it is notorious, but there is not much money stirring in any other shape.

2881. You are aware, are you not, that there is a provision in the Act of Parliament, which can be enforced against that practice without difficulty?—I am aware of it, but I think it is almost too severe, if we may say so; it seems to go rather too far, and the consequence is, that no one likes to come forward and prosecute.

2882. In fact, public opinion will not support a man in prosecuting anybody for conduct of that description?—It will not.

2884. Mr. James.] Do you find many tradesmen abstain from voting altogether?—Yes, a considerable number.

2885. From the fear of losing custom?—Yes; many have spoken to me about it, and said they wished that there was some change, because they fear the oppression of their customers in that way.

Mr. EDWARD WEST, called in; and further Examined.

23 April 1869.

2886. Chairman.] IN continuation of the evidence which you gave to the Committee the other day, I understood you to say that if prompt measures had not been taken, very serious danger might have arisen at the last election at Bradford?—That was the opinion of the bench of magistrates in the town who sent their clerk to myself on the day of the election, wishing me to make the proceedings as short as possible at the declaration of the poll. I think I stated the other day that there had been a riot the day previously, and people were in great fear that disturbances would arise the next day. All passed off quietly, but in the afternoon there seemed to be a general impression that there would be another riot at the public declaration of the poll, and I fell in with the suggestions of the other magistrates who wished that those proceedings should be as short as possible. The consequence was that no speeches whatever were made; the simple numbers were given, and the meeting broke up as quickly as possible.

2887. You are of opinion, are you not, that the practice of open nomination and the declaration of the poll at such a place as Bradford is not only useless, but also dangerous?—That is quite my opinion. I think the declaration perhaps may be even the more dangerous of the two, because people have become excited by one party having lost and the other gained during the day, and they are in worse temper perhaps at the close of the day against each other than at the beginning.

2891. The nomination papers may now be received till midnight, may they not?—Yes, that is the practice.

23 April 1869.

in the municipal or the Parliamentary elections, in fact, before he knows whether a poll will take place or not.

2893. What interval would you suggest should elapse between the nomination and the poll?—Three days between the nomination and the election, I think, would be quite sufficient.

2894. Both in the case of the municipal elections and the Parliamentary?—Yes; I would assimilate them as much as possible.

2895. Do not you think, that so long an interval in the case of Parliamentary elections might lead to a great deal of excitement and riot, which you wish to get rid of?—I should not think so at all

2898. Is there no machinery for declaring who are the candidates?—No machinery at all for declaring who are the candidates, and no nomination whatever.

2899. Sir George Grey.] Can they come and nominate a person at any time during the day?—Yes, any time between nine and four.

2900. Chairman.] Any voter may come at any hour and vote for any man?—He may; there is so little interest taken in the election of the assessors that the aldermen generally appoint the assessors for the coming year; but the auditorship is paid for, a few guineas each time, and there are individuals who have self-interest enough to feel inclined to get a nomination; and so they have a few printed papers struck off with their names put in, and that is the only nomination that there is.

2901. Is it your opinion that corrupt practices have very extensively prevailed at Bradford, either in the municipal or the Parliamentary elections?—Only as far as eating and drinking are concerned; I believe that until the late general election there had been exceedingly little actual money stirring; in fact, I have no proof that even in the last general election there was much money paid into the hand. I see by the return of expenses made to myself that a large number of men were engaged as messengers or doorkeepers at 10 s. a day in the Parliamentary election.

2902. Are you speaking of the last election?—The election in last November when Mr. Ripley was elected; I think the last election of all was as pure an election as could possibly be; there were very few public-houses indeed engaged, whereas at the one in November there were upwards of 300 engaged by the two parties.

2903. Do you think that either in the Parliamentary or the municipal elections the voters are subject to any undue influence of any character?—Yes; I believe that has been so to a very great extent: I believe that there is more pressure put on the small tradesmen than upon the working men themselves; and I should not always except working men putting pressure upon the tradesmen; I think that even that is done to some extent.

2904. I believe the other day you stated, that although you did not think corrupt practices prevailed in the borough, you are an advocate for the ballot?—Most decidedly.

2905. Will you state on what grounds?—Because I think that then every man would vote according to his own conscience, or according to his own liking, and I think that that is the proper thing to do; there could be no pressure brought to bear upon either working men or tradesmen, to any great extent.

2906. As far as your own experience you think that the ballot is not necessary in Bradford?—I do not think that it has been necessary to any great extent with regard to the working men, but I do think that with regard to the tradesmen that it has been necessary; I am speaking more particularly of shopkeepers and retail tradespeople.

2907. Mr. Villiers.] There was an inquiry, was there not, by one of the judges at Bradford?—Yes, by Baron Martin.

2908. Was not one Member unseated?—Yes, Mr. Ripley was unseated.

2909. Upon what grounds was he unseated?—Upon the ground of corruption, and mainly, I believe, from excessive expenditure in public-houses in drinking.

2910. But there was money spent, was there not?—There was a large amount of money spent altogether; the Member's return was 7,000 l. odd; and it was generally understood and stated that there was a very large number of accounts from public-houses which were not returned in that 7,000 l. odd.

2911. Have they been paid since, do you know?—I have no means of knowing.

2912. When you said that there was so little money spent, you did not mean that to apply to that election?—I think I did not remark that there was little money spent, but that I had not known many instances of money actually passing in the shape of money from the Committee, or the Member, or his agent to the voters; but a great deal of money has been spent in eating and drinking.

2913. But is not that received as corruption at Bradford?—I do not think that that has been viewed as corruption in days gone by.

2914. It has been the usual practice, has it?—It has been the usual practice in all elections.

2915. Has it been the practice to open public-houses?—To have committee-rooms at public-houses where there was a large amount of drinking, I believe, carried on without being paid for by the voters.

2916. Do the voters go to those public-houses before before voting?—They do; for two or three weeks previous to the election they have committee-meetings, which the voters attend, and they are able to get a few glasses of ale and something to eat without paying for it.

2917. And that goes on, does it, until the day of the election?—Yes; that goes on till the day of the election, and on the day of the election also.

2918. Is it the same at the municipal election?—It is, to some extent, and sometimes to a large extent.

2919. Is that thought objectionable at Bradford by any class of persons?—It is thought very objectionable by some classes, but I believe it is not thought so by those who are willing to take food and drink; that is to say, by a certain proportion of the working class.

2920. The inhabitants of Bradford have never moved in any way to put a stop to it?—They have not, so far as I am aware.

2921. Do you know why they have not?—I cannot give the reason.

2923. Is it with a view to prevent that system of treating that you recommend the ballot?—It is to prevent everything of that kind.

2924. Do you think that the ballot would do that?—I think it would; I cannot imagine that anyone who was inclined to bribe, whether in giving money or anything else, would feel confident that he would get back what he was paying for if we had the ballot, and I think that the parties who would accept bribes would not be very likely to carry out their agreement, if they had made any, with those who bribed them.

2925. And they would not be very scrupulous in giving evidence against the briber?—Not at all; there would be a certain class that would give evidence if they were paid for it even against those who bribed them.

2926. Supposing there was the ballot, what would be the fate of the candidate who would not open the public-houses while another candidate did so?—That would depend upon a man's character very much; that has been tried before now at the municipal elections, and the gentlemen who have forbidden or opposed the opening of public-houses have been carried at the head of the poll.

2927. But it is not a necessary condition on the part of every candidate?—No, not on the part of every candidate, but on the part of a few; it depends so much upon the character of the man.

2928. Are people more struck with the impropriety of the system of treating now than they have ever been before among those classes that do object to it?—I think with some little exception amongst the very low, illiterate and uneducated class they are; they are beginning to see that it ought not to be, but there is still a very low class of voters who are prepared to take anything that they can get, and will be until there is more general education amongst the people.

2929. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] You spoke of intimidation by the working man; is that practised by the mill hands upon the small tradesmen in the neighbourhood of the mills?—By some of the working class; but what you would understand as mill hands are comparatively few, as our mill hands are generally women, and the men are over-lookers, mechanics, and so on.

2930. Is it not the case that not only the workers who are voters themselves, but the families of those workers, take some part in that intimidation?—I have no doubt they do.

2931. Have you ever known any instance of regular papers being circulated, signed by mill hands, threatening exclusive dealing upon small tradesmen?—I have never seen anything of that sort either from working men or anyone else.

2932. I think you stated that you would not like the expenses of an election to be thrown upon the borough and taken off the candidates?—No; I do not see any reason for the change; it seems to me that the present system has worked very well so far in that respect.

2933. Are you speaking now of the Parliamentary elections?—Yes.

2934. Would you extend that, in fact, to the municipal elections?—I do not object to it at the municipal elections, so far as the necessary expenses are concerned; that is to say, the returning officer's expenses.

2936. What would be the really legal expenses of a candidate at such an election?—I think that the entire expenses, that is to say, the returning officer's expenses, at the last election in November for municipal matters were only about 60 l. or 70 l. for the whole borough.

2937. How many wards are there in Bradford?—Eight wards.

2938 Mr. Hunt.] Do I understand you to say that the opening of public-houses at the elections is very popular amongst the lower class of voters in Bradford?—Yes; as committee-rooms, and so on, previous to the election, and at the election it has been so.

2939. Were those public-houses really used as committee-rooms, or as a mere pretext for having a place for giving voters food and drink?—For both. There is no doubt that some of them are committee-rooms and are used as committee-rooms, but others are taken merely as a pretext.

2940. In those places where they are really used for the business of the committee is drink given away as well as at the other places?—Yes, that has generally been adopted, but not to the same extent. Of course there would not be much business done if there was much drinking.

2942. Is it not the case that at the inns where the chief business of the committee is performed very little drink is given away?—I should think that there is not much drink given away there; at any rate, not in the rooms where the committee sit.

23 April 1869.

2943. But are there not a lot of lower class public-houses, nominally used as committee-rooms, where drink is given away to a great extent?—Yes, beer-houses, in fact.

2944. And where really no committee business is conducted?—Next to none.

2945. And where there would be none done at all except it was done to give a colour to the hiring of the rooms?—That is very true; it is merely an inducement for voting.

2946. This treating you say is acceptable to the lower class of voters?—To a portion of them.

2947. Supposing that the ballot were established, do you think that the candidate might not ingratiate himself with that class of voters by giving drink all the same?—He might to some extent, but I do not think that he would be secure of his voters.

2948. But he would be secure of this, would he not, that if the voting were kept secret, it could not be proved that the man who had the drink voted for the man who gave it?—It could not be proved how he had voted.

2949. Therefore so far he would be able to treat with impunity?—Yes.

2950. Do you not think that you might have an immense deal of corruption in consequence of that impunity?—No; I do not think we should have more than we have now, certainly. I cannot see that we could have.

2951. Do you think that you would have less as regards treating?—I think we should.

2952. Do you think that if we had the ballot the voters would keep secret how they voted?—I think they would, to a large extent. Many men, of course, do not care much about the ballot, and they would tell anyone how they voted if they were asked, whereas others would not do anything of the kind, and they would be very glad of the shield.

2953. Most voters take a pride in their politics, and avow them openly to their friends and neighbours, do they not?—There is a large number of voters that do, no doubt.

2954. And those who do not are, for the most part, persons who are open to influences?—Yes, I should say so.

2955. Do you think that it would not be possible for there to be any direct money payments if we had the ballot?—I think it is scarcely likely that there would be. Judging from what I see of human nature, I think that a man would like to see something for his money, and he could not tell whether he had got it or not if we had the ballot.

2956. Supposing there was an understanding that he should only pay the money if he were returned, and nothing if he were not, might not he then be willing to pay the money for the seat gained?—I think myself it would be a dangerous game.

2957. But is there not a danger now that the man pays his money and does not know whether he will get his seat?—To some extent, but he would not, under the ballot, know what parties voted for him; and, even if he got the seat, he might pay those who did not vote for him.

2958. Candidates or their agents very often spend a large sum of money in bribery, not knowing whether the seat may be gained?—Yes.

2959. And where they have spent a larger sum of money, and do not get the seat, they are naturally annoyed?—Yes; if I was a candidate I should not be inclined to pay much, simply because the man might take it and might not vote for me afterwards.

2960. But supposing there was an understanding between the candidate and a class of voters that he would pay a certain sum of money if he were returned, and that he would pay no money except he got the seat, might not that very well happen?—That might be done, certainly. I think it scarcely would be done to any extent.

2961. The bargain now is with the individual voters for his vote?—Yes.

2962. And the bargain then might be with a class of voters to be paid in case he gained the seat?—He would have to pay a very extraordinary amount to make that a certain bargain, as it seems to me.

2963. But still that might be done?—Yes; it might be done, no doubt.

2964. Do you think there is a better public opinion growing up against undue influences of every kind?—I think there is; I quite hope that there is in our town.

2965. Both as against the influence which is used by customers on shopkeepers, by masters on workmen, and landlords on tenants, as well as against other corruption?—People really go to such an extent in their view of what they think is right about influence, that I do not know about that part of it; I have an impression that people think they have a right to a very large extent to influence those who are connected with them, in the shape of tradesmen or anybody of that kind, but with regard to public-house treating and money payment I think there is a better opinion growing up.

2966. You remember, I presume, the elections for a great many years?—Yes; I do.

2967. Was not it the case many years ago that the landlords used their influence with their tenants without any remark whatever?—Not to any very great extent, I should think, between landlords and tenants; I should not expect that it was so.

2968. As regards customers is not that the case?—I should think that that has been so for a long time.

2969. But it used not to excite the remark that it does now, did it?—No, because the number of voters are so much increased; the thing has grown very much; the franchise was formerly restricted to a comparatively small number of persons.

2970. Is it not the case that where customers endeavour to exercise that class of influence remonstrances are made and notice is taken of it in the public press?—Not to any great extent, because that might cause as much harm as even withdrawing the custom.

2971. But is it not the case that there is disapprobation expressed amongst the more intelligent people against such practices?—When they know of them there certainly is.

2972. And more so than there used to be?—More so than there used to be, no doubt.

2973. So that there is gradually growing up a better state of public opinion upon the subject?—I quite hope so.

2974. Do not you think that as education spreads, and these matters are more discussed than they have been, public opinion will advance still still more in that direction?—I quite hope it will; but the feeling that I spoke of, as being the one that has done most mischief, is not amongst the uneducated people, except just the work-people.

2975. The adoption of the ballot is an attempt, not to get rid of the thing by improving the state of public opinion, but simply by machinery, is it not?—I hope that public opinion may be improved as a whole by education, and the ballot will screen people from any sort of pressure from without; that is my opinion.

2976. Do not you think that it would be a better course to endeavour to get rid of those practices, by improving the state of public opinion, rather than by adopting machinery?—I should like to try both; I think that care would have to be taken in the giving of the vote by those people who are uneducated and cannot either read or write; some machinery would have to be adopted by having a person who was sworn to secrecy, who could do some part of the work for them in case anything like the Australian method were adopted.

2977. That is to say, in the present state of education and intelligence, the ballot would not be practicable with a certain class of voters?—It would if there was some one who could do a certain portion of the work for them, some one individual sworn to secrecy. I believe that that is the way it is done in Australia, but that would have to be adopted with great care here.

2978. If you had an individual sworn to secrecy, he would be able to exercise some influence, would he not?—No, I think not.

2980. But you would have a sworn officer, who should point out to him which are the names?—Yes; who should cross out those for whom he does not vote.

2981. If he could not read that officer might cross out the names which the voter did not wish, might he not?—He might, but it would require such officer to be a highly respectable man, and we have such in every town.

2982. But the matter being secret as between the voter and the officer, suppose the officer were to exercise his office improperly, there would be no means of detecting it?—There would not.

2983. But that only refers to that particular mode of voting; you might have other modes, might you not?—Yes, you might have other modes; I have not considered the question fully.

2984. Might there not be the method of voting by different coloured balls, which would make it intelligible to this lowest class?—Yes.

2985. And anyone who was not colour-blind might avail himself of that?—He could be told then who the colours were for, and some one might put the colour that he wished to vote for into his hand.

2986. Mr. Cross.] With regard to fictitious or vexatious nominations, under the last Municipal Election Act, is that a common practice in your town?—At the municipal elections it is a very common practice.

2987. Do you mean that the number of persons who are nominated for each office is much greater now than it used to be?—No, those vexatious nominations have been practised for many years.

2988. Do you mean that the Act of Parliament, the 22nd Victoria, has increased the number of fictitious or vexatious nominations?—I should hardly say so; the Act has been in force ever since I have had anything to do with the municipal elections, and I do not remember the elections under the old Act.

2989. Probably you are aware that before that Act passed, the councillors were all elected in the same way as the assessors are now?—I think that the present mode of nomination must be a great improvement upon the old one, but I was not aware of that fact.

2991. The nominations must be two whole days, must they not, before the day of the election?—Yes; that is the case as to municipal elections.

2992. Do not you think that two whole days are sufficient?—I do not think they are under the present circumstances.

2993. Do not you think that if there was a longer time there would be very likely greater excitement and disturbance in the town?—No, I do not think so. It would not be so with us.

2994. With regard to the elections, either municipal or Parliamentary, how many wards is your town divided into?—Eight.

2996. Do you think that in some of the wards there is much more bribery, treating, and intimidation than there is in others?—There is no doubt, that is so where a large number of uneducated voters reside. I might say that we have 21,000 voters for both the municipal and the borough elections, and I think there is only a difference of 300; we have upwards of 3,000 Irish voters, and a large number of those are labouring men, earning under 1 l. a week, and some of them, of course, very little

2998. I presume those men would hardly be induced to vote at all at present, unless they were were treated and got what they wanted?—Yes, I believe they would; I think we had proof of that at the last election, at which they almost all voted, and that was as pure an election as could possibly take place. Scarcely a public-house was opened; it was as pure as you could ever expect to have either in our town or any other.

23 April 1869.

2999. Does not that show that if those people had a better education there would probably be less bribery, intimidation, and corruption in the town?—Most decidedly.

3000. And that so long as there are a class of men wanting education, so long will there be a temptation to treat?—Yes.

3001. How would the ballot prevent that?—It would prevent it simply because the candidates would not know that they got a quid pro quo.

3002. But in point of fact there being this state of mind existing, there are people who will be bribed if it is possible for them to get a bribe?—Then it falls back upon whether there is a gentleman who would be found to bribe: as long as gentlemen are found to bribe, and the people are uneducated and ignorant, the probability is that they will take a bribe in one shape or another; but I think gentlemen would become scarce who would be inclined to pay the money for the votes.

3003. Then is there a growing opinion against bribery and corruption in your town?—Yes; I think that the last election has to some extent proved that.

3004. How do you reconcile that with what you said just now, that public opinion in your town would not support prosecutions for bribery or corruption?—No one likes to be a party to prosecute on any political grounds; persons would not like to take it up as it would be considered like personal prosecution.

3005. Have there been any prosecutions in your town under the 22nd of Vict., the Municipal Act?—Yes, before the magistrates; I think last November twelve months, we had two persons brought up before the magistrates, and prosecuted and sentenced to two months' imprisonment or something of that kind, that was for personation.

3006. But not for bribery?—No; we have never had any cases of prosecution for bribery.

3007. You have had no actions in the county court for bribery?—Not one; I think they have at Leeds, but only to a small extent.

3010. Does the want of a greater number of polling places lead to much practical inconvenience?—A great deal; we have great crushing and crowding, and sometimes people cannot vote at all, and they go away disgusted; if that could be remedied it would be a great improvement.

3011. Mr. Whitbread.] You have been returning officer at a Parliamentary election, have you not?—Yes, at three.

3012. Then you are conversant with the regulation which requires a candidate to appoint an agent for election expenses?—Yes.

3013. Do you believe that the expense returned by the election agents have comprised the whole of the costs which the candidate has been put to for his election, or do you think that he has paid other amounts?—I have every reason to suppose that they have not shown the whole; and my reason for saying so is, that it came out in the late trial that such was the case; that there were bills for public-houses amounting to 1,200 l. which were not shown in the returns made to the mayor, and in fact, the returns were not made properly either; they were left until the trial; in fact, they were only produced on the trial.

3014. Is there any punishment following upon an agent for election expenses who does not return either a correct account, or an account within a given time specified by the Act?—As far as I understand the law, there is a fine of 5 l. per day, and I believe that is the only punishment, unless a prosecution ensues upon the recommendation of the judge who has tried the case; I am not aware of any other penalty.

3015. What is the consequence to a candidate supposing he does not return a correct and full statement of his election expenses?—For not returning at all there is a fine of 5 l. a day upon him, but a 5 l. penalty is not worth speaking of when a gentleman wishes to keep back large amounts.

3016. Do you think it would be possible to check that system of making fraudulent returns, for instance by appointing a taxing officer for those Parliamentary expenses, or by voiding the seat in case it were proved that a candidate had paid money for or on account of the election which he had not included in his return?—I think the latter might be very useful as a check. I do not myself see how a taxing master would arrive at accounts which were not sent in except he sat as a judge taking evidence in the town from those who chose to come forward and say that they had given in accounts which were not returned.

3017. I gathered from an answer of yours before that, in your opinion, which is very commonly shared, the reason why the present law is so inoperative is that people are not found willing to put it in motion?—That is so as far as the municipal elections go.

3018. Perhaps if we had some officer who should review all the election expenses, we might get nearer to a public prosecution?—I think probably we should, if he could be made into a public prosecutor, or something of that kind.

3019. Do you see any injustice in voiding the seat seat of a candidate who has not made a full disclosure of his Parliamentary expenses?—I do not; I think we shall have to look to the gentlemen who are candidates at elections stopping bribery and corruption amongst the uneducated working classes.

3020. It would not be a very difficult matter probably, from your own experience, to show that candidates have, upon more than one occasion, spent largely beyond what they have returned?—That would be my impression; I have seen accounts published in the newspapers when the mayor has published them, but I have often thought that there must have been a good deal kept back, but of course it was only a surmise.

3021. The O'Conor Don.] Do you think that in every case it would be in the power of a candidate or his agent to send in those accounts within a given time?—Yes, I think so; I think they must know where the accounts are, and they have only to request people to send in their accounts, and inform them that, failing to do so within a month, they would not be paid, and the accounts would come in.

3022. Are there not very many legitimate bills that are not sent in until after the given time?—I should have thought that that would not be so unless they had a limit to that effect.

3023. I am not speaking now of illegitimate expense, but of perfectly legitimate expense; do you know that some bills never are sent in till after the given time?—I cannot see any reason why they should not be sent in within the prescribed time.

3024. Mr. Leatham.] You were asked whether it would not be impossible for a man who cannot read, to vote by a ticket ballot?—I think he would require to have some one to help him in case there were more than the required number of names on the ticket.

3025. You are aware, probably, that this difficulty has been overcome by printing the names of the candidates in different colours?—I was not aware of that.

3027. Are you not aware that the tickets are numbered?—No, I was not aware of that. I thought that anything in the way of numbering might perhaps lead to finding out who the voter was.

3028. That is the object of numbering them, but the persons who examine the tickets after the ballot are sworn to secrecy; would you approve of that plan?—I should rather object to that.

3029. Mr. Brand.] Do you think that it would be desirable to close the public-houses and beershops on the day of the election?—Most decidedly the whole day, except for those who could prove themselves bonâ fide travellers. There must be some little exception for such cases, but it would be a great benefit if they could be closed entirely upon that day.

3030. And also on the day of the declaration of the poll?—Yes, if we are to have a public declaration.

3031. Would you leave the matter to the decision of the local authorities whether they should be closed or not?—As far as my own feelings go I would rather that there was a Statute to that effect; that Parliament should say that they should be closed on that day.

3032. Sir George Grey.] You spoke just now of the penalties imposed by the law upon a candidate or agent who does not make a true return of his expenses within the meaning of the Act; are you aware that the penalty of 5 l. a day attaches only in a case in which there is an absolute default in making the return; but if he makes a false return, he then is liable to the penalties for a misdemeanour, namely, fine and imprisonment?—As far as I know the law, it is confined to those who do not make a return at all.

3033. Does not section 4 of the 26 & 27 Vict. c. 29, provide that, "Any agent or candidate who makes default in delivering to the returning officer the statement required by this section shall incur a penalty not exceeding 5 l. for every day during which he so makes default; and any agent or candidate who wilfully furnishes to the said returning officer an untrue statement shall be guilty of misdemeanour, or in Scotland of an offence punishable by fine and imprisonment"?—Yes, I believe that is so.

3034. Is not the period allowed for making that return two months?—Yes, two months.

3035. You think that quite long enough?—Yes, I think it quite sufficient.

3036. When you speak of nominations, have you had experience of nominations for counties?—We had a nomination at Bradford for the county; Lord Frederick Cavendish and Sir Francis Crossley were the members.

3037. Is it your recommendation that open nominations should be abolished in county as well as borough elections?—Yes, it is.

3038. Would you apply the same rule absolutely to county elections as to borough, namely, that the name should be sent in to the sheriff or the returning officer the day before the day fixed for the election?—More than a day before; in sufficient time to allow arrangements to be made; that would be my suggestion.

3039. Would you extend the period now between the issue of the writ and the day of the election, or do you think that that is long enough?—I do not think there is much to complain of in that, but it is between the nomination and the election that the time is short.

3041. If there was an interval of three days, which you recommend, between the day fixed for the election and the polling day, would not that add very much to the expense which candidates would have to pay for agents for those three days and

and in keeping up all those expenses incidental to a contested election?—No, I think not; I think that probably the expense might be lessened in some respects, because the mayor must go to a considerable expense in providing booths and clerks and every appurtenance, whether there is a poll or not, at the present time, and that would be saved.

3042. Instead of having the polling day the next following the nomination, which is now prescribed by law, if three days were required to intervene between the day fixed for the nomination and the polling, would not that subject candidates to a great increase of expense?—I do not see that it would to any very large extent.

3043. Do not they pay their agents by the day?—I cannot say how they pay their agents; I only know that some agents do not seem to get paid at all; they give their time voluntarily, and that was the case in Bradford at the last November election.

3044. You were not aware of alteration in the law or consequently of the reasons which led to that alteration?—I was not aware of that.

3045. Do you think that the increase which has taken place in the constituency by the last Reform Act has increased or diminished the necessity for the ballot?—I think it has increased it very much, because of a much larger number of people who may be influenced having become voters.

3046. I understood you to say that the class of voters in Bradford who are subject to influence are small tradesmen and not the working people; were not those small tradesmen on the register before?—Yes, they were to a large extent; when I said in my answer that it had increased the number of people who may be influenced, I did not mean that our working people had been influenced up to this time to a very large extent by their employers; in fact I should think to a very small extent.

3047. When you speak of the 3,000 Irish voters, are they day labourers chiefly?—Yes, to a large extent.

3048. What wages do they get?—I should think many of them earn 18 s. a week, and not many of them more than 1 l.

3049. Are there the same number of Irish voters upon the municipal register as upon the Parliamentary, or does the change of residence amongst the lowest class of voters prevent that?—I believe there is not a great deal of difference in the number of Irish voters on the one or the other.

3050. Is there not much change of residence amongst that class of voters at Bradford?—No, not a great change.

3051. Mr. Hunt.] Have you considered at all the question of having no nomination with regard to county elections?—I think the same objection applies to counties, as far as I have seen, as to boroughs, though not quite to the same extent.

3052. Did I rightly understand from evidence which you gave on the last occasion, that you thought there must be a poll under all circumstances if there was no nomination and show of hands?—No, only in case where there were more nominated than required; then there must be a poll, if there are any more nominated.

3054. Have you considered the effect of that upon the county elections?—Not particularly upon counties; I do not myself see why it should make much difference.

3055. You have not considered the effect of the inconvenience to persons coming great distances to vote, whereas if the election took place under the present conditions they might not have to come at all?—No; I have not considered that because I think the probability is that there would be no vexatious nomination, at least scarcely ever a vexatious nomination, provided that the party nominating had to bear a part of the necessary expenses; I think that would check it.

Mr. Frank Johnston, called in; and Examined.

Mr. F. Johnston.

3056. Chairman.] You live at Blackburn, do you not?—Yes.

3057. Will you tell the Committee what your occupation is?—I am a Cotton Manufacturer.

3058. Have you for some time taken a part in the municipal and the Parliamentary elections of that borough?—Yes; for 15 or 16 years.

3059. In what year was the borough incorporated?—In 1851.

3060. Can you tell the Committee, what is the number of wards?—There are six wards in the borough.

3061. In your opinion, what is the general character of the municipal elections?—At a contested municipal election in Blackburn, I think 90 at least out of every 100 who vote, have very substantial reason for voting.

3062. Does that apply to every ward?—Yes.

3063. Equally to every ward?—Equally to every ward.

3064. What reason have you to suppose that corruption is so universal?—I contested a ward myself, in 1861 or 1862, and the present mayor of Blackburn was my colleague in that election, and it cost us then a very considerable sum.

3065. Is the bribery done quite openly?—Quite openly; I have myself seen men paid for their votes in the booth in the presence of the presiding alderman.

3066. Is that done, according to your belief, by both parties?—By both parties.

3067. Has any attempt ever been made to contest a ward without resorting to this practice?—Yes.

3068. What has been the result?—In the ward in which I am a voter several elections have been conducted without resorting to bribery or personation, and the result has always been that those who contested an election on pure principles have failed.

3069. Has the pure system been tried in any ward besides your own?—My experience of it does not extend to any other wards than the one in which I am a voter myself.

3070. You stated, did you not, that you yourself represented a ward?—I did for three years, and then retired.

3071. And you found it necessary to resort to the same practices as your opponent?—Yes.

3072. Can you state what sum a contested municipal municipal election costs at Blackburn?—I believe it cost us about 300*l.* between us.

3073. Does treating go on to a great extent as well as bribery?—Yes, both treating and bribery. The principal vice at the municipal elections in the earlier years of the incorporation of the borough was personation, but that has not been resorted to the same extent latterly.

3074. Have any proceedings ever been taken to stop it?—Occasionally; I think in 1860 proceedings were taken against one man for personation, and he was in prison for a month; and at the last municipal elections in November 1868, four men, I think, were imprisoned for a month also for personating.

3075. Do you think it is the fear of the law which has stopped personation, or is there any other cause?—I rather attribute it to efficient detection.

3076. Has any attempt ever been made to put a stop to bribery at Blackburn?—None.

3077. How do you account for that?—Both parties are equally to blame, and I suppose they object to commence legal proceedings the one against the other.

3078. The same provisions of the law do not apply to the punishment of personation and bribery, do they?—No.

3079. How were those men to whom you have referred, convicted of personation; before what court?—Before the magistrates.

3080. You cannot prosecute a person for bribery before the magistrates, can you?—I think not, but I am not quite sure of the law upon the subject.

3081. Do you think that the law would be put in force if it were more easy; if you could prosecute a person for either giving or receiving a bribe before the magistrates, do you think there would be any disposition in Blackburn to attempt to put the law in force?—I think it would have to be an independent prosecutor, and a prosecutor independent of either political party.

3082. You think that neither party would like to incur the odium of instituting a prosecution?—I think they would not.

3083. Has any violence ever prevailed at the municipal elections?—More or less, at a great many.

3084. Of what nature?—The assembling of men around the polling booths to obstruct hostile voters.

3085. Has that gone on to any great extent?—At several elections to a very great extent; in November last it went on very largely, indeed.

3086. Has that system of the obstruction of voters of the opposite party been regularly organised?—I fear so.

3087. Has that been managed by the leaders of the party?—I think that generally speaking the organisation proceeds from the employers of labour.

3088. Can you tell the Committee how it is done; have you seen men brought up for this purpose?—Yes; headed by their employers.

3089. Have you seen hands brought up by the employer for the purpose of obstructing persons on the opposite side from voting?—It was noticeable in 1863, at the municipal contest that was in Park Ward, in Blackburn.

3090. Is intimidation resorted to at the municipal elections also?—Very largely, indeed.

3091. Of what kind is that?—The fear of losing their situation is held out before the men.

3092. Is there any ground for those fears?—A great number have been discharged.

3093. Are you aware that men have actually been discharged from work on account of their vote?—I know that many have; the day after the municipal election, in November 1868, a very considerable number, indeed, of workmen were discharged; employment was very scarce then, and those men were relieved by a fund during their temporary cessation from labour.

3094. Were those cases in which the men were discharged from work by their employers?—Yes.

3095. Does the intimidation of workmen by each other go on also, and was not that proved at the recent inquiry?—Yes; but I think it was also proved that the workmen who did so intimidate their fellow-workmen were instigated by others, that it did not proceed from themselves.

3096. You mean that in the first instance the workmen were intimidated by their employers, and that they then afterwards intimidated their fellow-workmen?—No; some are intimidated directly by their employers; of course the workshops in Blackburn partake very largely, indeed, of politics; and the owner or master, supposing the Liberals to be in a minority at a Tory workshop, the Tory employer would have no hesitation at all in making the situations of the Liberals very uncomfortable; and it is my opinion that the employers could check that, but they do not.

3097. Do they encourage it?—I fear they do.

3098. I think you said that those practices go on to a considerable extent on both sides?—Bribery does largely prevail at the municipal elections on both sides. I do not think that intimidation has been proved at all against Liberal employers in Blackburn, although I have no doubt that the feeling which I have alluded to is so general that a man should vote pretty much as his employer votes extends also to Tory workmen who work for Liberal employers.

3099. When you say proved, do you mean that that has been legally proved against the other party?—Yes, it was on the ground of intimidation that the late Parliamentary Members for Blackburn were unseated.

3100. Was not it mainly on the ground of intimidation practised by the workmen on each other?—No; the strongest cases, the cases that I believe really unseated the Members, were cases of men who were discharged by their employers.

3101. In your opinion are those practices on the increase or on the decrease?—I do not think we have ever seen them exhibited to the same extent as in November last.

3102. Then you think they are increasing?—I think so.

3103. Is any disgrace supposed to attach in Blackburn, either to the practice of intimidation or of bribery?—I am afraid not for bribery; I think that greater disgrace is supposed to attach to men for being beaten than for bribing.

3104. It is perfectly recognised, is it, on both sides, that bribery is a necessary accompaniment of the municipal elections?—It is; intimidation there is a little feeling against, I think; a man does lose a little caste, I think, who is known and pretty clearly proved to have resorted to intimidation.

3105. Were there not remarkable features about

23 April 1869.

about the last municipal election?—There was very excessive rioting.

3106. More than usual?—Very much more.

3107. Do you attribute the unusual excitement at the last municipal election to any special causes?—Yes; there were one or two reasons for it, I think; and I think that one of the reasons was this, that it was considered by all that the municipal elections of that month would have a very important bearing upon the Parliamentary election which followed in a fortnight.

3108. Were any turned out for voting at the last municipal election?—Yes.

3109. Do you know that of your own knowledge?—Yes.

3110. Were any steps taken for their support?—Yes.

3111. Was a fund raised by the Liberal party?—£. 300 or 400 l. was raised, 150 l. of which, I believe, or a little more, was raised by the working-men themselves for the support of their fellow workmen.

3112. When you state that it was generally understood that the last municipal election would have a considerable bearing upon the Parliamentary, do you think that that is generally the case?—All the municipal elections in Blackburn are political elections, and I should say that the voters who vote for one party at the municipal election vote for the same party at the Parliamentary election.

3113. Was not there a document issued a short time before the election which goes by the name of the Screw Circular?—Yes.

3114. Have you got a copy of it?—Yes; it is in this form: "Blackburn, October 12th, 1868. Dear sir,—At a very influential meeting of the Conservative party, held at the Registration Rooms, Clayton-street, on the 8th instant, for the purpose of making arrangements for securing the return of Messrs. William Henry Hornby and Joseph Feilden as the representatives of the Parliamentary borough at the ensuing election, the gravity and importance of the crisis in our national history at which the election occurs was very prominently referred to, and it was decided that all millowners and their managers and overlookers, and all master tradesmen and others possessing influence, should be strongly urged to exert that influence so as to secure, in the municipal elections as well as in the Parliamentary, the success of the candidates who adhere to the constitution in Church and State, the constitution under which the people of this country enjoy freedom and security to a greater extent than is enjoyed by any other nation under the sun, and who are opposed to the levelling principles, demoralising in tendency, which would make Christian England a godless nation, undermine the stability of the Throne and the security of property, and hasten on an era of anarchy and misrule. Believing that you know and appreciate the blessings, temporal and religious, secured to this country by the constitution, which is at the present time so violently threatened by unscrupulous politicians, we venture to urge upon you most strongly the necessity of vigorous personal effort, to secure the return as town councillors of gentlemen who hold, with respect to national politics, constitutional principles, and the return to Parliament of our two known and tried representatives, Messrs. W. H. Hornby and Joseph Feilden, signed on behalf of the meeting, William Harrison (chairman), James Thompson, William Henry Hornby, junior, R. H. Hutchinson, William Coddington."

3115. By what body was that issued?—By the Registration Association of the Conservative party.

3116. To whom was it addressed?—It was issued to the parties who are referred to here; to millowners, managers of mills, overlookers at mills, and tradesmen in the town.

3117. Were a large number of those circulars distributed?—The Conservative party admitted before the judge who tried the election petition in Blackburn, that a very large number were circulated.

3118. Did the issue of those circulars produce a great effect in Blackburn?—Very great effect, indeed.

3119. Did it cause considerable excitement?—Yes, there was a public meeting held of workmen immediately after the issue of that circular, and it was then that the nucleus of the fund to which I have alluded was formed.

3120. Was it generally understood that the influence which the millowners and their manager were urged to exercise was undue influence of the kind which you have described?—Undue influence was very largely used, and no proof was given before the judge that anyone was punished for using it.

3121. But might not this influence which the millowners and their managers were urged to exert have been intended to mean moral influence?—It might so mean.

3122. But it was not generally understood to mean that?—Certainly not.

3123. In your opinion that circular proves at least, does it not, that there was a very intimate connection between the last municipal election and the Parliamentary election?—Yes, certainly; and two of those gentlemen who signed this circular were candidates at the municipal election, Mr. William Henry Hornby, jun., and Mr. William Coddington.

3125. Was the Parliamentary election in November marked by any unusually corrupt practices?—I think not, with the exception of intimidation.

3126. There was a petition, was there not?—Yes.

3127. And the Members were unseated?—Yes.

3128. Do you think that those proceedings have exercised any salutary influence?—I am afraid not; I think that there was intimidation resorted to at the last election; that is to say, the election in March.

3129. Do you think that about the whole of the corruption which prevailed in Blackburn was disclosed before the judge?—I am sure not.

3130. Do you think that a worse case might have been made out than was made?—I think that that if there had been a full and searching inquiry, certainly the borough would have been in great danger of being disfranchised.

3131. Why do you think that the whole case was not produced before the judge?—The friends and agents of the Conservative Members were not likely to produce such evidence, and the conduct of the case as against the Members was left to the counsel for the petitioners, and they, I suppose, contented themselves with unseating the Members, which was what they were retained to do.

3132. You think the petitioners only wished to establish a sufficiently strong case for unseating the sitting Members?—I think so.

3133. They did not desire to lay before the judge a full picture of the political condition of Blackburn?—I do not know that the petitioners did not desire to do so, but it was not done.

3135. Were the prices paid for votes at the municipal election, last November, higher than usual?—Yes; report fixes them as from 5 s. to several pounds

3136. Did anything remarkable occur at the last Parliamentary election, the one since the petition?—Nothing very noticeable, but a num- of voters who voted for the Liberal candidates at the November Parliamentary election did not vote for them at the March election in 1869, and some voted against them.

3137. Have you formed any opinion as to the reason?—I think it was the fear of losing their situations, for employment was exceeding precarious in Blackburn then, and is so still.

3138. Was not it a very unpopular proceeding on the part of the Liberals to present the petition?—It should not have been with the Liberals, and I do not think it was.

3139. You do not think that it could have been on account of any odium that was incurred by the petition that a considerable number of voters changed their politics?—We have been at the trouble of getting at the reasons of a good many, and that is not the reason that they give.

3140. Is the reason which the men give the one which you have stated?—Yes; I have the particulars of 40 or 50 cases with me.

3141. Did any voters lose their employment on account of their votes at the last election?—I think not; I have not heard of any.

3142. You think that on this occasion the threat was sufficient?—I think so.

3143. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] What were the majorities at those elections?—In November the majority was about 500; 4,980 polled for Mr. Hardy, 4,887 for his colleague, 4,387 for Mr. Potter, and 4,184 for Mr. Montague Feilden. I have not the numbers for March.

3144. The majority was increased in March, was it not?—Yes, it was increased in March by several hundred votes.

3145. The municipal elections are conducted entirely upon political grounds, are they not?—Yes, entirely.

3146. And you say that, whenever there is a contest, it is not the least use standing unless you are prepared to pay?—You have not a very good chance of getting in.

3147. Mr. Hunt.] Did I understand you that you believe that 90 per cent. of the Parliamentary voters in Blackburn are bribable?—No; bribery on a large scale has never been resorted to at the Parliamentary elections since the franchise was lowered.

3148. I asked you whether you thought that 90 per cent. of the Parliamentary electors were bribable, and would take money for their votes if they could get it?—I believe they would, because they are the same class as vote at the municipal elections.

3149. Have you any notion how many of the voters who voted at the Parliamentary election, in November 1868, took money for their votes?—Only a very small number, I think, got the chance.

3150. But you think that those who had a chance availed themselves of the chance?—Yes; but they were very few in number; I do not think there were half-a-score altogether.

3151. At the municipal election which immediately preceded it, were any electors bought on that occasion?—Yes, I think so.

3152. On both sides?—Yes.

3153. And do you think that the bribes given at the municipal elections inured to secure those votes for the Parliamentary?—Yes.

3154. With regard to the screw circular, I suppose each party in the borough put their own interpretation upon the word influence?—Yes.

3155. There was a good deal of capital made out of it, was there not, on the Liberal side?—I do not know that very much was.

3156. Had you a great meeting about it?—There was great indignation about it.

3157. I suppose that the circular was denounced in indignant language?—Yes, certainly.

3158. Did those who were responsible for putting forth the circular deny that they intended undue influence by the expressions used in it?—I am not aware that they did.

3159. When all this indignant language was used, did not the Conservative party say that the influence that they asked the persons to use was only legitimate influence?—I am not aware, and if it was done considerable publicity could not be given to it, or I should have known it; I know that when the election petition was tried they did then say that only legitimate influence was intended.

3160. I suppose this circular rather assisted the Liberal party in their efforts at that election, did it not?—I do not know, I do not think it did.

3161. Did not the circular elicit strong public opinion against the exercise of undue influence?—Yes, but on the other hand the influences of the circular were brought to bear upon a great many Liberal electors; they felt the pressure of that circular.

3162. Was not there a strong expression of public opinion against the exercise of undue influence evoked by the circular?—Yes, there was.

3163. Mr. Bright.] Was that expression of opinion confined to the Liberal party, or did the Conservative party take any public means of condemning that circular?—No; the public meetings that were held, and the public indignation that was expressed, emanated from the Liberals entirely.

3164. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Blackburn was one of those boroughs which first got a Member

23 April 1869.

after the Reform Act of 1832, was it not?—Yes.

3165. And the Municipal Act followed very shortly afterwards, did it not?—That was 19 years afterwards; it was not incorporated till 1851.

3166. How were the Parliamentary elections at first conducted; were they distinguished by the same sort of feeling?—I had no experience in Parliamentary elections earlier than 1853.

3167. I think you said that you retired from the town council?—Yes.

3168. And you were only in it for three years?—Only three years.

3169. During the whole of those three years that you were a member of the town council do you ever recollect any attempt being made by the members of the town council to put a stop to what you say is the universal system in your town?—No, I do not.

3170. Do you remember the attention of the town council being called by your town clerk, or legal adviser, to the remedies that they had against that system?—I do not.

3171. You have submitted to this state of things, which you say has existed ever since you have known it, 90 out of every 100 voters being bribed, and you never took any steps to prevent it?—No public steps have been taken. This does not occur at every election, because every municipal election is not contested.

3172. What is the average number of contests?—For several years there were very few contests.

3173. Were you not aware that in every Municipal Act there are remedies given against any bribery or treating?—I believe there are.

3174. Was not that ever brought before you?—No.

3175. I take you as stating that not the slightest remonstrance was made by the inhabitants of Blackburn against this system which you come here to speak to, 90 out of every 100 being what you call tainted by bribery or treating?—None.

3176. Mr. Cross.] Do you find in the municipal elections that there are a great number of people nominated for each ward?—There are a few unnecessary nominations made, but in Blackburn they have usually been of such a very trivial character that they have occasioned very little trouble.

3177. You have had no fault to find with that provision of the Act of Parliament?—No.

3178. Mr. James.] What is the constituency of Blackburn?—There are about 9,700 Parliamentary voters.

3179. What proportion of that constituency is composed of mill operatives?—I should think about 7,000, more or less, are artisans, either workers in mills, or engaged in the iron trade or building trade.

3180. From what you personally know, and from what you learnt from the late inquiry, never mind which party, be it on both sides, do you think that there was so much intimidation used in relation to those mill operatives, that if it had not been used the election would have been the same, or may it have been different in its results?—I have every reason to believe that the election in November would have been different in its results had there been no intimidation.

3181. I believe the intimidation was proved to have been of two classes, the one by millowners and overlookers direct, and the other by the workmen who employed intimidation upon their fellow workmen?—Not so much the intimidation of workmen against workmen, I think.

3182. But were there not cases where the workmen had physically turned persons out of a mill without the knowledge of the employers, whether they approved of it afterwards or not?—That was done in almost every instance, if not in the presence of the employer in the presence of some overlooker or manager.

3183. Was not there actually physical interference with the workmen?—In some cases there was.

3184. On account of the municipal voting, and previous to the Parliamentary voting?—Yes, that was so.

3185. Mr. Locke.] You stated, did you not, that generally there was no bribery at the Parliamentary elections?—No, at some of the Parliamentary elections there has been considerable bribery.

3186. Previous to November last was that the case?—Yes; in 1865 there was a Parliamentary election, and it was considered that there was a very great amount of bribery at that election.

3187. They did not confine themselves then to what you call influence?—No, it was chiefly bribery then.

3188. Was there any petition at that time?—There was no petition.

3189. Do you recollect what the state of the poll was in 1865?—The constituency was very much smaller then.

3190. What number did the constituency then consist of?—I fancy about 1,800.

3191. What does it consist of now?—Nine thousand seven hundred; the last Reform Act added about 8,000 to the constituency of Blackburn.

3192. But have you got the relative poll of the candidates in 1865?—Mr. Hornby polled in that year 1,053; Mr. Joseph Fielden 938; Mr. James Pilkington 774, and Mr. Potter 577.

3193. Then the election was gained easily by the Conservative party?—Yes, it was gained easily; there was a little division in the Liberal party at that election.

3194. Has there always been bribery at the Parliamentary elections?—There was bribery at the election in 1865, and at the election in 1868 there was some.

3195. But it did not take place at the election in 1868?—Not at the Parliamentary election, but at the municipal election previously.

3196. Did that arise from the circumstance of the municipal election taking place so shortly before the Parliamentary election?—I think so.

3197. How many days intervened?—Fourteen days.

3198. Therefore the bribery was effected at the municipal election for both?—Yes.

3199. In 1865, I think you say, there was bribery likewise?—There was likewise bribery at that election; and, as an illustration of that, I may say that 26 voters who promised me, as a canvasser, to vote for Mr. Pilkington in my presence in the polling booth voted against him.

3200. That is the reason, is it, why you suppose that they were bribed?—I have other reasons also.

3201. What description of persons are the new voters voters that the Act of 1867 has brought on to the register?—They are weavers and spinners in cotton mills chiefly.

3202. What wages do they earn?—Fifteen shillings or 16 s. a week.

3203. What are the highest wages that they earn in Blackburn?—I should not think that many mill hands get over 18 s; or from that to 1 l.; but I should think that the majority of them earn about 16 s.

3204. What class of persons in 1865 were the 10 l. householders?—They were chiefly foremen over those men who have since been added to the constituency, and of course there was a large number of small tradesmen that are still on the franchise; but the franchise, as a whole, was more largely in proportion composed of small tradesmen than it is now.

3205. What you call labouring men in the factories had no votes?—Not many; the foremen, managers, and overlookers had, but not many of the underworkers.

3206. Mr. Whitbread.] You stated that in the ward with which you are more immediately concerned, upon more than one occasion the election had been endeavoured to have been conducted upon principles of purity, and that the side which adopted that course had always lost; did that side get a considerable minority or was it well beaten?—I have not the figures so as to be able to say whether it was well beaten or not; I should think not by many, because the ward is known as a Liberal ward, so that the minority would only be small.

3207. Is the municipal register or the Parliamentary register most numerous?—The Parliamentary register; there are 2,000 more votes on the Parliamentary than on the municipal register. I think there are 7,600 on the municipal register and 9,700 on the Parliamentary register. The municipal franchise is more restricted than the Parliamentary franchise.

3208. The O'Conor Don.] Did I rightly understand you to say that at the last municipal election in November 90 per cent. of the electors were actually bribed, or that they were bribable?—Ninety per cent. were paid for voting.

3209. Was that payment given to them as compensation for the loss of their day's wages?—I think it was more that way than to buy the men, that is, more as compensation than to turn them from either Conservative to Liberal, or from Liberal to Conservative.

3210. Mr. Howes.] Was there any difficulty in inducing those men to vote at all at the last Parliamentary election?—No, there was not much.

3211. Would they have gone to the poll without this compensation for loss of time?—They did so at the Parliamentary election though it was difficult to get Liberal voters who were employed in Tory works to vote, and it was difficult, I dare say, to get Tories who were employed in Liberal works to vote; I have no doubt that that extends to both parties. I have several workmen in my own employ who are Tories; they did not vote at either of the last Parliamentary elections.

3212. Mr. Leatham.] Is there any change in the mode of voting which you think would check intimidation?—I am certain that the ballot would.

3213. Is there any strong feeling in Blackburn in favour of the ballot?—I think there is a feeling, both with Conservatives and Liberals, in favour of it; I do not think that it is regarded so much a party question in Blackburn as it is in some other places.

3214. Do you think that the feeling is pretty general; in fact, is there a considerable proportion of the Conservative party in Blackburn in favour of the ballot?—I feel convinced of it.

3215. Mr. Bright.] You have stated that the nomination was the commencement of the riots; is there a very large crowd generally at your nominations in Blackburn?—It is very large; there was an immense crowd at the nomination.

3216. Is it the fact that both parties take any means to muster as many of their adherents as possible to influence the show of hands?—All the works are stopped, and, as a rule, assemblages take place at the works of the various work people, and they go from there to the space in front of the hustings.

3217. What is your opinion with regard to the practice of nominations, seeing that the franchise is so widely extended; is it your opinion that it would be advantageous or otherwise, looking to the tranquillity of elections, to continue the practice of nominations?—I think it would be much better dispensed with.

3218. And that without regard to any party result, but merely looking to the tranquillity of the town at the time of the elections?—Yes, certainly.

3219. Has it been a matter of discussion, whether it would be desirable to put some further restriction upon public-houses at the time of election?—I think that that question has not been much discussed in Blackburn. There has not been any very great amount of treating at the Parliamentary elections in Blackburn.

3220. In your business as a cotton manufacturer, do you employ a great number of men?—About 500.

3221. Are you here as representing the Liberal Association, or in what capacity?—I am secretary of the Reform Club in Blackburn.

3222. Is it your opinion that the abolition of the nomination would be generally acceptable to both parties?—I think so; I believe that a petition has been presented from the town council of Blackburn to Parliament on the subject, praying for the abolition of the nomination.

3223. In your town council which party is predominant?—The Conservatives have a majority in the town council.

3224. If the mills stop on the nomination day, and everybody throws down his tools and comes to the hustings, is there not a loss generally both of wages to the workpeople, and, if any business be profitable, of course a loss also to the manufacturers and employers?—Yes.

3225. Is it the custom amongst the political parties to make up to the workman for his loss on that day?—No; it is occasionally done, but it is by no means general.

3226. Besides promoting the tranquillity of the borough at the time of the election, it would be a saving of a day's wages to those 7,000 working men if they were not called from their employ to attend the nomination?—It would be the saving of a day's wages to them and their families also, for their families are robbed of the day's employ as well as the voters.

3227. With regard to a question which was just asked you about the ballot and what I have asked you about the nomination, can you say (getting rid of your position as secretary of the Reform Club for the moment) that the opinion in Blackburn tends strongly in the direction of making those two changes?—Certainly, for the abolition of the nomination; and I should say that the majority of the people at Blackburn would hail very gladly the adoption of the vote by ballot.

Mr. F. Johnston. 23 April 1869.

3228. Sir George Grey.] Are the mills stopped on the polling day as well as on the day of the nomination?—Yes.

3229. And also the day of the declaration of the poll?—Partially. At the last election in March a considerable number of places were working on the day of the election.

3230. Chairman.] Does not the declaration of the poll take place at Blackburn on the same day as the polling itself?—It did at the last election in March.

3231. Mr. Bright.] That would be the case, I presume, more in the long days than in the depth of the winter?—Yes, it was in consequence of the days having lengthened between November and March that they were enabled to declare it in March.

3232. Chairman.] Have you any thing further to state to the Committee?—I would wish to make one observation with regard to the rioting at the municipal elections in Blackburn. I have no doubt that a very great deal of excitement and turmoil arises from the fact that we have only one booth in a ward, and a great deal of the peace and order at the Parliamentary election arises, I have no doubt, from there being four polling places in most of the wards.

3233. How many voters have to poll at one booth at the municipal election?—One thousand six hundred.

3234. Sir George Grey.] And I believe there cannot by law be more than 500 at the Parliamentary election?—No, only 500. At the last municipal election it took me about three hours between getting within the barrier leading to the polling booth and tendering my vote.

3235. Chairman.] Have you formed any opinion with regard to the system of voting by the use of papers, as practised at the municipal election; do you think it is a good system or a bad one?—I would rather, for myself, that the vote was tendered similarly to what it is at the Parliamentary election.

3236. I understand that you would prefer a system of secret voting, or if you could not get that, do you think that the system of the municipal voting should be assimilated to the Parliamentary?—Yes, certainly. I would remark also that the petition that came from the town council of Blackburn not only prayed for the abolition of the nomination but for the assimilation of the two franchises, the municipal and the Parliamentary. I would also add that facilities should be given to the voters by altering the hours for polling in large working men's constituencies; now the polling is from eight to four, and if the works are kept working the workmen have a difficulty in getting away to vote, whereas if the voting was from 12 to 8 or 9, the workmen could go and tender their votes after working hours, and lose no time at all.

3237. Do you think that it is desirable to prolong the excitement to so late at night as eight or nine o'clock?—I think that with the booths distributed as they are at the Parliamentary elections, we should suffer no danger from excitement.

3238. Sir George Grey.] Not even in winter?—No, I think not.

3239. Mr. Edward Egerton.] There is an hour always allowed for dinner in those mills, is there not?—Yes; but sometimes the polling booths are at a considerable distance from their works; a man does not always vote in the ward in which he is employed.

3240. Mr. Whitbread.] Would not it answer your purpose to open the booth earlier?—They commence work at six o'clock, and you could not well open the booth before that time.

3241. Mr. Cross.] Would you like the number of polling places increased both in the Parliamentary and the municipal elections?—No; in the Parliamentary elections we have plenty of polling places, but in the municipal elections we are sadly short.

3242. Mr. Locke.] With regard to the number of the booths, you say that you have more booths at the Parliamentary elections than at the other elections; has it been the practice with you to increase the size of the booths merely, and not to have separate ones?—No; we have the booths detached from each other; not four booths under one roof, but four booths in different positions in the ward.

3243. But does not it occur that instead of placing them at a distance from one another, say, half a mile away, it is considered sufficient to erect another booth by the side of the one that they have already got?—That plan has not been adopted in Blackburn; I believe it has been in some other places.

3244. So that by adopting that course it does not afford any facilities whatever to working men to come up; it is no nearer to them?—It is no nearer to them, but their vote is tendered in much less time.

Mr. JAMES BRIGGS, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Briggs.

3246. Chairman.] Do you live in Blackburn also?—Yes.

3247. What is your occupation?—I am a Cotton Spinner and a Manufacturer.

3248. Are you also connected with any Liberal Association at Blackburn?—I am a member of the Reform Club.

3249. Have you heard the evidence which has just been given by Mr. Johnston?—Yes.

3250. Do you agree with his evidence, or are there there any points in which you differ from him?—I agree with it as a whole, but I should not like to say that I would accept it in toto.

3251. Do you agree with him as to the facts which he has mentioned?—The facts, I think, are substantially correct.

3252. Are there any facts within your knowledge which you would desire to add to the statement which has been given by Mr. Johnston, first, with regard to municipal elections?—I can only add, that in the ward where I was at the last municipal election there was a good deal of rioting.

3253. Was that the same ward as Mr. Johnston's?—It was not the same ward; this was Trinity Ward, and the rioting in it was so bad that we had to create our schools into a sort of hospital. We had several men wounded and bleeding inside, and we had to have their wounds attended to.

3254. Did this rioting proceed from an organised system of intimidation by roughs?—It was no doubt caused by those who were engaged to prevent voters getting to the poll.

3255. In the ward with which you are connected, was bribery prevalent?—Payment for votes was prevalent. Every man, or nearly every man who voted, received money for his vote; in fact, some who presented themselves, astonished those who had to pay the money.

3256. Mr. Bright.] Do you mean that they were so high up in the scale?—Yes.

3257. Chairman.] Was it given in the shape of payment for the day's loss of time?—I fancy that the origin of it was so. But in this case, if one side was giving 2 s. 6 d., and the other side only 2 s., the people who got the 2 s. were immediately raised to 2 s. 6 d., and so on up to 5 s.

3258. The briber actually bought the vote, in your opinion?—Yes; in many cases.

3359. It was not that each voter voted for his own side and wanted to be paid, but were there many voters who would only vote for the highest bidder?—Yes; many.

3260. With regard to the Parliamentary election in November, have you anything to add to what has been stated by Mr. Johnston?—I may say that several cases of intimidation, or fear of intimidation, came under my own knowledge.

3261. Do you think that the municipal elections in November last were worked with a reference to the Parliamentary election?—Yes, there is no doubt that they were connected.

3262. Do you think that a great deal of the intimidation and bribery that were practised in the municipal election was for the purpose of affecting the Parliamentary votes?—Yes, I believe so.

3263. Do you agree with Mr. Johnston, that a stronger case might have been brought before the judge than was actually brought?—I was not so much acquainted with the getting up of the petition as Mr. Johnston was; in fact I was away a part of the time, and I could not offer an opinion upon it.

3264. In your opinion, what impression was made by the screw circular?—In my own mind I took it, and most Liberals in Blackburn took it, that it was intended to be a sort of intimidation to the men.

3265. Do you think that that was generally understood?—Yes, and I think it was understood also by the Conservative side, by the men. I will not say that the authors of the circular intended it, but it was understood by those to whom it was issued.

3266. You think that it was understood by the Conservative workmen that the influence which the employers were urged to use was undue influence?—Yes.

3267. Did that cause any general feeling of indignation in Blackburn?—Yes; a large meeting was held soon after this circular became known, and a large amount of money was subscribed; I forget what sum.

3268. That meeting was a meeting purely of the Liberal party, was it not?—Yes, purely of the Liberal party.

3269. Do you think that that circular caused any indignation amongst the Conservative party?—No, I do not think it did.

3270. Do you think that it was only objected to by the party who expected to suffer from it?—Exactly so.

3271. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] You stated that you did not agree with the whole of the evidence which had been given by Mr. Johnston; may I ask in what way you would qualify it?—A great deal of the evidence which Mr. Johnston gave was connected with a ward of which I know nothing at all.

3272. But so far as the circumstances go which have come under your own knowledge, you agree with what Mr. Johnston said?—Yes.

3273. Mr. James.] Do you agree with him in the proportion of persons that you think were bribable at the late municipal contest, namely, 90 per cent.?—I dare say it is not very far wrong.

3274. But in using that term bribable, do you mean that they received this day's pay, or were absolutely corrupted by money to vote for the other side?—No; I would not say that 90 per cent. were absolutely corrupt, but only that 90 per cent. received money.

3275. You use this term "bribable," in the sense of receiving head-money?—Yes, certainly.

3276. Mr. Locke.] What would the remaining 10 per cent. be composed of?—They would be composed perhaps of owners of mills and independent shopkeepers.

3277. Then all the shopkeepers are not independent?—No; many of them are anything but independent. They are in a worse case than the workmen. There is, I believe, more pressure put upon them than could be brought to bear upon the workmen.

3278. What sort of pressure is put upon the shopkeeper?—I have known customers go to the shopkeepers and say, that if they did not vote a certain way they would withdraw their custom; and they have done it in many cases.

3279. What class of shopkeepers would those be?—Small shopkeepers all over the town almost, who supply the working population with their goods.

3280. Then it would be the working population that would coerce them?—Yes. There are many public-houses too where the proprietors have not dared to vote according to their own wishes, for the same reason.

3281. Can you suggest any means of remedying that?—I can see no means except the adoption of the ballot, or a system of secret voting.

3282. Do you think that that would effect a remedy?—Yes, I think so.

3283. The O'Conor Don.] You spoke of certain

23 April 1869.

tain rioting existing at one of the municipal ward elections, and you stated that one of the school-rooms was turned into an hospital; were the military used at those elections to keep order?—The military were called out at the municipal election, but not in Trinity Ward.

3284. Was the riot carried on by an organised mob on both sides?—It was carried on by armed men on both sides.

3285. Armed with what?—Some were armed with sticks, and some with pieces of iron, and in various ways.

3286. Those armed men were employed on both sides, were they?—They were taking different sides.

3287. Have you any reason to believe that they were paid for what they did on that occasion?—Yes.

3288. They were hired in fact by both sides?—Yes.

3289. Were there any cases of trial for assault after this election?—There were some cases of trial, and I think that the solicitor who was engaged for the Liberal party threw up his brief in one of the cases.

3290. Were there any cases on the other side against the Liberal party for assault?—Yes, I think there were cases on both sides.

3291. And the actions were both abandoned by mutual consent?—I believe they were both abandoned, but I am not sure upon that point.

3292. The police authorities of the town, I think you say, were not sufficient to keep order?—At times like those there are many people who come into the town from the surrounding districts. We have very populous towns round about who have no elections of their own, as for instance Darwen, where there are something like 18,000 or 20,000 inhabitants; many of those people flock into the town when there is any excitement going on.

3293. Could you give the Committee any idea of the number of persons that were grievously assaulted during that election?—No, I could not; I saw 20 or 30 myself that were very badly hurt.

3294. And still the authorities did not consider the state of things sufficient to justify them in calling out the military?—No, the policemen stopped the riot in Trinity Ward.

3295. Mr. Brain.] Should you approve of closing the public-houses and beer-houses at the time of election?—I think it would be a very good thing indeed, if it could be managed.

3296. Do you think that it would tend to allay the popular excitement?—I have no doubt it would.

3297. And would public feeling at Blackburn be in favour of that step?—I cannot say.

3298. Chairman.] Is there anything else that you wish to add?—No, I think not.

Mr. Arthur Bower Forwood, called in; and Examined.

Mr. A. B. Forwood.

3299. Mr. Graves.] You are a Merchant, living in Liverpool, I think?—A merchant and shipowner in Liverpool.

3300. Are you one of four or five gentlemen who assisted the legal agent at the last Parliamentary elections for South West Lancashire and Liverpool?—Yes.

3301. In your experience in the working of the county election, did it occur to you that any improvement might be made in future with regard to the number of polling places?—I think that the polling places were much too far apart; in some cases the voters would have to proceed upwards of seven miles to the nearest polling place.

3302. Does that fact account for the large item of 2,400 l. in the expenses for cabs and conveyances?—Yes; I think if there were more polling places the items of conveyance expenses would not be so large. If we had not conveyances, the poorer class of voters could not ever get to the poll.

3303. Were the expenses for conveyance returned by the Conservative party more or less than those made by the other side?—The expenses were less.

3304. Have not the magistrates the power of appointing a sufficient number of polling places?—I believe they have.

3305. Why do they not do it?—I think that upon the last occasion the magistrates waited for both political parties to take steps in the matter, but no combined action was brought to bear upon the bench, and, therefore, nothing was done; I believe that was so.

3306. You think that there should be some power in the Act to enforce the appointment of a sufficient number of polling places?—I think so.

3307. You were engaged, were you not, in a similar manner with regard to the borough election in Liverpool?—Yes 3308. It was a prolonged contest, was it not?—Yes, the contest extended over a considerable time.

3309. What were the respective amounts of expenses that were returned?—The Conservative expenditure, I think, was returned at 4,240 l., and I think the Liberal expenditure was about 4,700 l.

3310. Were those amounts more or less than on previous occasions?—They were more.

3311. Cabs were formerly allowed, were they not?—Yes, cabs were allowed on previous occasions.

3312. Do you consider that the expenditure is more likely to increase than decrease, in future?—I do not think that at a future election it will be any greater than it was in the last.

3313. What number of voters are there on the Parliamentary register in Liverpool?—There are 39,645 on the Parliamentary register, and on the municipal only 17,131.

3314. Into how many wards is Liverpool now divided?—Sixteen.

3315. And how many polling districts had you at the last Parliamentary election?—Twenty-one.

3316. Do you remember the number of polling places?—I think there were 78; 500 were polled in each booth.

3317. Do you consider that sufficient?—I think so.

3318. Do you believe that any corrupt practices prevailed at the last Parliamentary election?—I feel very confident that none prevailed at the Parliamentary election.

3319. Had you some experience of previous elections?—Some little; but not nearly so much as the last.

3320. Do

3320. Do you believe that any system could be introduced which would tend to produce a purer election than the last that we had in Liverpool?—I do not think we could have had a more fair and straightforward election.

3321. Is that opinion based upon your own observation, or have you taken any pains to ascertain the opinions of others?—I have taken considerable trouble to ascertain the opinions of the different wards or polling districts in the town by means of issuing circulars inquiring as to what took place in each ward.

3322. Will you read the headings of one of those circulars which were sent out?—I asked from each district "Did you attend to matters connected with the election sufficiently closely to be able to give a reliable opinion as to its character in the district? Had you any insight as to the expenditure incurred? Could you declare, if called upon, that on the part of the Conservatives no improper means, either by treating, bribery, or intimidation, were used to influence any vote or votes in your district? Do you think the proceedings of the Liberals in your district were free from unlawful practices? If not, please to state the reasons that lead to your opinion." It was merely a paper calling for their replies as to the manner in which the election was conducted; the replies were altogether of a satisfactory character with regard to the proceedings, both on the Conservative and on the Liberal side, and in that respect confirming my own opinion. They were addresses to the leading men of the Conservatives in each ward in the town.

3323. You did this when you understood that you were to come here as a witness, I presume?—Yes.

3324. Were any specific means taken to induce the co-operation of committees and canvassers with the central committee in preventing improper practices?—Special instructions were sent to each committee, pointing out the wish of the central committee, that the election should be conducted upon the most proper and strict principles; and on the day prior to the election all the canvassers and committees from all the different wards were called together at a public meeting, and they were addressed by some of the leading Conservatives, who impressed upon them the necessity of doing everything in a straightforward and proper manner.

3325. You have no reason to suppose that corrupt practices prevailed on either the one side or the other at the last Liverpool election?—No, I feel very confident they did not.

3326. Was any intimidation exercised by employers, do you think?—I think none.

3327. There are a very large number of the poorer classes now, are there not, upon the register?—I think we had upon the last register a larger number of the poorer classes than we should have again in consequence of a vestry contest that had occurred in the early part of the year, which turned upon a religious point, and the rates of many of the poorest of our labouring men were paid by an association.

3328. As compared with other towns which you are cognisant with, have we, generally speaking, in Liverpool a poorer class than other towns?—I should think so, because the labouring population in Liverpool are, to a great extent, only casually employed.

3331. Was there much drunkenness observable in the streets at the time of the election?—No; I was a good deal about the streets, especially in front of our central committee-room where we had, I think, from 30,000 to 50,000 people assembled, and I saw none there; and the police returns show that there was no increase of drunkenness at all.

3332. Are you speaking now of the declaration of the poll?—No, on the day of the polling. The police returns on the day of the polling only give 14 cases of drunkenness, as against on a similar day in other weeks, 27 one week, 19 another week, and 11 another week.

3333. Are you speaking now of cases that were brought before the bench on the morning following the poll?—Yes, on the morning succeeding the poll, for drunkenness occuring on the preceding evening.

3334. You say there was no intimidation used; was there any other kind of influence at all used on the occasion of the election?—There were a large number of voters assembled in some Roman Catholic school-rooms early in the morning, and taken to the poll; I suppose that would be a sort of pressure upon their religious conscience.

3335. Did that account at all for the large majority in the morning?—I think so, to a great extent.

3336. Can you offer any suggestion for giving greater facilities to the poorer class of voters for recording their votes at Parliamentary elections?—If it could possibly be so managed that instead of men having to leave their work to proceed to where they may live, where their qualification may be, to vote if they could vote nearer to where they work, it would be a great advantage, I think. Of course the abolition of the right to use cabs has disfranchised many men who have to proceed some miles to vote.

3337. I believe that at the present moment the largest amount of employment goes on at the north end of Liverpool?—Yes.

3338. And a very large number of the artisan class live at the south end?—A very large number live in Toxteth and places in the south.

3339. What distance would they have to come from their work to the polling places in Toxteth and Everton?—Over three miles, I should think.

3340. Are you satisfied with the present Act

Mr. A. B. Forwood.

23 April 1869.

as regards the hiring of conveyances in boroughs?—No, I think it is in a very unsatisfactory position. It appears to me that though conveyances are forbidden, still friends to the cause can hire them, and they only incur a penalty of some 40 s.

3341. Are you quite sure that that is the interpretation of the Act?—I have seen an opinion by Sir John Coleridge, the present Solicitor General, upon the subject, which I took an extract from in which he says, "A friend or agent hiring a cab would not of itself vitiate an election, but the person hiring would be liable to penalties. If the offer of a cab was made to a voter, on condition of his voting for a certain candidate, that would vitiate the election."

3342. Are you aware that cabs were so hired by friends of the candidates?—Yes, I believe they were.

3343. Had you conveyances at the last election?—On the Conservative side the cab owners volunteered the use of upwards of some 100 vehicles, because of some services rendered by Mr. Graves to them on the occasion of a strike.

3344. Would you desire that the Act should be made more stringent, so as to prevent entirely the use, under any circumstances, of conveyances, or would you in large towns permit the use of conveyances?—I think that I would do anything that would facilitate the poorer men being able to record their votes; I would therefore rather be inclined to allow conveyances to be used.

3345. But you would wish an alteration in the present system?—Yes; it should either be made definite, that you cannot have a cab on any consideration, or else it should be thrown open as it was before.

3346. You have taken some interest, have you not, in the municipal elections also?—Not an active part in them, but I have watched them, and am acquainted with what goes on.

3347. Have you done so sufficiently to form an opinion as to the extent to which corrupt practices have prevailed?—I think so.

3348. Do corrupt practices prevail more in the municipal than in the Parliamentary elections?—They do prevail at the municipal elections to some extent, but not at the Parliamentary.

3349. When you say to some extent, will you give the Committee an idea to what extent they do prevail?—I think we have five wards in the town which may be influenced at the municipal elections by payment of money; three represented by Liberal members in the town council, and two by Conservative members.

3350. So that it is not confined to any particular side?—No.

3351. Is this payment an absolute payment of money given as bribes, or as compensation for their day's labour, usually?—It is only to a small extent in the shape of bribes, but to a large extent in the shape of payment for the loss of a day's labour in going to vote, as I have stated before; the place of voting being so far away from the place where the man would work, he loses his day's pay; and there was an impression that it was not illegal to pay those sums, and in some parts of the town they do pay a man his day's wages.

3352. But in all the other wards of the town you think they are free from corrupt practices?—I think so.

3354. Is that an official return?—Yes.

3355. Whom is it signed by?—By our superintendent of police.

3356. That applies only to the election week in each year?—Yes.

3357. It has also been stated here that in the same ward the arrangements for bribery in 1868 were carried on by the assessor, and that he was checked by the aldermen, and that in consequence the assessor was not approved by the magistrates as overseer; can you give any explanation of that to the Committee?—Yes; I think that the statement made was unfair; a trial took place in Liverpool, in which a man was prosecuted for bribery at that election; and on this trial it was stated in evidence that the person, who was assessor, had directed a man when he came up to the booth, and asked for some money, to go next door; the assessor could not be called in evidence at that trial to refute that, but he publicly denied it afterwards, and he stated that the Liberal Committee-room was next door, and he, out of a little joke, said, "Go in next door"; and further, the statement that the magistrates had refused to approve of him as overseer, in consequence of this alleged bribery is not correct either, for the magistrates simply refused to appoint him as overseer because they would thus have had a third Conservative overseer on the list; whereas, they wished to appoint two on one side and one on the other.

3358. It has also been stated that in St. Anne's Ward, and I believe in Toxteth Ward also, bribery was altogether confined to the Conservative party; is that so?—No; I have had what I think is pretty good proof that both parties were implicated in it.

3359. Can you give proof to the contrary now, if the Committee desire it?—I think I could.

3360. Do you consider that the municipal elections had any influence upon the Parliamentary?—I do not think they had any at all with us.

3361. Do you find that men voting at the municipal election Liberal frequently voted Conservative at the Parliamentary and vice versâ?—Yes.

3362. Are there many wards in your town that have Liberal majorities for the municipal elections and return Liberals as representatives on the town council that have declared a Conservative majority for the Parliamentary election?—Yes, I think five or six of them.

3363. And vice versâ?—Five or six of them are situated in this way, that they return Conservative councillors, and a Liberal majority in the Parliamentary election, and return Liberal councillors and show a Conservative majority for the Parliamentary election.

3364. Was the same machinery at all at work in conducting both elections?—No, we were very particular to keep both elections distinct; and in one or two cases where we found the committee-rooms for municipal purposes and Parliamentary purposes were being held at the same house, we at once removed the committee-room for the Parliamentary election in order to have them quite distinct.

3365. Have you any strong opinion with regard to the advisability of having but one list both for municipal and Parliamentary purposes?—I think it would be desirable to assimilate them and to have only one register for both purposes.

3366. Is that the feeling generally of the various political institutions that you are connected with?—It is.

3367. Mr. Bright.] Is that with the view of saving trouble, or for any other reason?—I think it was supposed that if a man was considered good enough to vote for the Parliamentary, he was equally good to vote for the municipal election; it would simplify matters very much by having one register for the two.

3368. You would propose an extension of the municipal franchise to the present limit of the Parliamentary franchise?—Yes.

3369. Sir George Grey.] Striking off the freemen from the Parliamentary register? — The lodgers and freemen, I think should be off the register as far as the municipal election is concerned.

3370. But if you make the two registers identical, it would be necessary, would it not, to take the freemen off the Parliamentary register? —No; you would have the two registers identical with the addition in the Parliamentary of the lodgers and the freemen.

3371. Mr. Bright.] Then they would not be identical?—They would be very nearly assimilated. The freemen and lodgers might be in a supplemental register.

3372. What is the number of freemen in Liverpool?—I think from 1,000 to 1,200, at present; I am not quite confident as to the number.

3373. Are many of them on both the occupiers' list and the freemen's list?—I should think two-thirds of them would be.

3374. Mr. Graves.] Are there a great number of merchants in Liverpool freemen?—Yes; a great many.

3375. Do they prefer voting under their freemen franchise to voting under their property franchise?—I think that they have rather piqued themselves upon their being connected with the old state of affairs.

3376. And they are not confined to any particular side in that view?—No.

3377. Have you given any consideration to whether the mode of voting might be changed with advantage from a public to a secret mode of voting? —I think we could not improve upon our present system.

3378. As regards the mode of giving the vote in Parliamentary elections, have you taken any steps to ascertain the feeling generally of the working-men of Liverpool upon that point?—Yes, I have found, as far as I have come in contact with them, that they are in favour of open voting. I have also had transmitted to me some communications by societies of working-men in Liverpool expressing that feeling.

3379. Will you read one of them?—The first I have is from a meeting of a committee of the Working Men's Conservative Association, and it is to the following effect:—"It having been reported that Mr. A. B. Forwood was proceeding from Liverpool to give evidence before the Select Committee of the House of Commons upon the subject of municipal and Parliamentary Elections, it was resolved that Mr. A. B. Forwood should be desired to lay the following statement before the Committee, if he has the opportunity, as showing the views of this committee, and the labouring men of Liverpool upon the practices at elections; that at the Parliamentary election for the borough there was not the slightest attempt on the part of anyone to influence the voters by treating, intimidation, or bribery; that the committee would view with regret any resort to secret voting, as they believe it unnecessary, more especially since the passing of the Corrupt Practices Act, to protect the voter; that the privilege of having a vote would be little esteemed if it was to be given in secret; that it would destroy that wholesome tone of just pride which a man feels when he is able to declare openly how he votes; that it would not aid the prevention of bribery, nor prevent coercion, if persons wished to try such practices. The committee would further state that corruption exists in two or three wards at municipal elections, the payments being in the form of compensation for loss of wages, the polling place being so far from their place of work; that this arises from the lax state of the laws upon the subject; if the laws were more stringent, or enforced more frequently, it would remedy this state of matters. This committee also thinks that if a public prosecutor were appointed to prosecute in such cases it would be an improvement on the present system; that in the opinion of this committee the working classes displayed much greater enthusiasm and interest in the contest than those in a better pecuniary position. Signed, John Burland, chairman; Richard Jervis, treasurer; Samuel S. Harpur, secretary." That was transmitted to me, I think, yesterday, as having been passed at a meeting of this committee held on Monday last.

3380. What number of members is that society composed of?—Upwards of 1,600 paying members.

3381. Then this has been obtained since you knew you were to be called as a witness?—Yes.

3382. Have you any other documents bearing upon the subject?—Yes, one was sent to me this morning from another branch of that society from which the first came, in which they state as follows: "Liverpool Working Men's Conservative Association; West Derby ward branch, April 20th 1869, to A. B. Forwood and Thomas Bold, Esqrs.—Gentlemen, the committee of the above-named ward have read with pain and indignation the statements made before a Committee of the House of Commons by Messrs Trippier and Johnson, and take this course to deny the accuracy of such evidence from having taken a very active part in the late Parliamentary and municipal elections; they are in a position to state that the committee present this evening, without any special summons in any form, can state the following facts: that the number of voters on the Parliamentary register is 3,972" (that alludes to one ward). "That most of the members of this committee took a very active part in canvassing the electors in the Conservative interest, and that they canvassed more than 1,000 Conservative voters,

Mr. A. B. Forwood.

23 April 1869.

Mr. A. B. Forwood, 23 April 1869.

voters, besides Liberals; that during their canvass, bribery was neither asked for or given in any form whatever. That little trouble was occasioned to us in getting the electors to the poll to vote. That a very considerable portion of working-men worked the first half of the day before they voted. That as a considerable number of working-men live a great distance from the place they are employed at, and often that is the cause of loss of half-day's wages to them, they would prefer the voting booths opened earlier. That if other means could be adopted to enable them to vote near where they are employed, it would be a boon to them. That if more polling places were opened (especially in large districts), it would be a great convenience. That having paid particular attention to the ideas and thoughts of those we canvassed we found they would prefer open to secret voting. That they have no desire for the ballot system. That where bribery exists, both parties are equally guilty, and both ought to be punished. That the only undue influence, to our knowledge, was that exercised by the Roman Catholic clergy over their congregations. In behalf of the committee, we remain gentlemen, your obedient servants, James B. Jeffery, chairman, Frederick Brownfield, honorary secretary."

3383. Sir George Grey.] Do you know what the statements were in the evidence given by Mr. Trippier and Mr. Johnson with reference to the last Parliamentary election which is alluded to in the last resolution which you read as being viewed with indignation by the persons who passed the resolution?—I think one of the witnesses stated that there was drunkenness in the town; I do not think they stated further than that.

3384. Mr. Graves.] With reference to canvassing in so large a town as Liverpool, I presume that there were a large number of canvassers employed?—A very large number, but they were nearly altogether volunteers. I should think there must have been 20 volunteers to one paid man; paid men are really useless.

3385. Could you conduct a large election like that without canvassers?—Not without volunteer canvassers.

3386. Could you without paid canvassers?—Yes, I think we could.

3387. Do you think it desirable that paid canvassers should be dispensed with?—Yes, I think so; I do not think they are of any value to anyone.

3388. Have you any apprehension at all that volunteer canvassing leads to any corrupt practices?—I think not in Liverpool, for the men who canvass in Liverpool are not in that position in life, or have not that means that could enable them to give anything. The gentlemen in Liverpool will only canvass in the best wards.

3389. Have you any idea of the number of volunteer canvassers you had altogether?—I should think of committees and canvassers and volunteers there must have been from 1,000 to 1,500 at the election.

3390. What proportion would be volunteers?—Twenty to one.

3391. Do you think that canvassing has any effect in disseminating political information?—I should think very great effect.

3392. Would voters consider themselves slighted if they were not called upon and asked for their vote?—That is my experience in canvassing many of them.

3393. Would you think it undesirable for the candidate personally to canvass?—I think it is undesirable; it places him in an improper position towards the voters.

3394. Do you consider that you could dispense with public-houses for holding committee-rooms in to conduct an election?—I should be glad if we could, but I am afraid not, for we require in a large district large rooms for meetings, and there are no private houses convenient that would take so large a number; and besides that private families, I think, would object to having an indiscriminate lot of strangers coming in upon them.

3395. Do you think it would inflict any hardship if the law required that to be done; would you be able to get private houses sufficient for your purpose?—I am afraid not.

3396. Did any cases of personation at the last election come under your knowledge?—Yes, there were several cases; but two of them that we prosecuted were brought up before the magistrates and committed to the assizes, and after we had spent between 60 l. and 70 l., we found that we should have to spend a considerable sum more to get the necessary evidence from the House of Commons, that is to say the poll returns from the House of Commons, and therefore the prosecution was allowed to drop, the parties pleading guilty, and undertaking to come up for judgment when called upon.

3397. Has it occurred to you what suggestions you would make for the improvement of this state of things?—I think there should be some public prosecutor in the case of personation; that it should not be left to individuals to take up such cases as that.

3398. Will you explain to the Committee how an expenditure of 60 l. was involved in conducting even one of those cases?—Of course the lawyers ran up a considerable bill for instructions, and giving briefs, and getting witnesses; then there was the barristers' retainers, and the barristers' fees, and really the money went very fast.

3399. Had you to get any evidence through the House of Commons?—No; we did not do that, because it would have involved us, as I said before, in considerable extra expense.

3400. What was the nature of the evidence which you wanted to get through the public documents of the House of Commons?—To bring down the poll-book.

3401. That would involve, you say, a very large expenditure?—Yes, to bring witnesses from London.

3402. I presume if that personation is now carried on under the open system of voting, where it is known how a man has voted, detection would be less likely under secret voting?—I think so.

3403. Has it occurred to you whether it would be possible to conduct a scrutiny, and detect personation with a secret mode of voting?—I do not see how a scrutiny could be conducted as against personation under a system of secret voting.

3404. You have witnessed some elections in America, have you not?—Yes, I have, just casually.

3405. Do you know how that point is dealt with there?—No, I do not.

3406. Have you considered at all what further steps are requisite for preventing bribery and intimidation with regard to the municipal elections?—I think if you were to apply to the municipal elections pretty much the same laws as you you have made applicable to the Parliamentary, it would effectually put a stop to improper practices at the municipal elections, and especially if you unseated the candidate or the Member upon whose behalf the bribes were given.

3407. How would you propose to unseat a municipal candidate?—I would do it in the same manner as you do in the Parliamentary; have a petition to be lodged against him, and have that petition heard at a local court.

3408. What court would you suggest as a good one?—We have a court of assize four times a year, and I think that it would be more satisfactory to the town generally if such cases could be tried at our ordinary assizes.

3409. Before a jury, do you mean?—No.

3410. Have you known any instances where the Bribery Act has been put in force with reference to the municipal election?—Only one case that I can remember.

3411. Was that from the difficulty of detecting cases, or from the expense of the machinery?—I think it seems to me that what is everybody's business is no one's business as far as that is concerned; that is one reason, and the expense of getting together evidence I think is very great also.

3412. What is the feeling in Liverpool with regard to public nominations?—I think it is averse to them.

3413. Why are they averse to them in Liverpool?—They are scenes of general tumult and disorder, not of actual rioting, because in Liverpool the police arrangements are so excellent that they take care to divide the two parties; but it is continual groans, and hooting, and noise on both sides, so that really no purpose is served by the nomination.

3414. Are you aware whether the Liverpool town council have petitioned against nominations?—I think so unanimously.

3415. Do you remember the county nomination on the last occasion?—Yes; very well indeed.

3416. Was that more riotous than the borough one?—I do not think it was, but it was equally so.

3417. Was it, in your opinion, a mistake to have that nomination at all in Liverpool?—I have not considered that point; I think the nomination is useless in itself.

3418. How would you give candidates an opportunity of expressing their views and opinions if only their own supporters usually attend their meetings?—I think we have plenty of public meetings, and plenty of newspapers; and they have every opportunity of stating their views.

3419. Might not some candidate be put up without the electors having an opportunity of questioning him, and knowing him?—It might be so; but he would have no chance of being elected.

3420. That would be his own loss, would it not?—Yes; it would be his own loss.

3421. With regard to the expenses of municipal elections for booths and those things, are they borne by the municipal council?—They are borne by the council in the municipal elections.

3422. In the Parliamentary, they are borne by the candidates?—They are shared by the candidates.

3423. Would you consider it advisable that that should be altered, and that the expenditure should be thrown upon the town?—No, I think not; in the Parliamentary elections I would leave it as it is; the town, I am afraid, would be put to a useless contest frequently, if there was no protection against any persons putting up; if it cost him nothing to be put up, it would frequently lead to a useless contest.

3424. With regard to the corrupt practices that have prevailed in four or five municipal wards in Liverpool, is it a question of party, or does it partake of a personal character, and depend very much upon the men who come forward as candidates?—Entirely personal, party has nothing whatever to do with it; I believe that either Liberal or Conservative, as parties, have nothing to do with those improper practices; it is entirely on the part of the candidates, or their immediate friends, in the wards which are contested.

3425. Mr. Fawcett.] You stated that the election at Liverpool, on the last occasion, was a pure one?—I believe so, quite.

3426. By that, I presume, you mean that no votes were either directly, or indirectly, influenced by the expenditure of money?—Yes.

3427. You stated that the two sides spent close upon 9,000 l.; can you give us the leading items of that expenditure?—I am afraid I cannot. I think the larger amount would be in wages to clerks employed in directing envelopes and making out polling tickets, and so on.

3428. Do you think 2,000 l. was spent in wages?—Yes, I should think so.

3429. How much was spent in paid agents; would it be another 2,000 l.?—No; I should think for paid agents would be perhaps 500 l.

3430. How much was spent for paid canvassers?—On the Conservative side perhaps 200 l.

3431. Do you know how much on the Liberal side?—No, I have no idea.

3432. Do you think that if that money had not been spent on paid agents, and paid canvassers, and paid clerks, and if the candidates had stood upon economical principles, perhaps those persons who had been so employed would have voted differently?—The Conservatives did not employ any voters.

3433. Not relations of voters?—No.

3434. Neither sons nor brothers?—No, nothing of that description at all.

3435. How is it that corruption prevails at the municipal and not at the Parliamentary election?—I think that a municipal vote is not looked upon as of so great political moment as a Parliamentary vote, and a rather lax system has got into some of the wards.

3436. You stated that the gentlemen in Liverpool would only canvass the respectable wards; who canvasses the other wards?—The volunteer working men, or rather I would say men who are not in such a good pecuniary position.

3437. You object, do you not, to the necessary expenses of the Parliamentary elections being thrown upon the town, because you think it would encourage contests?—I think it would.

3438. Do you remember how many contests you have had in Liverpool since the Reform Act, what proportion of the elections have been contested?—No, I am not able to say.

3439. You have scarcely had an election without a contest, have you?—I should think not above two or three.

3440. Have you not had as many as ever you could;

Mr. A. B. Forwood.

23 April 1869.

could; can you think of but one with a contest?—Yes, that would be the extent, I should think.

3441. You could not have had many more contests, even if the new system had been introduced?—No.

3442. You are afraid of a man standing without any reasonable chance of success, just for the sake of an advertisement?—Quite so.

3443. Do you not think that that would be prevented if a man who did not poll a certain number of votes had to pay a certain portion of the expenses?—Yes; I think that would meet the case.

3444. If such a clause was introduced you do not see any objection to throwing the necessary expense upon the town?—No, I do not.

3445. Do you think it would be desirable not to have committee-rooms and meetings at public-houses, if it could be proved that the candidates, without using public-houses, could get a fair opportunity of making their opinions known to the constituency?—Yes.

3446. Do you think that holding meetings at public-houses leads to treating?—We held no meetings, I should explain, at which the candidates attended, at public-houses; the meetings at public-houses were meetings of the committees in rooms engaged for the purpose of conducting the election in each ward.

3447. Are we to understand that the candidates in Liverpool never go to public-houses?—They go to no public-houses.

3448. As far as they are concerned, therefore, there would be no difficulty in forbidding meetings to be held in public-houses?—I think not; I think there are enough rooms for holding public meetings without resorting to public-houses.

3449. Mr. Locke.] You have said that in Liverpool there is sufficient accommodation for them to hold those meetings in other places than in public-houses?—Yes, to hold public meetings where the electors are assembled to be addressed.

3450. Where can they hold those meetings?—We had, at the last election, music-halls, and circuses, and school-rooms, and occasionally some Dissenting chapels.

3451. But a music-hall is licensed to sell beer and spirits, is it not?—In some cases it is.

3452. And have you held your meetings there?—Yes.

3453. What do you mean strictly by public-houses?—I mean simply places where men go in to drink, places for refreshment.

3454. Would you call the London Tavern a public-house?—I do not know the London Tavern.

3455. Do you know the new hotel in Cannon-street?—Yes.

3456. Would you call that a public-house?—No.

3457. Do you know the Bridge House Hotel in the borough of Southwark just over the bridge?—I think I have seen it, I call that an hotel.

3458. You do not call that a public-house?—No.

3459. Are you aware that the candidates for the City of London and likewise the candidates for the borough of Southwark hold their public meetings in those places?—No, I was not aware of that.

3460. Do the candidates for Liverpool hold their meetings in similar places to that?—No.

3461. Do they hold them in hotels where they have large rooms?—No.

3462. Do they hold them in music-halls?—Music-halls, or school-rooms, or circuses, and various places of that sort.

3463. With regard to music-halls, persons who meet in music-halls have their refreshments, do they not, wine, brandy and water, and cigars?—I have never been in one when that has been allowed. At the time when our own meetings have been held at music-halls the entrance has been quite distinct from any bar or public drinking place.

3464. However you only speak of Liverpool?—Only of Liverpool.

3465. You do not know whether there are any of those large houses in London?—No.

3466. Mr. Whitbread.] Have you examined the returns made by the different candidates of their expenses at the Parliamentary elections at Liverpool?—Some of them; I have not looked very closely at them.

3467. Do you believe that those returns include the whole cost of the Parliamentary election?—No.

3468. You probably have good reason to believe that they do not?—I do not think they do.

3469. What is the penalty attached to making a false return now?—I am not certain; I have an idea that it is 50*l.*, but I do not know the law. Perhaps I might explain my reason why I do not think they make correct returns; there are registration societies on each side in the various towns, and there are those election committees; it is a matter of opinion to a large extent whether many items of expenditure are on account of the registration or are on account of the election, and therefore I think that an agent can make a conscientious return, and can reduce the amount of the election expenses, and that goes to the registration which is not made public.

3470. Then the return, if it is made in that fashion, is not of any very great value in showing what the expenses have been?—I do not think it is.

3471. Do you think that it would be impossible to enforce the return being an honest one?—I should think it would be.

3472. Do you think that it would be a great hardship to attach the penalty of forfeiture of the seat to a candidate making any payment other than those that were included in the return?—I do not think it would, if it were made by his authorised agent or by himself.

3473. Nobody now thinks it worth while to prosecute a candidate for not making a true return?—I do not think anyone is aware whether it is a true or an incorrect return.

3474. Mr. Leatham.] You had no bribery or intimidation, I think you say, at the Parliamentary elections in Liverpool?—No.

3475. As you have had no occasion to deal with them, your attention probably has not been particularly drawn to the remedies?—No.

3476. I presume you hardly consider yourself a very special authority upon the subject?—I think that the Corrupt Practices Act has been a very great restraint upon any one doing anything improper.

3477. Mr. Brand.] With regard to those meetings which were held last Monday, of which you spoke just now, how were they called?—The first resolutions that I read were from a meeting meeting on Monday; I know that it was their regular meeting night.

3478. How many attended upon that occasion?—They state 21 in the resolution.

3479. And how many at the other meeting?—I do not know; there is no statement given of the number.

3480. Sir George Grey.] Were those resolutions passed with respect to the evidence which had been given before this Committee relating to Liverpool?—I think so.

3481. Have you yourself seen a copy of the evidence which was given by Mr. Trippier and Mr. Johnson?—I have.

3482. Have you seen a copy of the evidence that was taken down by the shorthand writer here, or merely a statement that appeared in the newspaper?—I have seen the official copy.

3484. They state distinctly their belief that there was no bribery?—I cannot call that to mind. I have an impression in my mind, from their answers, that they rather gave the Committee to understand that there might have been some bribery.

3485. What is the statement which you come here to contradict to-day?—I do not know that I come here distinctly to contradict anything particular, but to give a general statement of the state of affairs in Liverpool.

3486. I think you said that some voters in Liverpool had to go three miles to the poll?—Yes.

3487. And that the prohibition of the use of cabs prevented their voting?—Yes.

3488. Is any voter prohibited from using a cab?—Certainly not, but they had not the means of doing it.

3489. What are the wages earned by those men in Toxteth, and the other places they had three miles to come from?—They vary from 3 s. 6 d. a day to 6 s. or 7 s. a day, but the employment is very casual.

3490. What is the price of a cab for taking two or three voters to the poll?—There and back 5 s.

3491. And you think that they would not pay 5 s. amongst two or three of them for the sake of giving their vote?—Not as a rule, certainly not; but I have heard even of some who, when cabs were offered to them, preferred to walk up, for fear of its being misconstrued if they rode.

3492. You were conversant with the elections, I suppose, before the Act passed which prohibited the hiring of cabs by the candidate, or by any one on his behalf?—Not so much as with the last election.

3493. Do you know whether they were very extensively used in the Liverpool elections to bring up voters to the poll before the passing of that Act?—Yes, they were very extensively used.

3494. Do you know what the expense was to the candidates?—I think at the previous election it was something over 1,000 l. on one side.

3495. Were they used to bring up voters that lived at a distance of two or three miles, or were they used indiscriminately?—Indiscriminately.

3496. Do you wish to restore that state of the law?—I would wish to give a poor man a better chance of recording his vote. I would say, either restore that state of the law or make it very definite that we cannot use the cabs.

3497. You spoke also with regard to the polling at the county elections; are you aware that the magistrates have full power to provide any number of polling places in the counties?—I believe they have; but they did not take those steps at the last election.

3498. Was any application made to them to increase the number of polling places?—I do not know; I thought they ought to have done it without application.

3499. Chairman.] You stated to the Committee the amount of the expenses incurred by each party at the last Parliamentary election, and you subsequently stated that you do not think that those returns of election expenses are very much to be relied upon?—They are not closely to be relied upon.

3500. Do you think that the sums which you have mentioned bear any relation to the real amounts which were spent at the last election?—I believe that they represent what was probably spent over the election; but the registration expenses and the election expenses, I think, were somewhat intermixed.

3501. Should you be prepared to say that double as much was not spent?—Certainly, I am prepared to say so, as far as the Conservatives were concerned.

3502. You stated that you had not come here to expressly contradict any statements made by the witnesses who were examined here on a previous occasion; were you present at either of those meetings, the resolutions of which you have read?—I was present at one of them.

3503. Was that the one where the resolution was passed, which says something with regard to indignation at the statements that were made here?—No.

3504. Do you know what statements they were which were viewed with indignation by that meeting?—I judge that they were under the impression that those two gentlemen had stated that bribery and drunkenness had prevailed at the general election, but I do not know what specific statements they allude to there.

3505. Are you aware whether those witnesses did state that bribery prevailed at the election?—No; I think that one of the witnesses stated that there was a considerable amount of drunkenness in the town.

3506. Should you, yourself, hear that statement with indignation?—I should think that it was not correct. I do not know that it is worth while to feel indignation about it.

3507. You think that there was no more drunkenness than usual?—No; no more drunkenness than usual.

3508. When you quote from the police returns, is it quite certain that if there was more drunkenness than usual at the election, that would appear in the police returns?—I think so. Our police system is very efficient, and very well organised; we have upwards of 1,100 policemen, I think, in Liverpool.

3509. Mr. Graves.] Was not a suggestion made that it would be desirable to send up a working man as a sample here, to give his opinions upon the various points into which the Committee are inquiring?—That was suggested.

Mr. A. B. Forwood.

23 April 1869.

3510. Was it with a view of obtaining such a working man that you attended that meeting to which you have referred?—I attended that meeting in order to get their opinions upon the matter that was being discussed before this Committee.

3511. They preferred giving their opinions to the Committee in the shape of a resolution to sending up one of their own men?—I did not ask them on that occasion to send up one of their own working men; I asked them to do so on the previous occasion, but they have not sent me one.

3512. Sir George Grey.] Had the persons by whom this resolution was passed seen a correct copy of the evidence as taken down by the shorthand writer here?—The one at which I was present did not allude to that.

3513. But in the case of the meeting where they allude to the evidence, had they seen a correct copy as taken down by the shorthand writer?—I have no idea.

3514. Chairman.] I see that this document, proceeding from the Liverpool Working Men's Conservative Association, is addressed to you, and it commences by saying, "The committee of the above-named ward have read with pain and indignation the statements made before a Committee of the House of Commons by Messrs. Trippier and Johnson, and take this course to deny the accuracy of such evidence from having taken a very active part in the late Parliamentary and municipal elections;" you do not know to what statements those gentlemen who address you refer?—I do not.

3515. Have you not taken any means to ascertain?—No, I only received it this morning by post; I had no idea that such a document was coming.

Mr. H. T. Darnton.

27 April 1869.

3516. YOU are the Mayor of Ashton-under-Lyne, are you not?—I am.

3517. Has your attention been called to the evidence which was given before this Committee a few days since by Mr. Hampson?—My attention was called to it from reading the "Manchester Guardian" of Tuesday week, in which I noticed the evidence of Mr. Hampson, and I was rather pained to observe that evidence.

3518. You have not seen it in any official shape?—No; the information from the "Manchester Guardian" is generally very correct.

3519. Have you any observations which you wish to make to the Committee upon that evidence?—Yes, I wish to state that Mr. Hampson is alleged to have stated before the Committee that treating was confined to the Liberal party only; that is decidedly untrue; the fact is, that in the last Parliamentary election I was, and am now, serving my mayoralty. This is now the second year of my mayoralty, having been re-elected by men of all shades of very strong political feeling in the town, but I am what is called a non-political mayor; while I am mayor I abstain from meddling in politics altogether, and simply attend to my duties. Speaking of the last Parliamentary election, nearly all the public-houses and beer-houses were engaged by the friends of the Conservative candidate as committee-rooms. I believe the Liberals had only two public-houses as committee-rooms, and to guard against misapprehension I can state them to be the "Ashton Hotel" and the "Buck and Hawthorne." During the polling-day a band of roughs, wearing blue favours, made an attack on the "Buck and Hawthorne" in particular, and they twice essayed to sack the "Ashton Hotel," which is in the market-place, near the town-hall, and which I had to defend by a large police force. The pain and suffering which I had mentally undergone during the unhappy periods of the riots was very great, and I have great pleasure in noticing the kind assistance which I received on that occasion from Mr. Gathorne Hardy, the then Secretary of State, and the kind advice I received I beg to acknowledge now, as I see that gentleman present; but that made me particularly anxious that I should never have any recurrence of those things, and that everything in my power should be done as mayor to preserve the town in a good condition, free from riot. The town during the day of the polling was in an excited state, and I believe we only escaped serious rioting, owing to the success of the popular candidate; that is to say, the gentleman who now represents the borough, Mr. Thomas Walton Mellor; he was decidedly the popular candidate. The streets were filled with crowds of men and lads wearing blue favours, many of them forward in liquor. We were so much alarmed at the state of feeling on the part of the ultra-Protestant party, what you may call (I wish to guard against misapprehension) the Murphyite section, that 500 special constables were sworn in, and we succeeded in obtaining with great difficulty 100 men from the county police, and at my request the commander of the district sent us a troop of cavalry from Manchester, in addition to the infantry in the barracks. I believe the friends of the popular candidate were so elated at the result of the election in their favour that all the appearances that had created alarm happily died away. I am a member of every committee of the corporation, and I have personally impressed upon the leading officers of the corporation not to interfere with any of the servants in our employ; in consequence of representations made to me by members of the Conservative party, a committee was appointed, but only one solitary case came before the committee for investigation in the sanitary department, with reference to a charge that had been made of one of our servants having been dismissed for having voted. We went into it most carefully; there are Conservatives on every one of the committees, and in this case we were particularly anxious to see if there was any foundation for the statement; but I am happy to say that the result convinced all the other members of the committee, so that there was no division upon it, that it was for insubordination only to his superior officer that the man was discharged; I have no doubt about it.

3520. It was stated that the whole of the town council was filled by the Liberal party; is that the fact?—No, the parties are evenly balanced in respect of councillors; there are 12 Liberal councillors and 12 Conservative councillors, but there are eight aldermen, and they are all Liberals. I will give the Committee most reliable information, for I have no party bias in the affair.

3521. Mr. Locke.] The aldermen are elected by the town council, are they not?—Yes, by the members of the council. Mr. Hampson is also alleged to have said that the men employed by the corporation were threatened, and that if they did not vote as they were desired they were discharged. I am happy to say that, as far as I can speak to it during my mayoralty, I believe that to be without foundation. I have given the Committee one case in particular where there was a distinct charge made, and proved to be unfounded. I will now advert to our municipal elections. I may say that I was elected to the town council in 1859, and this will be my tenth year in connection with the town council, and sixth year as an alderman. Our municipal elections in former years were marked by violence and drunkenness to a serious extent. I am going to give the facts. I would rather give the Committee facts, and let them draw their own inferences.

3522–23. Chairman.] What do you mean by former years?—Whenever there is what I call a threatened contest in a ward, and the parties are going to fight the various wards, say two out of four of the wards, where the parties are very evenly balanced, or somewhat nearly balanced, then there is a great deal of drunkenness; the beer-houses and public-houses are engaged and taken up, and the result is that, for five or six weeks in advance of the election, there is considerable treating and drinking going on, and it is very painful to any person who wishes to see society improved. In the Market Ward, containing 900 voters, I was a candidate for re-election in 1862. I was then defeated through the Conservatives having started two publicans against me and another gentleman, and having secured the greater part of the public-houses and beer-houses; large sums were paid on that occasion to innkeepers and beersellers, for treating, in order to defeat me. I personally informed my committee that I would not sanction any drink being supplied, and that sooner than do so I would lose my seat.

3524. Chairman.] You were stating that you had reason to know that large sums were spent on the Conservative side at the municipal election at Ashton?—I have reason to know it.

3526. With regard to those returns which were delivered to you as returning officer, have you any means of knowing whether they accurately represent the sums which were spent by each party?—I have no means of information other than what those accounts furnish, and the invoices that are also handed in to me to be checked by the town clerk; but there is a possibility that the friends of the candidates might make on their behalf expenditure which we can have no official information of whatever; the only thing that I noticed remarkably, and I allude to it again, was the fact that during the polling day, as I said, there was a great deal of inebriation on the part of the youths and some grown-up men. Where that drink had been obtained I cannot say, but I have a strong suspicion that "hire of rooms" is a colourable entry; where you see a large sum like that it could not be for hire of rooms alone.

3528. What is the gross amount of the expenses of those two candidates?—The Liberal candidate, Mr. Milner Gibson's expenses, were 331 l. 12 s. 7 d., and Mr. Mellor's, the Conservative candidate, were 584 l. 11 s. 8 d. That is the official return to me as mayor.

3529. Mr. Locke.] You say that the hire of Conservative rooms was 172 l. 12 s. 2 d.; what rooms do you speak of?—Public-houses, with the exception of a few public rooms that they took, but I am unable to distinguish them; they were principally public-houses and beer-houses, with the words "Committee Room" on them.

3530. Were any of them really committee rooms?—They were not really committee rooms in the strict sense of the term.

3531. There were committees held in them, were there not?—Occasionally a few working men met there; supposing there was a Working Men's Conservative Association, as there are now in all the towns in Lancashire, a number of the operatives might meet there as members of that association.

3532. Were there canvassers in the different parishes?—There would be some leading houses where they would be, but all of those were not committee rooms in the strict sense of the term.

3533. But I want to know how many were and how many were not?—The Church Institute and two or three Church of England schools were used as committee rooms, but the great bulk of this charge for the hire of rooms was for public-houses and beer-houses.

3534. You give us the Church Institute and those those places which are unexceptionable; can you give us the exceptionable?—I have singled out 29 that I could call committee-rooms in public-houses, but I have not completed the list. There was a much larger number.

3535. How many electors are there in Ashton?—There were upwards of 800 voters previous to the passing of the Representation of the People Act, and I think there are now 5,000 odd.

3536. How many parishes are there?—There are the parishes of St. Michael's, St. Peter's, Christ Church, and then the village of Hurst, which contains two churches, which Mr. Oldham Whittaker erected.

3537. I suppose there would be a committee-room in each parish?—Yes; several committee-rooms. In the Market Ward alone there were 900 municipal electors, and that is a very large place.

3538. How many committee-rooms did they require there?—In the Market Ward they would not require a number exceeding two; not fairly so, but supposing they had four, that would be a liberal allowance.

3539. But you cannot say out of those committee-rooms how many real committee-rooms there were, as probably some were houses merely with bills put upon them?—A bill with "Mr. So-and-so's Committee-room" upon it.

3540. Had all those public-houses a notice put upon them that they were committee-rooms?—Yes, every one of them.

3541. Was it merely the name of the candidate?—There were the name of the candidate and the committee-room in all, and in some it was a little more than that, "Vote for So-and-so"; but, certainly, there were the words committee-room.

3542. You say that Mr. Milner Gibson only spent 33 l. 8 s. 9 d. upon hire of rooms?—Yes; the "Ashton Hotel" and the "Buck and Hawthorne" were engaged by his friends.

3543. Did he have only those two?—I think I may correctly say, without fear of contradiction, that Mr. Milner Gibson had not in the whole, including beer-houses, in my judgment, more than four public-houses; but my belief is, that there were only two, and, perhaps, two beer-houses.

3544. What was the majority over Mr. Milner Gibson?—The majority over Mr. Milner Gibson was 200 odd. Dod's book will give that.

3545. How many polled altogether?—There were 4,000 odd polled out of 5,000 odd; they ran very close indeed; I never saw such a very great struggle before.

3546. That was a very large poll indeed?—A very great poll.

3547. Mr. Cross.] I think I heard you say that you have been in the council 10 years?—Yes.

3548. Then you remember the municipal elections before my Act came into operation?—I do.

3550. Do you find many what are called fictitious nominations under that Act?—No, very few. In our borough I know of no case.

3551. Do you think that that Act has caused a diminution in bribery and treating?—I cannot say that; you have all the facts. I have placed the facts before the Committee, and you must draw your own inference from them.

3552. Has it stopped personation?—No, it has not; there is very great difficulty in checking that, because both parties are not sincere in striving to put it down, and punishing the persons who personate; as soon as the election is over, whether it is the manly principle of Englishmee to forgive and forget I do not know, but they dn not wish to prosecute them before the magistrates. There is the greatest reluctance on both sides to do it.

3553. Whatever may be the feeling against their opponents at the time, when the election is over they shake hands?—When the election is over, and party spirit has somewhat abated, there is not a disposition to prosecute. In case of a prosecution there would be a disposition by the respective parties to influence the determination of the magistrates by appealing to their political sympathies, and this cannot be obviated unless you invest a person with authority which will over-ride local influence; because the magistrates are appointed in batches; if there are 12 Liberals there are 12 Conservatives, and there is a constant struggle as each party comes in, so that when anything of these matters comes up it assumes a political aspect, and you may think that justice will weep under such circumstances, because we have not what is an advantage in other large towns, namely, a stipendiary magistrate; therefore we have no head, the mayor is the head for the time being, but it is pain and grief to him if he sees political feeling brought on the seat of justice.

3554. Mr. Whitbread.] You assert that nobody is ready to put the law into operation after the election is over; is there any provision in the law which would enable a defeated candidate in a municipal election to obtain the seat if he could prove corruption against his opponent?—I should not like in an assemblage of gentlemen who are much more competent to express an opinion than I am, and more fully acquainted with the law, to enter on any subject which is much better stated in the statute book than taking it from my lips; I would rather avoid entering upon this matter.

3556. Do you think that if such a provision existed, the defeated candidate would then come forward or his party, and endeavour to prove corrupt practices against his opponent?—I think it is obvious that he would.

3557. He would not forgive and forget if he could get the seat?—No, not while the political excitement is on and the blood is up; they are not slow to take advantage of a matter of that kind.

3558. Referring to that return about the public-public-houses that were engaged on the Conservative side, does that return give you any account of the number of days for which those committee-rooms were engaged in each particular house?—No; only in a few cases.

27 April 1869.

3559. Will you read some of the items?—William Burgess, of the "George and Dragon," 3*l.* 12*s.* 6*d.*; there were one or two that I looked at, and the invoices that were also handed in by Mr. Evans, the agent of Mr. Mellor, to compare with those returns to see if they were genuine, and I made a remark to the town clerk upon the subject, that there was an amount charged in one bill of 12*s.* 6*d.* a day for a committee-room, which struck me as being a very colourable item.

3560. In what sort of house would that be?—A public-house.

3561. A public-house rated at how much?—An ordinary public-house, a house rented at about, say, 50*l.* a year; it is an unreasonable sum.

3562. You think that that would be an unreasonable amount to pay for the use of a room?—Any man I think reviewing it would be certain that it was a colourable item. I cannot arrive at any other conviction; it is my solemn conviction. It is only another mode of manipulating money.

3563. You think that the room was not really worth anything like 12*s.* 6*d.* a day?—Nothing like it; the fact is I can hire the best room in an hotel for a meeting professionally for an hour for 5*s.*

3564. Can you hire for 5*s.* such a room as that which was charged 12*s.* 6*d.* for?—Yes, one of the best rooms in an hotel in our neighbourhood.

3565. What could you hire this room for which was charged 12*s.* 6*d.* a day?—In my judgment I should say that they would be glad to receive 3*s.* 6*d.*, and thank me.

3566. Are the items taken all through as colourable as that?—It is a strong impression in my mind that the great bulk of those items are somewhat colourable, with the exception of the large public rooms, such as public schools; my remark applies to all except those; of course I have been very glad during the late election to see the taking of schools; as returning officer I engaged church and chapel school-rooms for polling booths.

3567. Mr. Staveley Hill.] Referring to Mr. Cross's Act, and the proposal that there should be a power to the person who was defeated by bribery to claim the seat, do you think that a scrutiny would be possible in municipal matters?—Yes, and I think that there should be one single independent authority to conduct such inquiry.

3568. Do you think that a scrutiny would be possible?—I do think so.

3569. At what expense would a scrutiny be conducted where a candidate had won by about 50 votes?—It would be considerable, it would depend upon the length of sitting.

3570. It would be a pretty long affair, would it not?—It would be a long affair, no doubt.

3571. Do you think that under those circumstances a scrutiny would often be resorted to?—Where there was a strong feeling it would.

3572. Mr. Leatham.] There were distinct charges of coercion made against individuals at Ashton by the previous witnesses; has your attention been drawn to them?—Yes, my attention has been drawn to them.

3573. Are you in a position to disprove them?—Certainly not.

3574. Do you think that the intimidation was confined to one party only?—I think it would be difficult for me to afford any correct answer to that, because I do not know what is going on in the various mills and manufactories where a large number of people are employed; they are managed by servants to a great extent, managers and over-lookers, and whether they are the acts of the masters, or not, one cannot say.

3575. Do you think that the influence of the corporation has been improperly employed at the elections?—Certainly not; I have told the Committee that I specially gave injunctions as mayor to the leading servants of the corporation.

3576. Mr. Villiers.] You admit, do you not, that politics enter into every election at Ashton?—To a great extent.

3577. And those practices are known to both sides, as you have been describing?—They are known; I presume that you are alluding to the municipal elections, as to which I asserted that in past years there were very violent contests.

3578. Is there less difference of opinion now?—Not at all; the feeling is more intense, if anything.

3579. The practices that took place in former years are exaggerated now, are they?—There is greater intensity of feeling. Allow me to correct myself lest misapprehension should arise; we have had no recent political contest municipally in the wards; each party have sent their own candidates unchallenged under Mr. Cross's Act by nomination.

3580. There are two parties in Ashton?—Yes.

3581. And there are violent differences of opinion?—Yes.

3582. Those irregular practices at the time of the election may have been, and possibly are, practised by both sides?—I think so.

3583. And when the elections are over, neither party takes notice of what has occurred?—They have not taken any legal proceedings, but they have been threatened; as to personations, proceedings have been threatened against parties for personating, but they have not been persevered in.

3584. But no proceedings have been encouraged by people of the better class?—Certainly not.

3585. The magistrates are partizans, you say?—I should be very sorry to make any reflection upon the body of which I am the head.

3586. I do not use the word in a bad sense, but I understood you to say that according to the party that prevailed at any time, so was the colour of the magistrates; that when one party come in they appoint one set of magistrates, and when the other party come in they appoint another set, who are their political friends?—That is true; you will be quite aware of that.

3587. You remarked upon the difference between your town and other towns, of not having a stipendiary magistrate?—I did.

3588. Do you believe that if there was a stipendiary magistrate, politics would not interfere with the discharge of his duties?—I do believe so.

3589. And that would be an improvement, you think?—It would be a decided improvement if a number of boroughs were grouped together, to employ a talented gentleman of good standing at the bar.

3590. And he would be independent?—Yes, he would be independent.

3591. What is the proportion of the two parties on the bench; how many Liberals, and how many Conservatives?—I think we have about 24 borough magistrates at present, or 23 at least, and the majority are Liberals, but that was not so a short time ago.

3592. What is the population of the municipal borough?—Thirty-five thousand at the least.

3593. Then you have about as many magistrates as you want, have you not?—Quite enough in my judgment; I do not know what other gentlemen may think, but we have not seats for them all on the bench now.

3594. Do they generally all meet?—No; we have rotas, about five gentlemen in four distinct sets, or batches of magistrates.

3595. Are there three Liberals and two Conservatives in each batch?—There is a majority of Liberals in some batches.

3596. It is so arranged, is it?—I think it is only in fairness that I ought to dovetail into that this remark. We must take into account that once a year all the magistrates are summoned together, by the direction of the mayor through the town clerk, requiring them to meet, and they have to appoint what magistrates will sit on certain days. Then, if the larger number should be of one opinion, or one party is in a majority that day, of course they can appoint the rota in their own way.

3597. So that the general result is, that there are about three Liberals to two Conservatives?—You will understand that we so arrange this rota (and it is only just that you should take that into account) that every magistrate, whatever his opinions may be, shall be upon those rotas; I only want to show that in fairness, in attempting to constitute the bench aright, every magistrate is fairly consulted and summoned; but there are some who, although on the bench, will not act at all or attend.

3598. Have you ever heard magistrates, whether Liberal or Conservatives, complain of the proceedings that take place at those elections?—Complaints have been made of personation, and very strong resolves are made to punish in the future.

3599. But they have never taken any step to prevent them?—They have not, except it may be in one or two little paltry proceedings which were never carried out properly.

3600. Do you think it would be satisfactory to the town if the law were made more stringent, and there were the means of enforcing the law which exists against those illegal practices?—It would if there was an independent authority to execute it.

3601. Do you think that that would be satisfactory to the town?—I think it would.

3602. Do you think that they are tired of those illegal proceedings?—I do think so.

3603. You spoke of certain rooms as to which you thought the hiring of them for committees was merely colourable. What was the real purpose of hiring those committee-rooms; was it to conciliate the owners, or for the purpose of giving drink?—I think it was to conciliate the owners.

3604. Do you know what was paid for any rooms that were not at public-houses?—£ 1., a very reasonable amount, was paid to the North End school; the advantage of that would be that it would go to help the managers to bear the expenses in carrying on that school; that was a wise payment, and I would that they had all been held in schools where there was no drink.

3605. It was 12 s. 6 d. at the public-house, and 1 l. at the school?—I do not say that in every instance; all the public-houses were charged at that uniform tariff of 12 s. 6 d., but I saw a bill which had that amount of 12 s. 6 d. charged per day, and I considered it too high. The 1 l. for the school was for the whole election.

3607. Have you any doubt that something was paid for it?—Considering that there is a large body of gentlemen that subscribe to the rooms, it may have been comprised in their ordinary subscription; for instance, there is a Conservative Association held there, very powerfully supported, and they have had some legacies left them, so that they may not have charged for it.

3609. Can you tell us what he paid for any committee-room at a public-house?—There appears to be one here; I think it is not a public-house, but it is a very respectable beerhouse, one of the better class, for which he paid 1 l. 10 s.

3610. That was for the election, was it?—It must be for that, because the account is for that purpose; it would not be for a day, it would be for several weeks, for the whole election.

3611. Sir George Grey.] Is it your opinion that the appointment of a stipendiary magistrate at Ashton is essential to the due enforcement of the law against bribery and corruption at the municipal elections?—Decidedly so, if the law is to be carried into effect.

3612. Has it ever been proposed in the town council that such an officer should be appointed?—It has not.

3613. Are you aware that the town council have the power of memorialising the Secretary of State to appoint such an officer if they assign him a sufficient salary?—I have some idea of that kind, but I have not turned my attention to it, because I know that if there was an attempt made it would not be favourably received.

3614. Do you mean that during your 10 years in the council neither you nor any other councillor have ever proposed the appointment of a stipendiary magistrate?—No; I would not like to propose a thing if I did not see that I had a chance of carrying it.

3615. Why do you think that there is no chance of carrying it; is it that the magistrates would be indisposed to surrender their powers?—They would be very jealous of parting with their authority and power.

3616. Mr. Cross.] If a stipendiary magistrate were appointed, would not the same indisposition among the parties to prosecute still prevent bribery being proceeded against?—I now speak of 29 years of practical experience as a lawyer, of the working of the system in the City of Manchester, and all places where stipendiary magistrates are appointed, and I always find the laws more fairly carried out, and that they are more free from political bias.

Mr. H. T. Darnton.

27 April 1869.

3617. Do not you think that there would be the same indisposition to prosecute for bribery, whether it was a stipendiary magistrate or an ordinary magistrate?—I think not. I am inclined to think that by the influence of gentlemen of the bar, being magistrates, we should have the law better carried out.

3618. Who would be inclined, do you think, to carry out the law and to prosecute?—You must have a public prosecutor as well as a stipendiary magistrate; the one without the other would be useless, except that the fact of his being a talented lawyer would be a decided advantage to the bench.

3619. Mr. Hunt.] Is it your experience that the appointment of a stipendiary magistrate in any borough has been followed by a diminution of bribery at the municipal elections?—My attention has not been called to that subject, and I will not hazard an opinion.

3620. Mr. Raikes.] I think you said that the influence of the corporation is not improperly employed in influencing voters at present?—At present certainly not; and I am in the second year of my mayoralty.

3621. You are speaking merely from your own experience?—Yes; if I found anything of the kind I would denounce it.

3622. Have you never heard that some years ago, at the time of the cotton famine, when there were operatives employed upon public works, the influence of the corporation was brought to bear upon the operatives so employed?—It was alleged, but not proved.

3623. It was a matter that was talked about at that time?—Yes; you can make a charge, but it is another thing to substantiate it.

3624. Mr. Villiers.] It was not substantiated?—It was not.

3625. Sir George Grey.] I think you said that one case was investigated by a mixed committee of Conservatives and Liberals, and that that committee unanimously determined that the charge was without foundation, and that the dismissal of the man was for insubordination?—Yes, for insubordination only, and that it was not attributable to politics.

Mr. Henry Davies, called in; and Examined.

Mr. H. Davies.

3626. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] What is your profession?—I am a Publisher, and keep a library in Cheltenham, and conduct one of the local journals.

3627. What is the population of Cheltenham?—The population at the last census was 39,000 and some odd; we estimate it now at somewhere about 45,000.

3628. Is that the population which is subject to local government, which you have come to tell us about?—Yes.

3629. Cheltenham is, I believe, under the jurisdiction of the county magistrates, and subject to county rates?—It is.

3630. But it is locally governed, is it not, by what are called improvement commissioners?—Yes.

3631. Will you state to the Committee the number of those commissioners, and how they are appointed?—They are 30 in number. They were originally named in the Act of Parliament, and 10 go out every year, so that we have an election, unfortunately, every year, for 10 local commissioners.

3632. What was the date of that Act?—One thousand eight hundred and fifty-two.

3633. Will you state to the Committee the principal provisions of that Act, with reference to the local government of Cheltenham?—The Commissioners are, properly speaking, a sanitary board, and they administer all their functions, with reference to that particular object; but they take cognisance of all matters connected with the local government, except those matters which go before the magistrates, which are criminal cases and cases outside their jurisdiction. They regulate the town, they pave it, they light it, and they do a great variety of matters for which they are appointed in the Act; they purchased the cemetery, they make sewerage works, they pull down houses when they like, and they have power to put up new ones; but they have not exercised the latter power very often.

3634. How many wards is Cheltenham divided into for the purpose of elections?—There are five municipal wards, and, of course, the same for Parliamentary purposes, except that the recent Boundary Act added a sixth ward, which may be called Leckhampton Ward, for the Parliamentary elections.

3635. But that is not within the municipal boundary?—No, it is not.

3636. You have been a member of this board for some years, have you not?—Ever since the Act was passed.

3637. Will you state the qualification for electors of those commissioners?—The qualification for electors is simply the payment of the borough rates.

3638. With what residence?—With a residence of one year; that is to say, the voter must have paid a complete year's rates.

3639. There is no qualification as to the payment of the poor rate or the county rate; that has nothing to do with it?—Nothing whatever to do with it.

3640. It is simply the payment of the rates which the commissioners administer?—Simply the payment of the borough rates; those which we take cognizance of ourselves; I should say that we base our borough rates upon the poor rate, and, therefore, all the names in the poor rate come into the borough rate, and a good many more.

3641. What is the difference between the Parliamentary electors at Cheltenham and the municipal electors; are they nearly the same body?—Almost all the Parliamentary electors are necessarily municipal electors, but, of course, the municipal electors are very much more numerous, because there is no qualification required, and we vote under Sturges Bourne's Act, under which ladies vote and the owners of property vote, as well as the occupiers of property.

3642. You stated, as I understood you, that the qualification was the payment of the borough rate?—Yes, for occupiers; but over and above that, the owners have a right to vote as well in respect to their property; so that there are two distinct qualifications, ownership and occupancy.

3643. Is there a plural vote?—There is a plurality of votes under Sturges Bourne's Act; we put on a vote for every 50 l. rating up to six under that Act, I think; so that a person who is an owner, myself, for example, can give 10 votes. I should be qualified to vote as an owner for five, and I should be qualified to vote as an occupier for five probably, or for six, if it so chanced.

3644. Could one man give 12 votes?—One man could give 12 votes; he could give six as owner, and six as occupier, if he were sufficiently qualified under Sturges Bourne's Act.

3645. What ward do you represent?—I live in the Middle Ward, and have represented it ever since the commission was established.

3646. Is there much difference in the composition of the constituency of each of the wards?—Yes, a great deal; the ward in which I live is called a Conservative ward, and we generally return Conservative commissioners.

3647. I mean is one part of the town a very much richer description of property than the other?—Yes, there is a very great difference.

3648. With respect to the ward which you sit for, of what nature is the property in that ward?—It is a very high rated ward, because the principal houses of business are in the ward, and they are rated very high; there are also a great number of private gentlemen's houses in it.

3649. From what you said just now, I conclude that there is a strong political feeling in the elections of these town commissioners?—Very strong.

3650. Has that been the case ever since the Act of 1852 was passed?—Ever since the Act passed, I think, to the best of my recollection, the feeling has existed, but it has increased in intensity as time has worn on, and lately we have become, I am sorry to say, much worse than we used to be.

3651. Do you think that there has been any corruption of any kind in the elections for commissioners in Cheltenham?—Of late years there has been a great deal of corruption on a small scale; that is to say, the lower class of voters in some of the wards, in two or three wards especially, have, within the last six or seven years more particularly, been bribed by the gift of beer tickets, to go and give their vote for any particular candidate.

3652. Has that been generally done, or only by candidates who were brewers, and publicans?—It has been generally done; when I say generally done, I mean the agents of the different candidates, or their friends, give those tickets to a certain class of voters, but, of course, you may suppose they are always what one may call the most degraded class.

3655. Has there been any personation in those elections?—Yes, there has been to a considerable extent; I believe more particularly with reference to absent owners. The owners of property having votes, many of them of course live away from the town and are not known, and the parties who work those elections very often are aware of that, and they get persons to represent them, that is to say, they send parties up to personate them.

3657. Has there been any instance of intimidation?—In two of the wards there is always mob intimidation.

3658. Will you state which wards you refer to?—In the East and North Wards there is always a certain amount. There is such a throng of people, and such very rude behaviour attending the polling places there, that the better class of people are deterred from going down to the poll in the East and North Wards; that is particularly the case.

3659. You stated, did you not, that ladies have a vote?—Yes; but ladies voting in either of those wards is a very difficult thing to do. There are a very great number of women vote in those wards; but I should hardly call them ladies.

3660. What is the mode of voting in those elections?—The mode of voting is by a voting paper, which is filled up previously with the names of the candidates, and then the voter signs it, and hands it in to the presiding officer, and his vote becomes recorded; those voting papers are preserved, and subsequently very often they are scrutinised.

3661. Must the paper be handed in personally?—It must be handed in personally.

3662. What are the class of people who generally stand as candidates for those commissionerships?—Of late years they have been wholly engaged in trade; not quite without exception, but nearly without exception. I think there are two independent gentlemen at present in the commission, and there are two or three professional gentlemen, but all the rest are composed of tradesmen. Originally they were almost all gentlemen, in the first Act of Parliament, or persons possessing a considerable social standing in the town.

3663. Cheltenham is a town very largely composed of resident gentry, is it not?—It is very largely so.

3664. To what cause do you attribute the want of willingness on the part of the gentry to interest themselves in those matters?—In the municipal elections, I think, it proceeds from the great annoyance to which they are frequently exposed by going to the poll, in consequence of the crowds which sometimes beset those places; and when they go even in their carriages they cannot get there; in the two wards particularly which I speak of they cannot get near enough.

3665. You are now referring to the voting at the elections?—Yes.

3666. My question had reference to their acting as commissioners; from whence does their unwillingness arise?—It arises from this cause: of late years it has been necessary, in order to secure a seat for a commissioner, that he should canvass, and that is very repugnant to the feeling of the better class of independent gentry who live amongst us; they will not consent to undergo the annoyance of canvassing for such a very barren honour. I have known many gentlemen say that they would be quite willing to serve, but the man that canvasses must necessarily win, and they will not, and cannot, undertake to canvass.

Mr. H. Davies.

27 April 1869.

3667. Do you think that the corrupt expenditure of which you have spoken has had anything to do with those gentlemen not standing for commissionerships?—No, I do not think it has, because this corrupt expenditure to which I have adverted has arisen almost since the gentry disappeared from amongst us. I do not think that if the gentlemen had remained commissioners that corrupt expenditure would ever have taken place.

3668. I presume the elections for commissionerships partaking strongly of a political nature, the commissioners themselves also have political feelings?—Yes, very much so; that has been the case, unfortunately, for a long time.

3670. What was the appointment to which you allude; do you mean the officers that you had appointed to act as returning officers in the elections?—The chairman, for the time being, appoints a presiding officer for each polling booth in each ward, and appoints always some one of the commissioners, and if the chairman is a Liberal he generally appoints a Liberal presiding officer.

3671. What was the charge against those gentlemen who were thus appointed?—That they had received votes which were improper, when they were tendered upon their own side in politics, and rejected votes upon the other side under similar circumstances.

3672. Will you state what the report of the committee was, that inquired into this matter?—It was a very voluminous report, but practically, it amounted to a vote of censure upon both of them.

3673. It was made public, I believe?—The reports were not in the papers, but the substance of them was stated in the papers; the conclusion of the committee, with reference to the inquiry in the South Ward, is this; they say, "The committee cannot avoid saying that the conduct of the presiding officer in rejecting votes to so large an extent, was calculated to have produced a different result, and is much to be blamed." That different result being this: the successful candidate demanded a committee of inquiry into the conduct of the presiding officer, and though his majority was so large that it became impossible for any amount almost of bias to beat down that majority, still the bias was clearly proved I think to the committee. And in the case of the East Ward, the conclusion come to was this: "That after allowing their full weight for all these circumstances (those are a variety of extenuating circumstances which the committee themselves thought might be urged), the committee are forced to the conclusion that they do not cover the facts above reported, and that such facts cannot be set down to the score of mere accident." Those were the conclusions, and those reports were ordered to be inserted upon the minutes of the commissioners.

3674. I understand that the majority of those committees were politically favourable to the gentleman charged?—Yes; there were four of the same political feeling as the officers charged, and three different.

3676. What was the special object of so much extra effort at that time; do you know of any?—There was a great fight for the clerkship; the clerk that we had then was in a very precarious state of health; he was expected not to live from month to month, and as the office was worth more than 500 l. a year, it became worth the while of certain parties to be exceedingly desirous of getting into the board, and they did get there.

3677. Do you think there was more money spent than usual on that occasion on account of this appointment being probably soon to take place?—I am sure of it.

3678. In fact, it was known that the election would depend upon the political opinions of the commissioners?—Yes, decidedly.

3679. With reference to the commissioners' elections last autumn, do you think those were in any way connected with the following Parliamentary election?—I have no doubt they were.

3680. Did any corrupt practices take place at the commissioners' elections?—I am not myself aware of any, unless it was corruption to use one agency for the purposes of another.

3681. I am referring to the elections in the autumn of 1868?—I have no doubt that the municipal municipal elections in 1868 were made instrumental for Parliamentary purposes by the employment of people nominally for municipal purposes, but really to procure their votes for the then on-coming Parliamentary contest; that, I believe, existed to some extent in more than one ward.

3683. It would still be necessary for some one to give information to the public prosecutor, would it not?—Yes; but there would be less difficulty in that, I think, than in becoming a public prosecutor, and incurring the expenses of law proceedings. I know a little of what fighting a public battle of that kind is, from having in the year of the North Ward riots taken it upon me to raise a sum of money to pay the law expenses, and they came to a very good round sum before they were done with.

3684. Have you any other suggestion to offer for the improvement of the electoral body in those commissioners' elections?—I do not know that I could offer any suggestions that would be worth the Committee's attending to; I should very much like the tumult that we have had occur in some way prevented; it has even gone so far that, in the North Ward, roughs have been hired, and there has been a great deal of difficulty there, which I think ought not to be in a town like ours, and remedies ought to be provided.

3685. Has that occurred in the municipal elections?—Yes, in the municipal elections; we have not had that terrorism in the Parliamentary elections. But I am speaking now of the municipal elections; our process ought to be simplified in that as well as in the Parliamentary elections.

3686. You think it would be well that the franchise for the election of commissioners should be assimilated to the Parliamentary franchise?—I do; my own impression is, and I have thought about it some little, that if it were possible to make the same register which is adopted for Parliamentary purposes become the register for municipal purposes, a very large expense would be saved and a great deal of difficulty and trouble got over.

3687. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean that you would strike off all the owners of property and the women?—What I should like to see done would be this: that since the Parliamentary constituency has been so much enlarged as it has been, there is now no reason whatever why the same constituency should not be also the municipal constituency, and vote from the same register.

3688. Would not the result of that be to strike off all the owners of property and the women?—That would be the effect of it; but I believe we should then have no difficulty from another source. We have great annoyance and difficulty arising from what I have not mentioned to the Committee; after those elections have taken place where there has been a hard fight there comes what is called a scrutiny, and all those papers which are handed in are scrutinised by the candidates and certain commissioners appointed, and they go through all those voting papers and compare them with the rate book, and they strike off a great number who are paupers and some who have parted with their property; that is a very onerous and a very troublesome process to be gone through, with very little result arriving different from that which took place previous to the scrutiny. Now, the title of the Parliamentary register is so good that no vote could be challenged under it, and I think if the municipal constituency, now that the Parliamentary constituency is made so large, were made to be the same, you would have better local government, less tumult, and, unquestionably, a great deal less expense. That is my own impression of it after a good deal of experience in these matters.

3689. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Would that be the feeling amongst the ladies and owners of property in Cheltenham?—I think the ladies would rejoice in being removed from the annual annoyance of solicitation for their votes.

3690. Do you think that the owners of property would like to be deprived of the advantage of the influence of their votes?—They might not like it, but I could guard to some extent against that by giving in the municipal elections the property qualification where the voters vote; that is to say, letting them vote under Sturges Bourne's Act; and then property, which is subject to the heaviest portion of taxation in boroughs, would have its weight. If the Parliamentary register were used for municipal purposes, and the votes were taken under Sturges Bourne's Act, I believe all the owners of property would feel that they were very fairly treated; they would rejoice in having a better constituency, and their property would be more adequately represented; that is my own impression.

3692. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] By getting rid of those who are non-residents, you would also get rid of a good deal of personation, would you not?—I should eliminate that cause of personation at the borough elections, because personation mostly takes place from people who are supposed supposed to be unknown. Voters voting in the district in which they live are tolerably well known, and therefore it would require a little bit of courage in a man to go up and personate his neighbour, but where a voter, who is the owner of property, lives 100 miles off, and does not come to the place perhaps above once or twice a year, and then only to receive his rents, it is a very safe card to say, "I am John Smith or John Brown."

Mr. H. Davies.

27 April 1869.

3693. By a still further division of the polling districts you might almost ensure, might you not, that every voter should be personally known?—Yes, that would certainly be the case; I would place such officers in the polling booths that I do not think there would be half-a-dozen men in the ward that were not known.

3694. Would you suggest any alteration in the nominations for the commissioners' elections?—I would suggest a very material one, for at present the mode of election with us is a very objectionable one. A person may be nominated, and go to the poll on the morning of the election, and no previous intimation whatever may have been given that he is a candidate. Where two parties are tolerably certain from their local influence to carry the election, it is a very common practice with us for the other party to put up two men on the morning of the poll, or the night before, for the purpose merely of annoyance, and expense to their opponents, and to keep the poll open; because, the poll closes if there is not a vote given within an hour. I know one remarkable instance some years ago, when two of the most popular and best commissioners that we ever had, who were sure of their re-election in the West Ward, went to the poll with the certainty of being returned, and the poll was kept open by one vote an hour up to three o'clock, and at three o'clock two other men were nominated without their consent, and they came in by a very large majority. There is one remark which I wish to make with regard to what I read in the paper. The first witness that was examined before the Committee complained of the same annoyance that I have just now indicated to the Committee. I would only wish to suggest that there should be in all municipal elections a pre-nomination, and a certain number of days given, by which, as in the case of boards of guardians, all the candidates must be nominated; there is no pre-nomination required with us.

3695. You have had some experience in the Parliamentary elections at Cheltenham, have you not?—Yes, I have had some.

3696. Are you pretty well acquainted with the expenses that are incurred at the Parliamentary elections?—Yes, I know some little about them, and they are very heavy; I think they ought to be economised by a different process; I do not think you will economise them under the existing processes.

3697. Has the registration at Cheltenham been a source of very great expense?—It is a source of annual expense; the considerable sum of money which has to be defrayed every year adds very much to the expense of a candidate when he comes to the election, because it becomes a charge to him and his friends year after year, and it is, in fact, part and parcel of the election expenses whether defrayed by the candidate or by his friends; I should wish the registration to be very much simplified, which I think could be done without much difficulty, and I am quite sure with great advantage to the constituencies and to the candidates.

3699. You state that open nomination, in your opinion, occasions considerable expense and corruption; in what way do you think it produces that effect?—The excitement which is produced at a nomination is such that, for the rest of the day, all those who take an active part in the election do nothing else but endeavour to make good the work of the morrow, and they make it in a great variety of ways. I believe that if there be bribery in many towns, it is done upon the eve of the polling-day, after the excitement of the public nomination. Men commit very indiscreet acts in their desire to serve their party, without either the knowledge of the candidate or authority from the agent, and they compromise the party in whom they feel an interest. If the nomination were done away with, I believe all that evil would be done away with also, and, instead of the public-houses being filled, as they are now, with people eating and drinking almost all night long on the eve of the polling day, they would be comparatively quiet. Indeed, it has been a doubt in my mind whether, on the eve of the polling day, all public-houses ought not to be closed at a certain hour, because I believe that the principal part of what is called illegal proceedings, from my little experience, takes place after the nomination, when the parties are in a state of excitement, and are induced to do things which are improper, and which they would not have done had it not been for the excitement induced by the nomination.

3700. Has inconvenience ever occurred at Cheltenham by candidates being nominated at the last moment at a Parliamentary election?——Great inconvenience would necessarily occur to the returning officer, and would destroy all his arrangements; I could mention a case in point, as an example of that. I do not now recollect what particular year it was in, but there was an election, and I think it was when Mr. Grenville Berkley came forward for our town. The writ came down at a very short notice; there were only three or four days allowed for the return to be made, and it was impossible to canvass the town, and the Conservative party then saw no chance of winning, being taken taken wholly by surprise, their only chance being that there had been no canvass. We had a gentleman ready to come forward and take this chance, and I was commissioned to go to the returning officer between 10 and 11 o'clock to inform him that the Conservatives were going to nominate a candidate. I did so, and I met him coming out of his carriage just as he had been making all his arrangements for no contest, for a walk over, and I told him that we should bring forward a candidate and go to the poll; he was, of course, very indignant with me for making such a communication, as he had made no preparations for polling booths or hustings, or anything else, but a small place in the town-hall; he was obliged, very suddenly, to recast all his arrangements and do the best he could. But that ought not to be; candidates ought to be nominated for Members of Parliament, in my opinion, a certain length of time before coming forward, they ought not to be allowed to come forward at any time they please. My impression is that no gentleman should be brought forward as a candidate unless he were announced a fortnight or a month beforehand.

3701. Do you think it is objectionable that such a short notice should be allowed, that a man should be nominated on the day of the nomination?—I do think it highly objectionable, because it exposes all the parties to surprise, it inconveniences the returning officer, and it destroys all the arrangements that may have been intended for one candidate.

3702. Sir George Grey.] What length of time do you think ought to elapse between the issue of the writ and the actual election?—I think a fortnight or a month ought to elapse.

3703. If a Member dies, or accepts office, or vacates his seat, do you think a month ought to elapse before the seat is filled up?—In such cases I do not; I think that that should be an exceptional thing, and as, under the present law, a Member who takes office might be returned as soon as possible; but I think that no gentleman ought to come forward as a candidate unless he can give a fortnight or a month's notice. It has always been a wonder to me what necessity there existed for having writs returned within three or four days.

3704. After a dissolution of Parliament, you think there ought to be a month before any election takes place?—I do; or if not a month at all events a fortnight, or some longer time than is sometimes allowed now.

3705. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] It generally happens, does it not, that there is about a month after a dissolution of Parliament?—Not from the receipt of the writ. I do not think there is that time allowed. I think that from the receipt of the writ, which is the first official notice which the constituency receives, the time allowed by the writ is, ordinarily speaking, too short.

3706. Mr. Bright.] Would you say that with the excitement of the present mode of electing that you would like to have a large town kept always in turmoil for a fortnight or a month preceding the election?—On the contrary, it is that I wish to get rid of, and in order to get rid of it I make this suggestion. Our town was, unfortunately, kept in the turmoil of an election a long time because our present Member commenced his canvass six months before the election took place, and we were agitated from the month of April to the month of November by the canvass; it is to cure this kind of thing that I make the suggestion.

3708. How could you prevent people canvassing before a certain time?—I would prohibit the candidate canvassing until some official notification was made by Parliament that there is to be an election. If Parliament, instead of three days, were to allow a fortnight or a month for the election, that would be time enough to canvass, and I would not allow public meetings to be held to agitate the town, as our town has been agitated for six months by public meetings, until an official intimation had been received by the returning officer that the constituency were expected to elect a Member of Parliament; and this could be provided for by allowing a greater length of time between the receipt of the writ by the constituency and its return. And if the candidates were then nominated, and their names were made public by the returning officer, I cannot myself see any great objection to a process of that kind.

3709. Mr. Villiers.] Would you allow canvassing at all?—I would allow that which I could not prevent.

3710. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] If you cannot prevent it altogether, how could you prevent it for a certain period?—I could prevent it through the candidate and his agents, though I could not through his friends, and I could disqualify him if he canvassed before the receipt of the writ, or if he held public meetings before the receipt of the writ, because instead of prolonging the contest in general elections I should contract it.

3711. I presume you would be of opinion that a long canvass gives opportunities for the corrupt employment of voters, and for bribery in other ways which are objectionable?—I am sure it does; I have a strong opinion that if it had not been for the length of the last canvass in our town, and the opportunities which were thereby afforded of paying the rates of certain voters, of which there were a great number paid; the issue of the election would not have been what it was.

3713. You have told us that corrupt treating prevailed extensively at the municipal elections; has that been extended to the Parliamentary elections at Cheltenham?—Not, I think, of late years; I think treating in the Parliamentary elections has somewhat diminished within late years at Cheltenham,

Mr. H. Davies.

27 April 1869.

3714. Has bribery, by the payment of money, been practised at the Parliamentary elections?—I do not think it has extensively; that it may have been by friends of the candidates, through acts of indiscretion, I think is highly probable; indeed, it always must be; but I feel persuaded that the thing has not been in any way encouraged by the parties actually interested in the elections.

3715. Has intimidation been practised to any great extent?—No; I think scarcely at all in reference to the Parliamentary elections, but as there are no large employers of labour in the town, there is not much intimidation, I think, in the Parliamentary elections exercised in Cheltenham.

3716. With regard to the municipal elections, you spoke of intimidation by crowds of people collected at the polling places?—Yes; that is a very serious evil, but that does not exist to the same extent in the Parliamentary elections, and for this reason: in the Parliamentary elections, you are enabled to separate the people by having polling booths in different parts of the town, the Act providing that not more than 500 electors shall ever poll at one booth; that of course scatters them. There has been a good deal of mobbing occasionally by roughs, but nothing, I think, to be made a matter of very serious complaint against us.

3717. Can you suggest any improvement in the mode of voting at the Parliamentary elections?—No; I know of nothing except the present mode; I can suggest none whatever. I do not think you can adopt any better system, if you put it under better regulation and restraint than the system which we have at present, of every man going up, giving his vote, and going away when he has done so; that is my own impression of it.

3718. Is there any other statement that you would wish to add to your evidence?—I do not know that I have any; with reference to the last question it just occurs to me that it may have been directed with the view of ascertaining what my feeling was with regard to the ballot; if that was the object of the question, I unhesitatingly state my opinion to be that the ballot would be a premium to bribery.

3719. In what way?—Because I feel satisfied from what I know of that class of men who are in the habit of taking bribes and being corrupted, they would be corrupted by both sides instead of one if you had the vote by ballot, and for this simple reason, that there would be no means of punishing them as there is in open voting; if a man takes a bribe when it is open voting, you can prove that he has voted, but you could not bring the thing home to him if he voted secretly by ballot.

3723. Chairman.] Are you giving that as your opinion merely, or are you speaking of facts which you are in a position to prove?—I am giving an opinion certainly founded on fact.

3724. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Founded on the fact which you have stated?—On the facts which I have stated here, which have come within my knowledge.

3725. Sir George Grey.] Was agency proved in that case, or was the Member unseated without any proof of agency?—In the case I allude to the agent happened to be one of the persons employed to go round with the candidate from house to house to show him the voters; he was a man in low life, but a man who very well knew everybody in the district in which he was, and his having been seen canvassing with the candidate made him an agent, and the candidate had to pay the penalty. That man was in secret communication all the time with the other side.

3726. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Have you known any instances of prosecutions for personation at Cheltenham?—They have never been carried home.

3727. Have they been commenced?—Yes.

3728. Did I rightly understand you to say that they were discontinued from want of funds, in consequence of the expensive nature of the proceedings?—Yes, and the apprehension of a protracted litigation and liabilities.

3729. Under Sturges Bourne's Act, property is more largely represented than in the ordinary way, is it not?—Yes, very much so.

3730. And you find still that that class of men is what you call of a very low order, notwithstanding Sturges Bourne's Act?—The lower the class of men the fewer their votes are, of course, because they are not qualified to give more than one vote.

3731. I presume in each ward there is generally a mixture of respectable inhabitants and persons of the lower class?—Yes, more or less, in all of them.

3732. Have they ever attempted to get rid of Sturges Bourne's Act, and bring themselves under the general law?—No, they have not.

3733. Mr. Raikes.] You say you think it would be a protection to the candidates if more stringent stringent measures were adopted for punishing persons who are guilty themselves of bribery personally?—Yes, I do certainly think so.

3734. You want to protect them against any such insidious proceedings as you have referred to; do you think it would also protect them, in some degree, against over-zealous friends?—No, I think you could not legislate upon a matter of that kind.

3737. You said some time ago, that you detected the presiding officers, in some of those elections for commissioners, of misconduct in refusing to take good votes and in taking bad ones. What would be the functions of the presiding officer at the election of those commissioners?—To receive the voting paper and record it in the poll-book.

3738. Is he assisted by a clerk?—He is assisted by a clerk.

3739. And he orders the clerk to enter, or not to enter, the vote?—Yes, according as he may think proper.

3740. How did you discover those cases of misconduct; what evidence had you?—We had the evidence of the voting papers which were there, and the rate-book, which determined the qualification at once.

3741. But I understand that the voting papers in some cases were rejected?—Yes.

3742. How did you find it out in those cases where the voting paper was not there?—By receiving from the parties whose votes were rejected the evidence of the fact of the voting papers which were rejected, which were produced. They brought their papers to show that those papers ought to have been polled; and if they had been polled they would have been in our possession.

3743. In a system of secret voting, supposing that voters had tendered their votes, and that persons in the position of those presiding officers had subsequently tampered with them under a political basis, you would not have been able, would you, to obtain any information of that sort?—Of course we should not.

3744. And those persons would not have known what had been done with their votes?—No.

3745. Has it occurred on more than one occasion that those presiding officers have been guilty of misconduct?—We have only had the inquiry to which I have last alluded, but that it has existed on previous occasions I think is very possible.

3746. What do you think would be the effect if, in those elections where you have voting papers, the persons did not come to the booth to tender their votes, but somebody was sent round by the returning officer to collect them at their own houses?—I think that the paper would be tampered with over night in all those districts of the town where the very poor and very illiterate classes live, and the papers would just represent the opinions of the man that was sent round to fill them up and sign them.

3747. But it would have the effect, would it not, of diminishing this intimidation and violence?—Of course there would be no polling booths in that case, and, therefore, the thing could not occur.

3748. Therefore, order would be better preserved in the town?—Yes, but the papers would be collected over night by a political partisan, and they would be sent the next morning ready filled up to be given to the collector who came round, as in the case of the elections of guardians. The voting papers for guardians, to my knowledge, are constantly tampered with by scores.

3750. But all you mean to say is that there is some care in revising the lists for Parliamentary voters, and very little for the municipal?—Yes, that is so.

3751. But is there not a revision of the municipal list?—There is a revision, undoubtedly.

3752. But you mean that it is an imperfect one?—Yes, much more so than the Parliamentary one.

3753. Do you believe that a great number of people get on that list who are disqualified?—Yes; that would not be qualified to come on to the Parliamentary register.

3754. What is your idea of the qualification to be on the Parliamentary register?—The qualification is established now by law, that a man who pays his rates should come on there, provided he has lived the necessary time, held possession long enough, and has not received pauper relief.

3755. What is the qualification for a municipal voter?—I can scarcely tell you, not being in a municipal borough.

3756. What is the qualification for a voter for the commissioners?—The qualification is the payment of the borough rate for one year, no matter how small.

3757. And no qualification of residence?—A residence of one year, the same as the Parliamentary, in point of fact, though differently dated.

3758. But it is not the payment of the poor rate?—No, not the payment of the poor rate.

3759. Is the borough rate less than the poor rate?—They are about equal in our borough, but there are a great many people who pay the borough rate who do not pay the poor rate, and who are excused by the magistrate from it.

Mr. H. Davies.

27 April 1869.

3760. What I want to ask you is, whether there is any difference between the borough qualification and the Parliamentary; you stated that a Parliamentary voter is obliged to pay the poor rate, and a municipal voter is obliged to pay the borough rate; is the borough rate higher than the poor rate?—They are about the same.

3761. Then the qualification of the two are the same now?—Yes.

3762. But there is some little more attention paid to the registration of Parliamentary voters than there is to the municipal?—Yes, very much more, I think.

3763. You would hardly expect much difference, would you, in the character of the voters, if the revision was more perfect for the municipal, because it is the same qualification, is it not?—It may be the same qualification, but it diminishes the numbers very materially; in our own borough particularly, you have a much larger constituency for the municipality, from various causes, than you have for the Parliamentary register.

3764. What is the number of voters for your municipality?—I do not know that I can tell the number of voters actually; I can tell the number who probably voted in each ward; we have in our borough 8,436 assessments; I will not say that there would be voters for all those assessments, but there would be voters for 7,000 of them.

3765. You say, do you not, that both sexes vote?—Yes.

3766. Whoever pays the rate votes?—Yes.

3767. How many voters have you on the Parliamentary register?—Our present Parliamentary register is 3,246, or with the incorporated district of Leckhampton, 3,533.

3768. Are the Parliamentary and municipal boundaries conterminous?—Yes, except that there was a district added by the late Boundary Act to the Parliamentary borough.

3769. Then the Parliamentary borough has wider boundaries than the other?—Yes, to that extent.

3770. Do we understand you to say that those municipal voters, or a large proportion of them, are corrupt, or are ready to receive payment or look for treating?—In two of the wards, the East and the North Wards, that is so to a very large extent, and in the South Ward also, I am sorry to say, owing to the character of the lower classes of the population, who have grown into the habit of expecting beer tickets for voting.

3771. Somebody gives them a beer ticket?—Yes; the candidate has one or two persons whom he employs, and he gives a beer ticket to a man directly he has voted.

3772. What class of life is he in generally?—He is, perhaps, a little above the class who take the tickets, perhaps one of themselves.

3773. To what class of life do those commissioners belong?—They are tradesmen in the town, and some professional gentlemen.

3774. Is there much difference between the morality of the candidate and that of the voter, when the one receives and the other pays?—That is a question of a very sweeping character. I should say that in some cases they are as far apart as it is possible to conceive, but in another they may very nearly approximate.

3775. If you are proposing to remedy that evil, surely you must see who are the parties to it, and you must provide a punishment for the man who pays as well as for the man who receives, must you not?—Yes.

3776. The opinion generally in Cheltenham is, that the man who pays is not guilty, is it not?—No; on the contrary, I think the opinion is that he is as guilty as the man who receives.

3777. But he does not suffer from that opinion, does he?—No, he does not, because of the defective machinery of the law as I have already stated.

3778. He is not thought the less respectable if he succeeds, is he?—No, because it has become of late years a habit there.

3779. On the part of the rich as well as the poor?—On the part of those who desire the seat and give those beer tickets.

3780. In order to get the seat they are ready to pay?—Yes.

3781. And they must have means, must they not, to do that?—Yes.

3782. And they belong to the respectable class?—Yes.

3783. And those same people, I suppose, are open to this bribery at the Parliamentary elections; they are the same class, are they not?—Yes; but there are a great number of them, as I stated just now, who cannot possibly come upon the Parliamentary register because of their condition in life.

3784. That is to say, they do not pay the borough rate?—They do not pay the borough rate; they are constantly shifting from house to house; they have no abiding place, and their habits of life are such that, from a variety of causes, they cannot come upon the Parliamentary register, but they come to vote for the commissioners.

3785. But there is no inquiry into their moral character when they are put upon the register?—No, I do not suppose there is.

3786. If a man pays the poor rate, that does not make him an honest man at once?—No, I do not suppose that that was the intention of the Act.

3787. There are a very poor class of voters that get upon the register, are there not?—Yes.

3788. Are not they rather exposed to those bribes that the rich people offer them?—They would be, no doubt; and no doubt there are some instances, as I said, in which zealous friends will offer bribes, and the necessities of the poor people induce them to accept them.

3789. Do you think that you can ever put down bribery if you make it shameful on the part of the person who offers the bribe?—I think that that will go a very far way to do it.

3790. You have not gone very far yet at Cheltenham, have you?—No, we have not.

3791. Mr. Bright.] Is there amongst the tradespeople in Cheltenham much pressure at the time of the election for their votes?—No, I think very little.

3792. Is that the case on both sides?—On both sides; I do not think it is sought to be exercised; nor do I think that if it were sought it would be of much avail amongst the respectable tradespeople of the town.

3793. But amongst very small shopkeepers do you think there is much pressure from their customers when they are about to decide for whom they will vote?—I do not think so with us; I do not not think that that is carried to any extent; each man exercises the utmost moral suasion that he can to induce such a person as you allude to to vote, but beyond that moral suasion I do not think they go. Although I could quote some instances of coercion in the course of my experience, still they are altogether of an exceptional character; I do not think that the tradesmen are at all coerced with us beyond the amount of moral suasion that I speak of.

3794. Are there many of them who do not vote at all?—Yes; there are a small proportion of them who do not vote; but only a small proportion of them.

3795. Would you suppose that that arises occasionally from the pressure of customers on both sides?—In some instances it arises from an apprehension that they might give offence to some of their customers on one side or the other.

3796. And if there be any one case of known pressure, or submission to it, does that affect the opinions of others and create apprehensions?—No; on the contrary, I think that it rather begets a recoil of feeling; that is my own experience of it. Where coercion has been exercised there has been a feeling of indignation against it, and it has rather benefited than injured the party coerced.

3798. You have expressed a rather strong opinion against the practice of nomination at the hustings; do you think that that opinion which you entertain is one shared by a great many persons of both sides in politics in your town?—I think it is. As far as conversation with them would enable me to judge, I think that they would generally be glad to get rid of the nomination proceedings as being very demoralising, generally speaking.

3800. Does that kind of intimidation prevent voters from giving their votes?—In the municipal elections it prevents a great number of the better class of people, particularly gentlemen who are timid, or who are elderly, or who are infirm, from some cause or other, and who will not go through the crowd to get up to the booth.

3801. Do you find that the female electors take much interest in the elections?—The upper classes of female electors take no interest whatever in our municipal elections; they only vote because they are solicited to vote, and know the candidates; I do not think that any of them would come to vote of their own accord; I scarcely think so, but I cannot say as to the lower orders; since those beer tickets have become the fashion, the ladies of the lower orders like to follow the fashion, and there are a great number of voters now of the lower orders of women who do vote at the municipal elections.

3802. In consideration of the beer tickets?—Yes, in consideration of the beer tickets; ladies generally are deterred from voting by the crowds around the polling booth.

3803. Has that had a demoralising effect upon the female character in your borough?—I think it has had a very demoralising effect; a woman will come up sometimes and poll half a dozen times in the day for half a dozen tickets.

3804. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] I understand that you are in favour of candidates being nominated before the issuing of the writ, but not being allowed to take any steps until the writ issues?—Yes, I am in favour of the candidate not canvassing until the writ is issued.

3805. Do you think that it would be possible to nominate a candidate a fortnight, or a month, before the election?—Yes.

3806. And then the candidate would come down to canvass?—Yes, he might.

3808. Does not it now very frequently happen that if a candidate comes forward, and upon testing the electors finds that he is not strong enough to win the election, he is succeeded by some candidate who is?—That, no doubt, occasionally occurs; it must under the existing system.

3809. Has it not happened within your own knowledge that even at the last moment a candidate has been put up who has come in at the head of the poll, far beyond any other that had been there before?—Yes, that has occurred.

3810. Do not you think that the electors are entitled to have a free choice in the election of their representatives?—Yes, decidedly; but I do not see that the freedom is destroyed by the circumstance of the candidate being nominated a fortnight before the election; the last hour comes whether it is for the nomination or whether it is for the polling.

3811. Candidates generally come forward now a certain period before the election, whereas the other instances are rare; but have you not known many instances where upon a canvass it has been ascertained that the candidates who are put forward are sometimes not any of them such as the electors will take?—That may have occurred.

3812. Would it not cripple the free choice of the electors to tie them down to the other candidates who were nominated only a fortnight before, and who had not been allowed to canvass at that time?—I cannot see that exactly.

3813. You would have those gentlemen nominated by one or more persons, by two persons probably?—Yes, by two householders certainly.

3814. That day having passed, everybody else in the borough would be precluded from nominating a candidate?—Yes; precisely as the day having having passed on the hustings, everybody else is precluded from nominating after.

Mr. H. Davies.

27 April 1869.

3815. On that particular day?—Yes; there is one day, and that must come to an end; the last day is the last day, whether it is the last day of the nomination in writing or on the hustings.

3816. Sir George Grey.] Your nomination-day is the day of the election, is it not?—If there be no poll, of course it is the day of the election.

3817. Therefore, is it not the case at present that any elector is competent to nominate a candidate up to the day fixed for the actual election?—Up to the day of the nomination.

3818. That is the day fixed for the actual election, is it not?—Yes.

3819. Is not notice given that the election will be held on a certain day?—Yes.

3820. And on that day the nomination takes place?—Yes.

3823. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Do the higher class of resident gentry of Cheltenham interest themselves in the Parliamentary elections in the borough?—Comparatively few of them; there are some few parties, or perhaps a good many of the higher classes, who interest themselves in the Parliamentary elections, although they take none in the municipal elections, or very little.

3824. Sir George Grey.] Was the constituency nearly polled out at the last Parliamentary election?—There voted 3,104 out of 3,533.

3825. It would appear from that that a very small proportion of the inhabitants of Cheltenham take but little interest in the election?—All polled within 400: when absentees and unwilling ones are counted, the constituency was nearly polled out.

3826. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] It was the season of the year when Cheltenham was full, was it not?—Yes.

3827. Mr. Bright.] Did the lodger clause in the Act of two years ago act upon the constituency of Cheltenham?—Very slightly indeed, for the simple reason that lodgers change very frequently, and that very objectionable mode prescribed by the Act, that they shall not only make their claim, but come down personally to establish it, whether it be objected to or not, made that portion of the Act almost inoperative with us. People claimed, but when they found that they had to come down and attend the revising court, whether they were objected to or not, perhaps waiting three hours there, comparatively very few came down to establish their votes. If their claims were admitted in the way they are admitted in the county elections, subject to objection, I think that a good many of them would come.

Mr. James Kirk, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Kirk.

3828. Chairman.] You are Mayor of Staleybridge, I believe?—Yes.

3829. Have you been a member of the council for some time?—Yes, about seven or eight years I have been a member of the council.

3830. Have you been mayor before this year?—Yes, this is my second year.

3831. Has your attention been called to the evidence which was given before this Committee by Mr. Stanley?—I have seen it in the newspaper only.

3832. Are there any observations upon it which you wish to make to the Committee?—Yes. Mr. Stanley said that at the contested municipal elections a great deal of intimidation and treating prevailed. I differ from him entirely; I think that at our municipal contests the treating and intimidation prevailed to a very limited extent indeed on both sides. Mr. Stanley also said that at the last Parliamentary contest some railway workmen were discharged from their employ for voting for the Liberal candidate. I hold in my hand a document sent to me this morning from the station-master of Staleybridge, and he allows me to hand it in as evidence, refuting the charge of any persons in the employ of the railway company in Staleybridge having been discharged for voting for the Liberal candidate. It is as follows: "We, the undersigned, being employés of the railway company at the Staleybridge station, having read a statement made by Mr. Robert Stanley before a Committee of the House of Commons, that at the Parliamentary election there had been intimidation of railway workmen, and that such intimidation was used on behalf of the Liberal party, beg to state that so far as we are concerned, no attempt was made to intimidate or coerce us, and that the statement made by Mr. Stanley is not correct. (signed) James Barker, inspector; Joseph Andrew, porter; Henry Ashton, goods porter; Abraham Hall Good, porter; Thomas Wade, carter; Edward Booth, carter; Frederick Binns, pointsman; Solomon Norminton, porter; Henry Appleyard, porter; Robert Bromley, pointsman. The above signatures represent the whole of the staff of men employed at this station, who were entitled to vote at the late election, two of whom were neutral; three voted Liberal, and six Tory. Stalybridge, 26th April 1869." Mr. Stanley also made another charge, that the members of the town council had canvassed the employés of the corporation, accompanied by the town clerk; I am in a position to state that I do not believe that members of the council have ever canvassed the employés, and

and I am certain that the town clerk has taken no such part, because he has carefully abstained from showing which party he sympathises with. That statement is utterly incorrect. Mr. Stanley in the following day's paper, wrote correcting his evidence so far as it affected the town clerk, and he said that he either said or should have said the borough surveyor. I believe myself that the borough surveyor has never canvassed the employés, and if I must give my own opinion from conversation with the borough surveyor, I believe that his leanings are more with the Conservative side than with the Liberal. Mr. Stanley also said that some of the servants of the corporation were discharged because they would not vote for the Liberal candidate at the Parliamentary election; I am in a position to give that a direct and positive denial. I think that about three-fourths of the servants of the corporation voted for the Conservative candidate; and, with one exception, they are all still in the employ of the corporation. We have discharged one man since, because we had not sufficient employment for him. He was occupied upon a spare piece of ground belonging to the corporation, used for the purpose of tipping cart loads of dirt; but we found that there was not sufficient money coming in weekly from the tipping to pay his week's wages, and we discharged the man in consequence; he is the only servant of the corporation who has been discharged since the election.

3833. Has any one been put in his place?—No.

3835. You said that you had not reason to believe that great intimidation or treating has prevailed lately, in the municipal elections?—Yes, I do state that.

3836. Have you ever had any contest yourself?—Yes, I contested three wards successively, and was defeated three years successively.

3837. Can you tell the Committee what amount your election has cost?—I cannot tax my memory correctly, but I should think that perhaps the first contest cost me about 30 l. or 40 l. In the second contest, I think, if I recollect rightly, the whole of the wards in the town were contested, and the party that I was connected with, I think, paid about 230 l. or 240 l. for the whole of the town. The town is divided into three wards.

3838. And those sums, you think, would not provide for any extensive corrupt practice?—No, I do not think that there was any corrupt practice on either side.

3839. At the same time you say that you have always been defeated?—I have contested three wards and have been defeated, but I have succeeded since, or else I could not have been the mayor of the borough. The fourth time that I contested the ward I was successful.

3840. Do you know at all what sum of money has been spent by the opposite party in any of those contests?—I am not in a position to make any statement about that.

3841. Can you state positively to the Committee that no such practice prevails in Staleybridge as the payment of sums of money nominally for the loss of a day's wages?—Something of that sort came out in the evidence before Mr. Justice Blackburn, upon the Staleybridge petition, but beyond that I do not know anything.

3842. Is there no appearance in Staleybridge at the time of the municipal election, of more drinking going on than usual?—There is a little more, but not to any great extent.

3843. Have you no reason to believe that the expense of that is paid by the candidates?—I think that is usually paid by the committees subscribing according as they think proper.

3844. When you say that corrupt practices do not prevail, do you mean only that they are not countenanced by the candidates, or do you mean that corrupt practices do prevail, but that the expenses are paid by the committees?—I say that corrupt practices do not prevail to any great extent.

3845. Still there is drinking?—There is some drinking on both sides, which is paid for by the committees, I believe, in both instances.

3846. Where are the committees held in the municipal elections?—They are held very frequently at public-houses.

3847. It was stated to the Committee, that committees "were held at different public-houses, and those committees made it a habit of getting voters on the other side in, that they thought could be influenced by drink, and treating them, and so on, and persuading them over to support their side"; do you believe that that practice has prevailed, or not?—No; I do not think it does to any great extent.

3848. You do not deny that such things have been done?—No, I do not.

3850. In what manner did they terrify the inhabitants?—By processions through the town, hooting people who differed from them in opinion, and threatening to break the windows of houses.

3851. Did they break them?—They broke the windows of the Catholic chapel.

3852. Mr. Bright.] Was a person named Murphy delivering lectures at Staleybridge?—He delivered several lectures at the election on the 9th of November, the last year but one, and in a fortnight after Murphy and his party came into the town, and till within the last three or four weeks one of their lecturers has been living there ever since.

3853. Do you think that that excited much ill-feeling feeling between the English and the Irish population?—Yes, a great deal of ill-feeling.

27 April 1869.

3854. Chairman.] You belong to the Liberal party?—Yes, I belong to the Liberal party.

3855. Did you hear anything at the time of the last election of the Anti-Screw Association?—Yes, I heard of it, by seeing placards in the windows and on the walls; I do not know anything beyond that.

3856. Do you know what was the object of that association?—I think it was a political move on the part of the Conservative party to attract attention and to create excitement.

3857. Do you know what it professed to do?—Yes, I know what it professed to do, but I do not know whether it did it or not; I do not know anything about its working.

3858. Do you believe that there was no occasion for the formation of such an association?—Yes.

3859. Can you speak from your own knowledge, as to whether the facts mentioned to the Committee by Mr. Stanley as to the number of persons who had been turned out of their employ on account of their political opinions are correct or not?—No, I cannot speak to that.

3860. Do you think it probable that a considerable number of persons were turned out for voting contrary to the wishes of their employers?—No, I do not think so.

3861. But you have known of such things being done, I suppose, on both sides?—I have known it to be charged to both sides.

3862. Mr. Bright.] Do you know any actual fact?—No, I do not.

3863. Chairman.] In what business are you?—I am a cotton spinner.

3864. Do you think that if such proceedings had been going on, that if men were turned off to any great extent for voting against the wishes of their employers, that fact would have come under your notice?—Yes, I should think so.

3865. What were the directions which you gave to your own overseers?—I did not interfere at all in the election, in any shape or form. I have taken an entirely neutral position since I became mayor. I know that we had many who voted for the Conservative candidates, and they are working there still.

3866. Is there any other statement which you wish to make?—I simply wish to add that so alarmed was my wife at the state of the town that eight weeks before the election she left in terror.

3867. Mr. Hunt.] Have you many partners?—Two partners.

3868. Are they both Liberals?—Yes, they are both Liberals.

3869. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] I understand you to say that your expenses in the first election were 30*l.* or 40*l.*; can you tell me what the items of that expenditure were?—I think it was principally the hire of committee-rooms, and there was some payment of public-house bills amongst them.

3870. Then a part of that was probably spent in treating?—Yes, I do not deny that treating to a certain extent did prevail.

3871. In addition to your expenditure, there is an expenditure, as I understand you, generally on the part of committees?—Yes, on both sides.

3872. On both sides there is a committee who subscribe together, and they also come upon the candidate for a portion of the expenses?—Yes, that is so on one side, however.

3873. Did your expenditure increase at the subsequent elections over the first?—No, it was about the same sum.

3874. How many wards are there in Staleybridge?—There are only three wards.

3875. The expenditure at the last election was about 240*l.*?—Yes, something like that.

3876. That would be more than what you spent?—Yes, that would be more; it was a very long contest.

3877. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What is the name of your partner?—Mr. Marsland.

3878. Have you not another partner of the name of Wagstaff?—No, Mr. Wagstaff is my uncle; he is dead.

3879. But your partner, Mr. Marsland, took a very active part, did he not, in the late election?—Yes, I think he did.

3880. In your mills there were there placards put up, "Vote for Buckley, the Liberal candidate"?—There were placards at the entrance.

3881. You told the Chairman that there were no workmen discharged from your mill for voting; of course you, as mayor, took no part in the election?—No, I did not.

3882. But your partner did?—Yes.

3883. Do you know that of your own knowledge?—Yes.

3884. Do you happen to know a man of the name of Charnock, a workman in your mill?—Yes.

3885. Was not he discharged for voting for Mr. Sidebottom?—No; he was dismissed for incompetency.

3886. Do you know any other men who were dismissed?—No.

3887. Do you know a man of the name of Holdsworth?—Yes.

3888. Was he a workman in your mill?—Yes.

3889. Was he discharged?—If he was, it has been lately.

3890. Is he in your employ now?—I cannot speak to that; I think not, but I do not know.

3891. Have you not parted with several of your workmen since the election?—Yes, we have parted with several; we sometimes part with two or three a week.

3892. But do you not know as a fact, that out of the several men that have left your employ, many of them voted for Mr. Sidebottom, the Conservative candidate?—They voted both ways, I think.

3893. But I ask you with regard to those who were discharged?—I am speaking of those who were discharged.

3894. I ask you now whether you do not know of your own knowledge that many of those who were discharged voted for Mr. Sidebottom?—Yes, I know that Charnock voted for Mr. Sidebottom.

3895. And he was discharged?—Yes.

3896. You say for incompetence?—Yes; he has been found drunk at his work.

3897. What was Holdsworth discharged for?—I do not know; I cannot speak to that.

3898. Do you know a man of the name of Rowe?—No.

3899. Do you take an active part in the mill?—No, I do not at present.

3900. Have you always taken an active part in in the Liberal elections?—Yes, I have in the municipal elections.

3901. You have always been an active partisan on that side?—Yes.

3902. You have expressed your opinions pretty strongly, have you not?—Yes, frequently at the municipal elections.

3903. You are well known to be an active partisan in Staleybridge?—I am well known to be a strong Liberal in Staleybridge.

3904. You come here, do you not, in consequence of reading Mr. Stanley's evidence?—Yes; I should not have come here but for that.

3905. Did you come to London on purpose?—No; I have been in London on other business; I should not have come on purpose if I had been in Staleybridge.

3906. I understand you to state to the Committee that you think there was no intimidation on the part of the Liberal party?—Yes.

3907. You state that as your positive opinion?—Yes.

3908. Mr. Fawcett.] You speak of a reign of terror existing in Staleybridge; that implies intimidation, does it not?—Yes, I think so.

3909. Then, your allegation is that the intimidation was only on one side?—No, I did not say that positively; I said that the reign of terror was in consequence of Murphyite lectures creating an excitement.

3910. But if there was a reign of terror, by whatever cause it was produced, there must have been considerable intimidation?—Yes.

3911. Therefore, you did not quite express your meaning when you said that intimidation did not exist to any great extent?—I said that those people terrified the inhabitants of the town on both sides.

3912. If a reign of terror exists throughout a town, can you correctly describe the state of that town, by saying that there is not much intimidation in it?—There must have been a great deal of intimidation, but that was long before the election.

3913. As far as I understand you, this reign of terror began a considerable time before the election, and lasted up to the time of the election?—Yes.

3914. Then, if that is the case, if the reign of terror existed for a long time, and lasted up to the time of the election, are you correct in saying that there was not much intimidation?—There must have been a great deal of intimidation on the part of that party.

3915. I understood you just now to state that intimidation did not exist to any great extent?—I was speaking then of the municipal elections, I did not speak of the Parliamentary elections. When I spoke of intimidation I spoke of the municipal contests.

3916. Then I am to understand you to give it as your opinion that in the Parliamentary election there was great intimidation?—Yes, by the Murphyite party.

3918. There is considerable treating in the Parliamentary elections, is there?—Yes.

3919. Do you think that if a law were passed forbidding committees being held at public-houses that treating would be diminished?—I should like to see a law of that kind passed.

3920. Do you think that the effect would be to diminish treating?—I think it would.

3921. What were the expenses of the last Parliamentary election which would come under your cognisance as returning officer?—Mr. Buckley's expenses were 954 l. 17 s. 6 d., and Mr. Sidebottom's were 721 l. 6 s.

3922. From your general knowledge should you think that that represented the whole amount that was spent either by the candidates or on behalf of the candidates?—I cannot speak to that.

3923. Can you give the items of those expenses?—No.

3924. Do you think that any portion of that was spent in treating?—I do not know that; Mr. Buckley's expenses were, returning officer's expenses, 96 l.; F. Clayton, 100 l.; that was the election agent's wages; F. Clayton, 158 l. 13 s. 2 d.

3925. Were vouchers of that item sent in to you?—Yes.

3926. Have you any idea how that large amount was spent in wages?—No, I do not exactly know.

3927. Mr. Edward Egerton,] But you had some account, of course; you did not pass that, as mayor, without any explanation, did you?—I do not remember what the vouchers in either case came to.

3928. Mr. Fawcett.] As the returning officer, have you not any idea what this 158 l., described as wages, was spent upon?—I should think myself that it was wages to canvassers, but I do not know.

3929. You never took the trouble to inquire?—No, I did not.

3930. Then you simply took the items, but you knew nothing about them?—I did not.

3931. As far as you know, they might have been spent illegally?—I do not know how they were spent.

3932. What is the next item?—Hire of committee-rooms, 64 l. 8 s. 5 d.

3933. Do you know from the vouchers whether those committee-rooms were at public-houses?—No, they were not all at public-houses.

3934. Were many of them?—Several of them were.

3935. What is the next item?—Cabs, 59 l. 19 s. 6 d.

3936. That is an illegal expenditure, is it not?—I cannot say; in the case of the other candidates, the cab hire was nearly the same, 52 l.

3937. Then the cabs that were used before the election came to 59 l. 19 s. 6 d.?—I suppose it was before; I do not know.

3938. What is the next item?—Printing, &c., 280 l. 9 s. 10 d.; boards for placards, 20 l. 3 s. 10 d.; bill-posting, 14 l. 15 s.; miscellaneous, 14 l. 11 s. 4 d. I will now read the statement of Mr. Sidebottom's expenses: advertisements, 30 l. 8 s. 6 d.; agents, 21 l.; bill-posting, &c., 6 l. 4 s. 6 d.; cab hire, 52 l. 11 s.; canvassing books, preparation thereof, clerks and messengers, 155 l. 18 s.; furniture and fitments, 35 l. 12 s. 7½ d.; printing and stationery, 162 l. 12 s. 1 d.; proportion of returning officer's expenses, 96 l., town clerk's fee for return, 7 l.; refreshment for clerks, &c., 75 l. 1 s. 2½ d.; hire of rooms, 24 in number, 28 l. 1 s. 10 d.; miscellaneous, 50 l. 16 s. 3 d.

3939. You say that it would conduce to the purity of elections if committee-rooms were not held at public-houses; do you think that it would conduce to the purity of elections if meetings were not not held at public-houses?—Yes, I think it would very much conduce to the purity of elections.

27 April 1869.

3940. Have you a room large enough in Staleybridge to give the candidates an opportunity of fairly addressing the electors without having recourse to public-houses?—Yes, we have.

3941. Was the last election, in your opinion, at Staleybridge a pure one?—I cannot answer that question exactly.

3942. Do you think many votes were influenced either directly or indirectly by the expenditure of money?—I am not in a position to say that.

3943. Are you in favour of the ballot?—I am strongly in favour of the ballot.

3944. Do you think it would diminish the expenses of elections?—Yes.

3945. Do you think that if you had had the ballot you would not have had that reign of terror?—I cannot say that at all; I do not think the ballot could have prevented Murphy coming.

3946. Have you any opinion about throwing upon the constituency the necessary expenses short of due provision against vexatious contests?—No, I should not myself like the boroughs to pay the expenses of the election.

3947. They do in the municipal elections, do they not?—To a very small extent.

3948. When I say expenses, I mean only to the same extent as in a municipal election; the necessary expenses for hustings and polling booths?—They do that already in a Parliamentary election; the candidates pay it.

3949. In a municipal election the town pays it?—There are two items here of 196 l. each; I should not like the borough to be saddled with 200 l. for an election.

3950. Why should you not?—I think that they are legitimate expenses belonging to the candidate.

3951. You think that the candidate ought to pay, and not the town?—Yes, I think so.

3952. Mr. Cross.] How long has Staleybridge been incorporated as a borough?—I think it was incorporated in 1857.

3953. Have you found many fictitious nominations of councillors under that last Act of Parliament?—No, I have not; I think that the Act of Parliament works very well.

3954. Do you think that the time prescribed by that Act of Parliament for nomination before the day of the election is sufficient?—I do.

3955. Are you of opinion that no inconvenience is felt by the returning officer or anybody else?—No, I do not think there is at all.

3956. Do you think that the clauses of that Act as to bribery had any effect?—No, I think not.

3957. Is there much personation in Staleybridge?—No, not to a great extent.

3958. Have you had no proceedings for personation under that Act of Parliament?—I do not recollect any, there may have been, but they have escaped my memory at present if there have been.

3959. Mr. James.] From your own knowledge were cabs employed at the election in the conveyance of voters?—I think not.

3960. You think that those cabs were for canvassers, or for messengers, before the election?—I do not think that cabs conveyed voters.

3961. What sort of a nomination did you have; had the Murphy feeling become allayed?—No, it was very strong up to the close of the election.

3962. On the day of the nomination, and the day of the polling, was there any such riot as prevented persons from voting?—No.

3963. Do you think it had any influence with them?—I think everybody could have voted who wished.

3965. Mr. William Henry Smith.] How long did the contest last at Staleybridge?—I think they were both of them in the field about August.

3966. Were the expenses which you mentioned expenses lasting over the whole period?—Yes.

3967. Do you believe that the presence of Murphy in Staleybridge was injurious to the Conservative candidates?—No; I think it succeeded in returning the Conservative candidate.

3968. We had evidence last week that Murphy's presence there was injurious to the Conservative candidate; you are not of that opinion?—I think the very reverse.

3969. In favour of the Conservative candidate?—The Murphyite party were strongly in favour of the Conservative candidate.

3970. Intimidation was practised on both sides, you say, in the Parliamentary contest?—I do not think that there was strong intimidation on either side, as far as influencing voters by intimidation was concerned; but Murphyism was very strong.

3971. Was no intimidation practised within the mills?—Not that I know of.

3972. No undue influence of any kind?—No, not that I know of.

3973. No men dismissed from their work in consequence of voting against their employer?—There is a report that some men have been discharged, but I do not know whether that is the fact or not.

3974. To the best of your belief there was none?—No, on neither side.

3975. Mr. Bright.] Were there a good many people attended the nomination?—A great many; many thousands.

3976. Where was it held?—It was held on a plot of vacant ground called the plantation ground, near the market in Staleybridge; behind the market.

3977. Did the nomination last long; and was there much speaking?—No, it did not last very long; not more than an hour, I should think.

3978. Were the speeches pretty well heard over the whole meeting?—There was a great deal of noise and shouting.

3979. Was there any skirmishing?—Not very much.

3980. Was there on that day or on the polling day, in any quarter of the town, considerable disturbance, approaching almost to a riot?—There was some disturbance near one of the principal polling booths on the day of the election; I was so anxious to have the peace of the town preserved that I went to Derby, Preston, and Chester, to see the chief constables of the three counties to get additional assistance, and I succeeded at last with Captain Smith in getting some constables from the county of Cheshire.

3981. How many did you get?—I think we had had about 70, if I recollect rightly, in addition to our ordinary police force.

3982. Were they there on the day of the nomination?—They were there on the day of the polling only.

3983. Was there on that day, in one of your wards, a disturbance approaching to a riot?—There was a disturbance of that sort at the principal polling booth on the plantation ground.

3984. What happened?—Mr. Buckley, the Liberal candidate, was roughly used by some opponents of his, and in driving from Staleybridge to Dukinfeld (which is annexed to Staleybridge in the Parliamentary representation), along what is called the Tame Valley Road, he was assaulted in his carriage; the carriage windows were smashed, and considerable damage done to the carriage; he and a friend of his were in the carriage at the time.

3985. Were there any windows broken in any disturbance in the town?—No, I think not.

3986. Have you any idea what number of persons attacked Mr. Buckley's carriage; was it a large crowd, or only the outrage of a few?—I think there were about 70 or 80; this was given in evidence at the inquiry on the election petition; if I recollect rightly, there were about 70 or 80 or 100 young men and boys attacked the carriage.

3987. Have you any opinion as to the usefulness or otherwise of continuing the practice of public nominations from the hustings?—I think it would be very much better to abolish it.

3988. What is your view upon the question, has it reference to the fact of its costing a day's work or that it affords an opportunity for tumult?—It affords an opportunity for tumult; the day of the nomination very frequently is rougher than the day of the election. The working people leave their employment; they either obtain leave, or take leave, and they attend the nomination, and all the rest of the day is spent very frequently in drinking at public-houses, and before the close of the evening the town very frequently becomes very much excited; I think that if public nominations were abolished it would be very much better.

3989. Do you think that you are representing a considerable amount of opinion in Staleybridge upon that question?—Yes, I think so.

3990. There is I presume abundant opportunity before the election for the candidates to make their opinions known to the constituency?—Yes, plenty of opportunity.

3991. You say that you have a strong feeling upon the ballot, have you had that long, or has it come to you recently?—I have been in favour of the ballot for a very long time.

3992. On that question are you able to express any opinion as to the feeling in the town?—I think that the majority in the town are in favour of the ballot.

3993. Did the present Member for Staleybridge look favourably upon the ballot during his canvass?—Yes, he did.

3994. Is he understood in the borough to have pledged himself to support the ballot in Parliament?—He is.

3995. Is not that the fact with regard to one if not two more representatives of the Conservative party in your district?—It is the fact with regard to Mr. Mellor, the Member for Ashton. I cannot go beyond that.

3996. In taking that line, do you think that Mr. Sidebottom or Mr. Mellor were very much opposed to the general sentiments of their friends, or that it was rather in their favour at the election?—I should think that the majority of their friends would scarcely agree with them, but I do not know that; I am expressing simply my opinion now.

3997. Did it make Mr. Sidebottom at all more acceptable to some of those who called themselves Liberals?—Yes, I dare say it did.

3998. Sir George Grey.] Were there many public meetings held before the election by the candidates at which they addressed the constituency?—Not very many; the Liberal party held very few open public meetings, because they did not wish to have their meetings upset by their opponents; therefore they abstained from holding them.

3999. They were afraid of the Murphyites disturbing them?—Yes.

4000. But were there any mixed meetings at which either candidate addressed the whole constituency?—There were two or three mixed meetings held by the Liberal party, and there were several mixed meetings held by the Conservative party.

4001. Were they orderly?—The two meetings held just before the election by the Liberal party were very disorderly meetings.

4002. But were there opportunities given at public meetings to the constituency to ascertain distinctly the opinions of the several candidates?—Yes.

4003. Without any such interruption as to prevent their giving a full expression of their opinions?—No; there was a considerable amount of interruption at the two last meetings held by the Liberal candidates.

4004. Chairman.] You were asked some questions about whether you had examined those accounts of the expenses of each candidate; would there be any advantage in your making an examination of them?—No.

4005. Whatever you might have found out, it would not have been your duty to have taken any steps?—Not at all; in fact I left the matter in the hands of the town clerk, with regard to the accounts.

4006. What did you understand then to be your duty with reference to those returns?—Simply official; I have to receive them, and see that they are published; that is all that I have to do with them.

4008. Would not that apply also to the Parliamentary?—Yes; I think there was not a great deal of it.

4009. Then it is on general grounds, and not with reference to the Staleybridge election that you advocate the ballot?—Precisely.

4010. You do not think that in Staleybridge it would make any very great difference?—I think it would not make greater difference in Staleybridge than anywhere else.

4011. You do not think that there are any very great evils to be corrected at Staleybridge?—I think that if the ballot were adopted elections would be conducted in a more orderly manner, and every person would have a free field to exercise his own individual opinion, and as such I should advocate the ballot in Staleybridge as well as other places.

Mr. J. Kirk. 27 April 1869.

4012. It would not prevent Murphy coming?—No.

4013. It would not have prevented what you call the "reign of terror"?—No, it could not have prevented that.

4014. And it would not have prevented the Liberal candidate being assaulted?—No.

4015. It would not in any way protect those whose opinions were very prominent?—It would protect working men, I should think.

4016. But it would not protect those who took a very active part on either side in the contest?—No.

4017. Mr. Hunt.] Is your opinion in favour of the ballot entirely formed by a consideration of its effect in countries where it has been adopted?—Yes; I think it works exceedingly well in America and Australia.

4018. Have you been in America yourself?—No, it is only from reading that I form my opinion.

4019. Have you read the accounts of its working in America?—Yes, I have.

4020. Do you understand that in America the ballot ensures secret voting?—I do think so.

4022. Mr. Fawcett.] You stated in reply to the Chairman that it was not your duty to examine those accounts?—I think not.

4023. But you have the vouchers for all the items sent to you?—The town clerk keeps them; I do not keep them.

4024. Is it not your duty to examine the vouchers?—No, I do not think it is my particular duty; I cannot alter them, nor can I compel an alteration if I did examine them.

4025. But it is your duty to see that the vouchers are genuine, is it not?—I do not know that it is; if it is my duty, I am not aware of it.

4026. Has it not struck you that it would be no use for the Act of Parliament to order vouchers to be sent in unless they are examined?—I know that they were examined by the town clerk, but I did not examine them myself.

4027. You stated just now, that you think it would be unfair that any portion of the necessary expenses of a Parliamentary election should be borne by the town; did you base that opinion upon the idea that a seat in Parliament is a privilege which a candidate ought to pay for?—Partly, and on the other hand, I think that boroughs have already sufficient burdens to bear without bearing the expenses of returning members to Parliament.

4028. But you look upon a seat in Parliament as a privilege that a man ought to pay for, rather than as a duty which he has to discharge?—I cannot exactly answer that question. I think that if a gentleman wishes to have the honour of being a Member of Parliament he ought to pay for it.

4029. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] You are, perhaps, not in favour of paying the Members themselves?—No, I am against that strongly.

4030. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Does Staleybridge maintain its own borough police?—Yes.

4031. Are they certified by the Inspector as efficient?—Yes.

4032. Then it was only on the occasion of Mr. Murphy coming that you required an extra force?—It was on the day of the election.

4033. Mr. Edward Egerton.] How many police have you in Staleybridge?—Twenty-four.

4034. The population is what?—The population was about 25,000 at the last census. We require to have one to every 1,000 before we can have the Parliamentary grant.

Mr. Thomas Troughton; called in, and Examined.

Mr. T. Troughton.

4035. Chairman.] Where do you reside?—At Gravesend.

5036. Mr. Hunt.] Have you had experience of any elections in that part of the country?—Yes, I have taken rather an active part.

4037. Sir George Grey.] Is Gravesend a municipal borough?—Yes.

4038. How long has it been so?—From time immemorial.

4039. Mr. Hunt.] How are the municipal elections conducted at Gravesend, as regards peaceableness and purity?—We do not have any disturbance at all at the municipal elections; in fact, we have not had a contest for nearly 20 years.

4040. Do politics enter into the municipal elections at all?—No, not much.

4041. There are no contests?—No.

4042. Chairman.] In no ward of the town?—No.

4043. Mr. Hunt.] You have had experience of one Parliamentary election?—Yes.

4044. On that occasion there was a contest, was there not?—Yes, there was a contest then.

4045. Was it a pure election?—I do not think it was.

4046. Will you tell us what was the nature of the corruption used; was it bribery, or treating, or both?—There is no doubt that there was both bribery and intimidation used.

4047. Did the bribery take the coarse form of money payments, or was it anything more insidious?—I thing there was more money payments than anything else, but I believe intimidation had more to do with it; there was a disturbance that took place in the middle of the day.

4048. Do you think that there were many voters induced to vote by money payments?—Yes.

4049. On both sides?—No, only on one side.

4050. With regard to the treating, was treating general at that election?—No, there was no treating at all.

4051. Do you know what the figure was?—Very small, indeed.

4052. Was it shillings or pounds?—I think about 10*s.*

4053. What is the number of the constituency?—About 2,500.

4054. Do you know how many of that number were bought; can you form any idea?—I should think about 200.

4055. Sir George Grey.] There has been no petition petition from Gravesend, I believe?—No; but there would have been a petition if they had known as much as they do now.

4056. Mr. Hunt] You have learnt since how the election was won?—Yes; there are several men who are waiting to take their trial at the next assizes.

4057. You have said that intimidation had a great deal to do with winning the election; what was the nature of that intimidation?—The intimidation began about the middle of the day when the other party were ahead; a gentleman living at Northfleet having the command of a great number of men in his employ got up a band of music, and they came in a body and smashed all the windows of their opponents throughout Northfleet and Gravesend.

4058. Then it was intimidation by a mob?—Yes.

4059. Was it an organised mob?—Yes; they came from Northfleet, which is a part of the borough.

4060. Was it regularly got up and organised?—There is no question about it.

4061. Headed by a band?—Yes, by two bands of music.

4062. And they came into the town about the middle of the day?—Yes, about 12 o'clock.

4063. What did they do then?—They smashed the windows of all the Conservative voters that they could get near.

4064. Had that the effect of deterring any voters from recording their votes?—There is no question about it.

4065. Sir George Grey.] What does the constituency consist of?—About 2,500.

4066. How many polled on both sides?—I think about 2,000.

4067. Mr. Hunt.] By how many was the election won?—About 130 or 140, I am not sure which.

4068. Do you think that but for the bribery and intimidation the election would have gone the other way?—There is no doubt of it, if it had gone on fair as it was going the first thing in the morning.

4069. Sir George Grey.] Before the intimidation began how did the poll stand?—The Conservatives were 100 ahead.

4070. Mr. Hunt] After this mob came in did the numbers begin to rise on the other side?—Our voters would not go up when they got their windows smashed; they refused to leave their houses.

4071. Did the arrival of this mob, and the going up in the scale of the other party, coincide as to time?—Directly the message went over to Northfleet there was scarcely a vote polled after that time for the Conservatives, for the mob took possession of the booth.

4072. Sir George Grey.] Why did you not petition on the ground of intimidation, because if it altered the result of the election it must have been notorious?—The intimidation was notorious, but we could not get at the bribery.

4073. Why did you not petition on the ground of intimidation, because if it altered the result of the election you might have set it aside if the intimidation were proved?—We could not do it, or else we should have done so.

4074. Why could you not?—I really cannot say.

4075. Mr. Hunt.] Have you any suggestion to make with a view to preventing such scenes occurring in future?—No; except that I should like to see nominations done away with.

4076. Sir George Grey.] Was the nomination a very disorderly one at Gravesend?—Yes.

4077. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Is there any remedy for those persons who had their windows broken?—No.

4078. They cannot get any payment from the rates, or in any other way?—No.

4079. There was no attempt to pull down houses, but simply breaking windows?—Yes, it was merely smashing windows, with the poles that the flags were on.

4080. But you know, do you not, that in case of a riot, which amounts to an attempt to pull a house down, the town would be liable?—Yes.

4081. Do you think it would be an advantage to make the neighbourhood liable for the payment of injuries which are done by mobs in that way?—I should certainly make them liable.

4082. Mr. Bright.] Were you in the town at the time of the election?—Yes.

4083. What is your particular position there?—I am a tallow chandler.

4084. Did they break your windows?—No, they did not get to my private house, it is out of the town.

4085. Were they accurate in their vengeance; did they break any Liberal's windows?—No.

4086. How did they know that those particular houses were occupied by Conservatives?—They had a man leading them, and when he got to one of the other party's houses, he said, "Not here; go to the next one."

4087. Then there was method in their proceedings?—Yes.

4088. If they did not know what to do, when they came to a man whose vote they were not sure of either one way or the other, did they pass him by?—They passed him by.

4089. If there were houses in which they did not know how the man was going to vote, they did not touch him?—No; it was mostly the houses that displayed some colours, or something of that kind, in the daytime; or some one they knew.

4090. Chairman.] Was there any personal violence?—I was not at Northfleet; I was in the town of Gravesend; but I believe there was some personal violence at Northfleet.

4091. Mr. Bright.] What time of the day did you vote?—About nine o'clock.

4092. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] I suppose the people who had their windows broken were all strong political partizans?—Yes; all displaying some colours.

4093. If it had not been known which way they voted, yet their opinions were pretty well known?—Yes; they had got several people with them who told them exactly what houses to smash.

4094. Mr. Bright.] Were you on the committee of the Conservative candidate?—Yes, I was chairman of it.

4095. Then, of course, you knew the effect of the canvass?—Yes.

4096. The night before the election; I presume you went through all your lists more accurately than usual?—Yes.

4097. Can you state distinctly what was the state of the canvass the night before?—We had a clear majority of over 100.

4098. Do you include in that the neutral votes, which

Mr. T. Troughton. 27 April 1869.

which are often considerable?--No; only from the actual promises for and against.

4099. When you speak of the promises that are against, if you have ever canvassed, you will find that you cannot estimate the promises that your opponents will get?—No; but, then, you take the doubtful votes afterwards.

4100. Chairman.] Can you give the Committee the exact state of your canvass?—I could if I had known that I was to be asked the question; I could not now.

4101. Mr. Bright.] On the whole, you were disappointed at 4 o'clock in the day?—It was all done about 12; directly the mob came in and smashed our windows we were done.

4102. Mr. Fawcett.] Were the mob who came in excited with drink?—I do not know that they were.

4103. Mr. James.] Can you give the names of any voters who had promised the Conservative candidate and who were prevented from voting?—I could not now.

4104. If they were hundreds you must either have reckoned them inaccurately or they were prevented?—I did not say that hundreds were prevented from voting.

4105. You say that there was a majority of 130 on the Conservative side, and you say that the result would have been different but for the intimidation; can you give us the names of some of those 130 who were prevented from voting?—I have not the names with me.

4106. Mr. Bright.] Do you think there were any voters who had promised for your candidate who voted for the Liberals?—Yes, there were.

4107. How many do you think?—I cannot tell; if I had known I should be asked, I would have brought that information with me.

4108. Do you think there were many of your promises who did not vote at all?—There were many of our promises who were sent away, and many who promised us voted for the other side.

4109. What do you mean by sent away?—Sent out of the town.

4110. By your friends?—No, not by our friends.

4111. Were any sent out the night before?—I can hardly tell you whether they went in the night or the morning; they were not in the town in the daytime; they could not be found.

4112. Then that particular mob did not affect them at all?—No, not those; we have made every allowance for them.

4113. Some people like this kind of excitement at elections; do you think it would be possible to take any steps to put an end to it, and make elections more tranquil?—I should certainly like to see some other system adopted, but I am not in a position to say what; I certainly should like to see the nomination done away with; I believe that the first cause of the disturbance in our town was the nomination.

4114. Sir George Grey.] Which side had the show of hands?—The returning officer gave it to the Liberals.

4115. Mr. Hunt.] Was this mob from Northfleet there on the day of the nomination?—Yes.

4116. The same mob?—Yes.

4117. With the same leaders?—Yes.

4118. Sir George Grey.] But they were workmen in a factory that is within the borough?—Yes, they live at Northfleet; Northfleet is a part of the Parliamentary borough of Gravesend.

4119. Were they electors themselves?—I cannot say at all.

4120. Were they residents within the borough?—No doubt many of them were.

4121. Householders?—No doubt many of them were.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

Sir Michael Hicks Beach.	Mr. Staveley Hill.
Mr. Brand.	Mr. Hunt.
Mr. Cross.	Mr. James.
Mr. Dalglish.	Mr. Leatham.
Mr. Edward Egerton.	Mr. Locke.
Mr. Graves.	The O'Conor Don.
Sir George Grey.	Mr. Raikes.
Mr. Gathorne Hardy.	Mr. William Henry Smith.
The Marquis of Hartington.	Mr. Villiers.

THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. THOMAS TROUGHTON, was called in; and further Examined.

Mr. T. Troughton. 30 April 1869.

4122. Sir George Grey.] YOU stated on the last day of your examination that the constituency of Gravesend consisted of about 2,500, and that only about 2,000 voted. I see by the returns that the number who voted was over 2,300; can you correct those figures?—The number of the constituency is 2,722; I said about 2,500; and the number of persons who polled was 2,300.

4123. And the majority, which you stated to be about 130 or 140, was 168?—Yes.

4124. Mr. James.] Does that 2,722 include double entries?—Yes.

4125. The gross register of persons with both qualifications?—Yes.

4126. Mr. Hunt.] Are there two registers at Gravesend?—There are two ward registers, one for Gravesend and one for Milton.

4127. Mr. Brand.] Will you state how many voters there were actually on the register?—I cannot exactly tell that.

4128. Mr. Hunt.] You have got the analysis of the canvass now with you; will you give us the figures?—The total on the register for the parish of Gravesend was 769.

4129. How many parishes are there in Gravesend?—Three; the total on the register was 769 for the parish of Gravesend; there voted for Mr. Pim 280, and there voted for Sir Charles Winkfield 554; in the parish of Milton there voted for Pim 540, and there voted for Winkfield 527. In the parish of Northfleet there voted for Pim 249, and for Winkfield 356.

4130. Was that in accordance with the expectations formed from the previous canvass?—No.

4131. To what extent did it differ?—We thought that we should get a good majority of 100.

4132. And the result was that you were in a minority of how many?—One hundred and sixty-eight.

4133. Do you attribute that to the organised intimidation which prevailed, and to bribery?—I am sure of it.

4134. Chairman.] Have you had much experience in Parliamentary elections?—Not for boroughs.

4135. Then you do not know whether it is or is not a very unusual occurrence to find that your canvass is not borne out by the poll?—All I can say is for the county, and we have generally polled our number within about five of the return for the polling district of Gravesend.

4136. But you have not had experience of borough elections?—No, not in borough elections; that was our first election.

4138. Mr. James.] Can you tell the Committee how many persons who had promised you refrained from voting on either side?—No; I have taken very little interest in the parish of Northfleet; I only worked the parishes of Gravesend and Milton.

4139. Chairman.] What is the difference between the number of promises and the number that you polled; how many promises had you?—I think our promises were 1,256.

4140. Sir George Grey.] What personal knowledge have you of those promises?—I have a personal knowledge, as far as two parishes of Gravesend and Milton were concerned, because I canvassed the whole of them myself.

4141. What personal knowledge have you of the rest of the borough?—Northfleet I cannot answer for; I only know from the report of those who worked Northfleet.

4142. Chairman.] Then there were only 1,200 promises that you made certain of polling in a constituency of 2,700?—There were several deaths and several doubles; I cannot tell how many.

4143. Sir George Grey.] How many did you calculate calculate upon voting?—I always said that 1,200 would win the election.

4144. You did not think that above 2,400 would come to the poll?—No; I said 1,200 would win the election; I said anyone would win who would get 1,200 to come to the poll.

4145. Mr. James.] How many voters are there on the register in Northfleet?—688.

4146. That is where the riot occurred, is it not?—Yes; the riot first began at Northfleet, and then the rioters worked their way to Gravesend.

4147. How many polled out of those 688?—About 605.

4148. Mr. Villiers.] You made a canvass yourself; do you mean that those persons made promises distinctly to you?—I think I might say that I canvassed the whole of the two parishes of Gravesend and Milton myself.

4149. And promises were made separately and distinctly to yourself?—Promises for and against were distinctly made to me, for I kept a book, and never showed it to anyone till the night before the election.

4150. There was no person with you canvassing, was there?—Yes; Captain Pim was there, and one or two other gentlemen each day, taking the canvass.

4151. And you agreed in your lists when you came home?—No one ever took that but myself; I took it myself and kept it.

4152. But Captain Pim attended you in the canvass?—Yes.

4153. Mr. Brand.] Had you no return made to you of the double entries?—No.

4154. Then you do not know that double entries are not included in those promises?—Those men promised me in Gravesend; I did not put them down for Milton, because I knew all the people very well in the parishes of Gravesend and Milton.

4155. As chairman of the Conservative Committee, do you not know the number of double entries on the register?—No; I took the canvass myself of the two parishes of Gravesend and Milton.

4156. The O'Conor Don.] Was there a petition in the case of Gravesend?—No; with regard to the petition I might say this, that the reason why we did not petition was that we were recommended not to petition, because we found that after all the expense we could not have claimed the seat; even if we had unseated Sir Charles Winkfield, they said there was no chance of our claiming the seat with a majority of 168.

4157. Sir George Grey.] You did not think that you would win the next time if the seat was declared vacant?—No; we had had quite enough of it the first time.

Major Robert Bush, called in; and Examined.

Major Robert Bush.

4158. Mr. Hunt.] You are a resident in Bristol, are you not?—I reside at Clifton, and I have a business in Bristol.

4159. Have you been acquainted with Bristol for many years?—I have been acquainted with it for the last 17 years, since I left the army.

4160. Have you been at all concerned in the elections in that city?—Yes; more or less during that time.

4161. The municipal or the Parliamentary?—Principally in the Parliamentary elections.

4162. Do you know anything of the municipal elections?—I know a little of them, being a member of the town council; but I know very little about the mode of conducting the municipal elections.

4163. Are the municipal elections conducted with reference to politics or not?—Yes; certainly, they are to a considerable extent.

4164. Is there any bribery at the municipal elections?—I think nothing worth speaking of.

4165. Nor has there been, in your recollection?—Nor has there been.

4166. Is there any treating?—Yes, there is treating, certainly, I believe, on both sides.

4167. To what extent does the treating go?—I do not think it goes to any very serious extent.

4168. Is there anything in the shape of a day's pay given to a voter at the municipal elections?—I have not heard of it.

4169. With the exception of some treating, you think that the municipal elections are conducted purely?—I think they are tolerably pure.

4170. Is there any undue influence exercised at the municipal elections?—I think not. I think very little by masters of establishments.

4171. Sir George Grey.] Are there many contests?—Certainly, every year, and very severe contests.

4172. Mr. Hunt.] Is there any kind of undue influence exercised by anybody at those very severe contests?—No, I cannot say that there is. I do not know whether the question means to show that masters put the screw on their men or not; if that was the meaning of the question I should say it was not the case. I am speaking more especially as regards my own business, and there it is rather the other way; the men are rather inclined to vote against their master.

4173. Is there a very independent spirit amongst the workmen?—Perfectly so.

4174. Do the masters attempt to influence them?—I do not think they do.

4175. As regards other kinds of influences, is there any influence used by customers over tradesmen?—None, that I know of.

4176. Is any kind of improper influence used by the workmen over one another?—I have not heard of anything of that sort. I think that is carried on to a very small extent in Bristol, either at the Parliamentary or at the other elections.

4177. As regards the Parliamentary elections, is it within your knowledge or not, that there is any bribery at those elections?—Yes; I think there is bribery to a certain extent.

4178. What shape does the bribery take; all the men paid for their day's work, or paid so much in consideration of voting for a particular candidate?—I should say that they were occasionally paid for their day's work as messengers and employed as canvassers occasionally.

4179. Do you mean that persons are employed as canvassers and paid with a view to secure their votes?—I suppose so.

4180. And as messengers?—Yes, and as messengers.

4181. Is that a regular practice in Bristol?—I should think it has been of late years; certainly, since since the election of 1865 I think it has been carried on to a considerable extent.

4182. Are you aware whether the bribery takes the form of actual money payments in consideration of votes for a particular candidate?—I am not aware of that.

4183. As regards treating, is there much treating at the Parliamentary elections?—I think there is a considerable amount of treating before the elections take place.

4184. How is that done; is it by the opening of public houses?—It is done I rather think by the hiring of committee-rooms, which, as a rule, generally are taken at public-houses, and occasionally it is done by holding tea meetings. For instance, at the late election that was done to a large extent previous to the election by one of the candidates; I do not know whether that may be viewed as treating.

4185. Were persons invited to those tea meetings?—Yes; many thousands were present; men who were voters with their wives.

4186. And they received refreshment, did they?—Yes, they received refreshment.

4187. Without paying?—I believe they were supposed to have paid for it themselves by money taken at the door, or by tickets given to them.

4188. There was money taken at the door to pay for the refreshment supplied?—Yes, to pay for the refreshment supplied.

4189. Then that would not be treating?—I believe in many cases free tickets were given to particular parties, but I am not speaking of this with any degree of positiveness, because it is merely a matter of report.

4190. As regards intimidation, has there been any intimidation at the Parliamentary elections?—Yes, I am sorry to say at the last election intimidation was carried on to a very serious extent in Bristol.

4191. Was it an organised system of intimidation?—I should be of opinion that it was decidedly organised.

4193. You say that those parties came from London and organised a mob to intimidate voters?—So it is supposed, such a rumour is current in Bristol.

4194. Was it the case that there were organised mobs?—Most decidedly. I saw one of them myself.

4195. Were they known by the name of the "flying column"?—They were known by the name of the "flying columns."

4196. Was there a separate mob in each district of the town?—That I cannot speak to. I should say that they were not separate mobs. I should think that there were two or three different mobs that went apparently by design, and by previous plan, from one polling booth to another.

Major Robert Bush.

4197. Your belief is that they were under a regular leader?—I believe they were under a regular leader.

4198. Was he a paid leader?—I can myself speak to one mob which I myself saw, and, as an old military man, it struck me that I never saw a mob that appeared to be more organised, almost marching in military form, than the mob I then saw. They were partly armed with bludgeons, and nearly all had red cards in their hats.

4199. At what period of the election did those organised mobs appear in the streets of Bristol?—It was in the early part of the polling day.

4200. Were they there on the nomination day?—There were mobs from both sides on the nomination day.

4201. What is known in Bristol as the "flying column" appeared on the polling day, and not before, I believe?—Not before. They did not show themselves till after the first declaration of the poll at nine o'clock, somewhere about ten o'clock.

4203. What was the majority at nine o'clock?—About 150 only in favour of the Liberal candidates. It was generally expected that the majority would have been 600 or 700 in their favour; and the idea was that if there was not that majority, then those mobs were to be let loose.

4204. Was that expectation realised?—It certainly was.

4205. At that time of the day did those flying columns appear?—They did.

4207. Do you believe that the effect of those mobs was to deter many voters from voting?—I believe so, most decidedly, and I believe that to be the opinion of a great many very respectable Liberals as well as Conservatives.

4208. Were legal proceedings taken in some cases?—Yes, in many cases.

Major Robert Bush.

30 April 1869.

4209. What were the persons charged with? —They were charged with general rioting, doing damage to property and assaults; there was a fearful amount of assaults.

4210. I think you said that one man was convicted?—Yes, there were many convicted. I think I am speaking quite within bounds, in saying that the number of convictions must have been something like 30 or 40.

4211. You did not petition against the return, did you?—There was no petition.

4212. Did you consider that the intimidation was enough to justify a petition?—From what I saw and have since heard I should think there would have been ample ground to have petitioned upon the score of intimidation.

4213. Do you know the reason why no petition was presented?—No, I do not.

4214. Was there a strong feeling in Bristol against the action of those mobs?—Yes, there was a particularly strong feeling against them.

4216. You think that at the previous election the voters had not been prevented by the intimidation of the mobs?—I think not; in fact, I never heard a complaint of that sort urged by the Liberals.

4217. You told us that you believe that strangers organised the mobs, and that they were paid?—It is generally believed so, and I believe it could now be proved; I believe that the parties are known.

4218. Do you think that the mobs that were organised were paid?—I have no doubt of it, and I believe that the sum is known that they received. They began quarrelling among themselves as to the terms of payment, and the police were actually called in to keep order while they were being paid.

4219. Where were they paid?—At a public-house called the "Coach and Horses," in the Broad Mead.

4220. Do you know what number went there for payment?—That I cannot speak to, but I believe it was a matter of hundreds.

4221. Do you know the names of any policemen who could testify to this?—I do not know the names, but I have no doubt that they could be easily got at, and I have as little doubt that the names of those two parties who paid them could be got at too.

4222. Mr. Villiers.] You are a native of Bristol, I presume?—I am a native of Bristol.

4223. Have you known Bristol for many years?—Yes, constantly for the last 17 years. The first part of my life I passed in the army, and of course I was not much acquainted with it during that time.

4224. Have you always taken an interest in those elections?—To a certain extent, I have.

4225. You have known the practices at elections for many years past, I presume?—Yes.

4226. That sort of rioting is not a very unusual thing at Bristol, is it?—I have never heard of any election riots like those at the last election; in fact, I am told by those who were present at the Bristol riots in 1831, when the city was burned, that nothing in the shape of a riot has occurred since then which approached those riots so closely in point of violence, brutal conduct, or damage done.

4227. You have, I think, observed that at one election there was an organised mob on the other side?—I may say organised, inasmuch as from the course that was taken at Sir Morton Peto's election, hundreds of Conservative voters were then prevented from voting, and steps were taken by the Conservative party to assist their voters and to give them the means of going up to poll their votes.

4228. So that the mob that was organised on the Conservative side was for the protection of the Liberal voters as well as of the Conservative voters?—I wish most distinctly to say that it was not organised for that purpose, but I say this, that they gave as much facility for the Liberal voters to record their votes as for the Conservatives to do so.

4229. I think you say that they assisted the Liberal voters to come up?—I believe they did; I should not be straining the point by saying that they gave assistance to the Liberal voters to vote.

4230. Do you happen to know the terms on which those mobs consented to act?—I do not.

4231. Do you know whether it was stipulated that they were to assist the Liberal voters in giving their votes?—I do not.

4232. Do you know the terms upon which this mob was got together?—I do not.

4233. Did you act on any committee at the time of the election when the Conservative mob was organised?—Yes, I was on the Conservative committee.

4234. Was there any discussion deliberately about it?—None that I can speak to myself at all.

4235. Were they brought from a distance?—I think not.

4236. Are there persons generally available for those purposes in Bristol?—I think it is quite likely there are.

4237. Do you say that the Liberal mob was brought from out of the town?—I say that, at the last election, a great many of the mob were strangers to the town; I believe some of the mobs came from some of the neighbouring collieries.

4238. Do you speak in that case upon the report of others?—Upon report, certainly not at all from any actual knowledge of the fact.

4239. I think that would apply to the other parts of your evidence; that you do not speak from any actual knowledge of anything?—Certainly not of everything.

4240. But upon the report of others?—Upon the general belief and the general report at the time and since of what took place.

4241. Reports flying about at the time of the election?—Yes, and which were afterwards generally verified.

4242. Before the magistrates?—No; I should say not before the magistrates.

4243. When you speak of this mob coming from out of the town, and being paid for their work, those were reports which were flying about at the last election?—Yes; and I believe I can say that they did officially come before the magistrates, inasmuch as several of the parties who, I believe, were brought before the magistrates were found to have come from some of the collieries in the neighbourhood.

4244. Are you on the bench yourself?—I am not.

4245. You do not know whether magistrates heard the case?—No, I do not.

4246. And you do not know that the case was heard?—Certainly; I know that the case was heard, and that it came out in evidence that some of those men who were concerned were called volunteer constables (that was the name that was applied to them) and that they belonged to some collieries on the outskirts of Bristol.

4247. But did those proceedings disclose for what they were hired?—I rather think they did.

4248. But you do not know?—I do not know, but I rather think they did; I think it is upon record.

4249. You state that it is the practice at Bristol to hire a great number of people as messengers at the Parliamentary elections?—Yes, I believe it is.

4250. Do you know whether those messengers were not amongst the mob?—It is quite possible they may have been; if so, they must have had a great many hundreds of them, for I should think that in the different mobs that were going about the town, there must have been certainly over a thousand men.

4251. But have you any knowledge of the illegal purpose for which they were hired?—Certainly not.

4252. If there were proceedings before the magistrates, that would have been disclosed, would it not?—It possibly might or might not.

4253. Has anything ever been said about the illegal purposes for which those men were hired since the time of the election?—I have not heard of anything being directly said about it.

4254. In fact, can you tell us of any proceedings that did actually take place in consequence of those irregularities at the election?—I could, if I had had time to refer to the papers, have brought to your notice many convictions that took place for assaults, and very serious assaults they were; and one of them was the conviction of this very man whom I myself saw leading the mob. This pensioner has received six weeks' imprisonment; and I am sorry to say he is an old soldier.

4255. Perhaps he was well known before in Bristol?—I never heard of him before.

4256. Nothing of this sort occurred on the other side; there was no disturbance, was there?—Nothing in the early part of the day, and if anything did occur, I believe it was a measure of retaliation, and in the afternoon.

4257. There was not any piece of work in the early part of the day, was there?—There may have been, but certainly nothing at all to the extent of the mischief that was done by the opposite party, but I might almost say that there was little or nothing done by the Conservative side in the morning.

4259. This large majority did not appear at that hour of the day when you said you saw the mob acting as you expected they would act?—I saw them acting as I expected they would act as near 10 o'clock as possible; the particular mob that I speak to, was one of some three or four.

4260. When did the retaliation begin?—As far as I know, not till the afternoon.

4261. Then there was a general disturbance, both parties being in collision?—Yes, I believe they were.

4262. Were any proceedings taken against the people on the other side?—Yes; and many were convicted and punished. I believe at the former election in April, at which Mr. Miles was returned, the town clerk testified or was prepared to testify, and the authorities would I have no doubt testify, to its having been one of the most peaceable elections that ever took place in Bristol.

4263. Mr. Miles was returned in the early part of that year, was he not?—In April 1868.

4264. And was there a petition against his return?—There was.

4265. Was he unseated?—He was.

4266. Was it the riot upon which he was unseated?—No, it was not.

4267. Do you remember the particular cause?—I really do not. I cannot explain it at all in a legal way, but it was something in connection with bribery. Mr. Miles was himself acquitted of any blame whatever.

4268. Then besides riot, bribery sometimes takes place at the Bristol elections?—Certainly.

4269. And upon this occasion Mr. Miles was unseated upon that ground?—He was.

4270. Do we understand you to say that it is a rare occurrence at the Bristol elections that there should be bribery?—Certainly not.

4271. Is it common?—I believe it is common. Most certainly, since the election of Sir Morton Peto, when, I believe, the sum that was spent was something fabulous.

4272. The sum was larger then, was it, than when Mr. Miles was elected?—I should think so. I do not know what was spent at Mr. Miles's election, but it is generally reported that something like 15,000 l. or 16,000 l. was spent by Sir Morton Peto in his election.

4273. Was there a charge of bribery against Sir Morton Peto?—I never heard that there was; there was no charge whatever at that election, I believe.

4274. Sir Morton Peto was not unseated?—Certainly not.

4275. With respect to the municipal elections, I think you say that they are quite pure?—I did not say anything of the sort.

4276. I thought you said that there was no bribery or treating?—I certainly did not make use of the word "quite."

Major Robert Bush.

30 April 1869.

4277. But, comparatively, they are pure?—I think that is much nearer the mark, and is what I intended to say, at any rate.

4278. But contests sometimes occur there, do they not?—Contests sometimes occur. There was a very severe contest when I was elected myself as a member of the town council.

4279. Are they not about the same people that vote in both elections?—Yes.

4280. Is there any rioting at the municipal elections?—Very little.

4281. You do not speak of your own knowledge about the treating?—I believe that very little treating exists. I believe that treating does exist, but it is to a very insignificant extent.

4282. The public-houses are open, are they not?—Yes.

4283. And drinking goes on?—It possibly does.

4284. You are not able to tell us what occurs at the municipal elections in that respect?—I cannot.

4285. Do the same practices occur at the Parliamentary elections with respect to the public-houses as regards treating?—Yes, I have no doubt they do.

4287. It was chiefly rioting, was it?—I think that what the Conservatives complained of most, was the extent of the rioting and the disgraceful extent of the intimidation.

4288. What did the police do under those circumstances?—Nothing whatever, I am sorry to say.

4289. What did the magistrates do?—The magistrates did very little, because they were powerless, according to the report of the head of the police. He said he had not force enough to act. I believe there were one or two policemen following the mobs, but they did nothing whatever to check the rioting, and after the election was all over, the number of men that were identified by the police as having taken a part in the riot was something perfectly insignificant, and they ought to have known hundreds of them.

4290. Perhaps if the magistrates and the police had done their duty, the riot could have been suppressed?—I think that it was perfectly out of the power of the police to have effectually checked the rioters after the mobs had begun their violence, and nothing less than calling out a very large military force would then have done.

4291. To what do you refer when you say, a very insignificant number?—I mean the insignicant number of the rioters who were identified by the police as rioters.

4292. What would be the difficulty in putting down a riot of that kind?—I cannot explain the difficulty; it looked to me something like an animus on the part of the police force not to check the rioters or to be able to identify them afterwards.

4293. How was it with the Bench; was there any animus there?—I think not. I think that the magistrates generally acted fairly.

4294. But they did nothing when the riot took place?—They did nothing. The fact was, reports were made to the sheriff of the disturbances that were taking place, and he very properly sent his under-sheriff to the different polling booths, and as fast as he went to one place the mob moved off to the others, and to most of the Conservative committee rooms, and they went from one polling booth to the other, intimidating voters on their way.

4295. Was any house property destroyed?—A very large amount of property, amounting, I dare say, to a couple of thousand pounds; possibly more.

4296. But was not it deserving of the attention of the magistrates; might not they have read the Riot Act if it became so serious as that?—If you ask me as a matter of opinion, I think that they ought to have read the Riot Act.

4297. In fact, if proper means had been taken, this riot could not have got head?—I think that the only proper means that could have been taken would have been to call in the large military force which were close at hand, and which were not called in.

4298. But you say that there was a want of good-will on the part of the police to stop the riot?—I think that the police showed a feeling rather in favour of the rioters by their conduct.

4299. Has there been any reflection cast upon them in the town in consequence?—Yes.

4300. Were any proceedings taken upon that?—None whatever.

4301. Had there been a riot of any kind before on any other occasion when the magistrates and the police would not interfere?—I have not heard of any other occasion upon which the police have declined to do their duty.

4302. Have they ever acted before at an election?—Yes, I suppose so.

4303. But as to what you know?—Yes; they have acted before.

4304. Tell us when the police acted to prevent rioting before?—At the previous election they were not called upon; at the election, in April, their services were not called for.

4305. They were not needed?—They were not needed.

4306. There was no riot then I think?—There was no riot.

4307. As to former occasions, I think, you say there had been riots in 1865?—No, I am not aware that I said so.

4308. I thought you said that there was a mob organised by the Conservatives in 1865?—A large number of Conservative voters were prevented from voting and did not vote; I am not aware that any riot took place.

4309. You do not know any other occasion on which the police did not act when they ought to have acted?—No; I think not.

4310. If they had acted this time there would have been no riot?—From the feeling and the determination with which those mobs were acting, I do not think that the force of police after a certain time of the day would have been sufficient to have quelled the riot.

4311. But there was no attempt on their part to put it down?—There was certainly no attempt whatever till quite late in the afternoon, when the election was decided.

4312. You said that it was believed that two of the leaders belonging to the Reform League came down from London with money and paid themselves, and paid the mob?—I have not said so.

4313. Then that is not what you intended to convey by what you said before?—What I said was this, that there was a report very general in Bristol that such a thing had taken place, and I believe that if occasion requires it can be proved.

4314. But you have no means of knowing it to be true; there has been no inquiry into it since?—I have no means of knowing it to be true, and so far as I know there has been no inquiry into it since.

4315. It was merely a rumour then, to the prejudice of all those persons who were on that side?—It was a rumour, but I believe that the rumour was perfectly well founded.

4316. Have you no reason which you can state to the Committee for that belief?—No; but I believe that if the police are applied to in Bristol there are members of that force who can identify the parties who paid the money, and those parties, I believe, can be proved to be members of the Reform League.

4317. Mr. Edward Egerton.] How soon after the election were those proceedings taken which resulted in those convictions of which you spoke?—I really cannot say; I should think it would be within a week or ten days.

4318. But you said that there was an indisposition on the part of the police to give evidence?—I did not say so; I believe that I said there was an indisposition to identify the parties.

4319. Then, upon what evidence were the men convicted?—Principally upon the evidence of civilians who were present.

4320. And who saw them taking part in those proceedings?—Yes; who saw them taking part in those proceedings.

4321. Was there any representation to the mayor made on the part of Mr. Miles's committee that their voters were prevented from coming up?—Yes, certainly there was.

4322. Did the mayor decline to give any assistance?—I think I said just now that it was the sheriff who was in authority there, and he sent the deputy sheriff round to the polling booths.

4323. Were no special constables sworn in?—None at all.

4324. And yet, notwithstanding all this, there was no petition presented?—There was no petition presented.

4325. Why was there no petition presented?—I cannot say, but I believe it has been a source of great regret to the Conservatives that it was not presented.

4326. You were a member of Mr. Miles's committee, were you not?—I was.

4327. What was the majority which Mr. Miles had in the April election?—The gross majority on the whole; I really cannot say, but I believe it was a matter of hundreds.

4328. Can you mention what the number of the constituency was at the election in April?—I am just as likely to be wrong as not, but I believe it was something like 17,000 or 18,000.

4329. Do you know what increase to the constituency was made by the late Act?—I believe it was about 5,000 or 6,000.

4331. Do you know what the constituency at the present moment is?—I believe it is a little over 22,000.

4332. You have told us, have you not, that bribery has been upon the increase in the Parliamentary elections?—I do not think I stated that.

4333. You stated that there was a great deal of bribery at the time of Sir Morton Peto's election, did you not?—I said that I thought that was the beginning of the bribery to any extent.

4334. When was Sir Morton Peto elected?—In 1865.

4335. Was that his first election?—I think that was his first election.

4336. Did that system of paying men for their day's pay in the shape of messengers begin upon that occasion, or was that an old practice in Bristol?—I cannot say; I cannot go back beyond two or three elections, for I had not taken at all an active part in them.

4337. You have known Bristol for a great many years, I think?—Yes, I have known Bristol for 17 years intimately.

4338. Are you now a member of the town council?—I am.

4339. Has this subject of undue influence at the last election been brought before the town council?—It has not.

4340. How is the bench constituted at Bristol; what number of Conservatives are there?—That I cannot answer positively; I believe it is as nearly as possible half and half.

4341. And yet no steps were taken in consequence of this rioting at the last election to bring it before the Home authorities in any way?—I have not heard of any.

4342. For whose interest were those prosecutions commenced?—I suppose for the parties who were assaulted and who suffered.

4343. Were they chiefly complaints in the nature of assaults?—They were principally.

4344. Has there been any representation made for the payment of money for the property which was destroyed?—Yes.

4345. Upon whom have they come?—They have come upon the Conservatives, who were willing to recompense the Conservative sufferers, and I believe considerable sums have been paid by the parties themselves.

4346. They have had to bear the loss?—Yes, they have had to bear the loss.

4347. You have stated that those men were paid by strangers, and yet the police would be able to identify them?—Not upon my own knowledge; I stated that that was the current report.

4348. Has there been no attempt made to get hold of those strangers?—I have heard of none.

4349. The O'Conor Don.] You stated that there were several serious assaults during those riots; of what character were those assaults?—Some of them were exceedingly brutal and cowardly.

Major Robert Bush.

pensioner wielded a weapon over the man's head several times, and made use of most fearful language, and it ended, of course, in the man's opening the gate. Upon another occasion, I cannot say that I saw it done, but I believe it could be shown also, the extent to which they carried their mischief and violence, I myself saw a stone that was thrown into a house which weighed 4½ lbs. (I saw it weighed myself), which struck a man, in a house where Conservative colours were shown, in the back, and certainly if it had hit him on his head it must have killed the man. That man was ready to swear to that occurrence having taken place; and many acts of violence, which might not have been of a very deadly character, but equally brutal to this, were committed by this particular mob.

4351. What was the greatest amount of punishment awarded at any one conviction for those assaults?—I think this man, the pensioner, if I recollect rightly, received six weeks.

4352. He was considered the chief offender, was he?—I really cannot say that; I certainly have always put him down as being about one of the worst of them; I think there were some others that received three months.

4353. You stated that there was an idea prevalent in the town before the election, that if the Liberal candidates were not in a large majority at 9 o'clock, those mobs were to be let loose; how long before the election was this idea prevalent?—A day or two.

4354. Then this mob violence was expected a day or two before the election?—Yes, I think it was.

4355. Were there no precautions taken by the authorities, knowing that those mobs were being prepared?—Nothing more was done that I am aware of. At a Liberal meeting some conspicuous members of the Liberals actually advised the very course that was adopted; they advised the taking possession of the polling booths, and holding them till the election was won; and I believe that at one of those very meetings the successful candidate, Mr. Morley, was present.

4356. Was that long before the day of the election?—I cannot say; I should think possibly a week previous to it.

4357. Was that announced publicly?—It was, at a public meeting of the Liberals, because the Liberal candidate was there.

4358. You say that about a week before the election, at a public meeting of one party, it was proposed that the polling booths should be taken possession of by the mob?—Yes, those words were used, as nearly as possible; that certainly was quite the spirit of them, at any rate.

4359. And in spite of that there was no precaution taken, either in the way of having additional police force or the military in the town?—Not that I am aware of.

4360. You state that there was a large body of military in the neighbourhood?—Yes, which was quite sufficient to have quelled any disturbance.

4361. Were they brought there specially for the election?—No; they were quartered there; it was the head quarters of the 3rd Buffs.

4362. And there was no use made of their being in the neighbourhood in the way of calling them in to assist or help the police?—No.

4363. Mr. Leatham.] You stated that it was known some days before that in all probability this kind of mob violence would be resorted to; what precautions were taken by the Conservative side?—I really do not know that any precautions were taken.

4364. But you say that a retaliation took place later on in the day?—Yes; I believe it could be shown that the Conservatives who were brought before the magistrates were brought up charged with offences that were committed, I believe, quite late in the day.

4365. Was all this rioting late in the day?—No, certainly not; the principal rioting by the Liberal mob was quite early in the day; I should think the principal rioting took place from 10 to 12 o'clock, and it was during that time that the chief amount of intimidation was practised.

4366. Did you watch the mob going from one polling booth to another?—I did not; it was no part of my business.

4367. I thought you stated that you did?—I believe it is beyond doubt that they did this, because there they were at the different booths.

4368. But not the same mob?—Different mobs.

4369. Then it was not one mob going from one booth to the other?—No, certainly not; there were several mobs, but all evidently under the direction of particular leaders, and a motion of the hand was sufficient for them to stop at particular houses of Conservatives and attack them.

4370. How many persons were there in the mob which you saw?—I should think 300.

4371. Is that considered a mob in Bristol?—I considered it so; I think, without assuming too much, I may say that I may form some opinion of it, for I have been upon more than one occasion called out to assist the civil power, and I may say that I never saw a more formidable mob, although they did not number more than 300.

4372. Were they walking in procession?—No; not in procession, almost in military array; there was considerable degree of order observed.

4373. That is not what you consider a procession?—You may term it a procession; I should not express myself in that way.

4374. Are you quite sure that they were not going to poll?—No; I cannot be certain about that; I began my evidence by stating that I fully believed that hardly a man in the mob was a voter.

4375. You say that there were 30 or 40 convictions?—Yes, and I should think more.

4376. Were all those convictions on one side?—Certainly not.

4377. Were the majority on the side of the Conservatives?—That I cannot say; I should think, certainly, by far the most serious offences with which the parties were charged were those of charges against the Liberals; I speak now particularly as regards assaults.

4378. Would you be surprised if you were told that the majority of the convictions were against members of your own party?—I think it is quite possible that they might be; it would not surprise me, because I think that the cases that were brought against the Conservatives were mostly of a trivial character, and they were brought for a particular purpose.

4379. And yet you think that the bench acted with great discretion and fairness?—I have no fault myself to complain of as against the bench.

4380. You said that part of the damages were paid by the Conservatives?—Yes.

4381. Were

4381. Were all the damages paid by the Conservatives?—Certainly not.

4382. Was any portion paid by the other party?—I have not heard of it.

4383. Sir George Grey.] Were those people convicted by the local magistrates in Bristol?—Yes, certainly.

4384. Was there any difficulty in getting evidence?—I cannot myself speak of any particular difficulty.

4385. You were a member, you said, of Mr. Miles's committee in 1868?—Yes.

4386. And again a member of the committee at the last general election?—Yes.

4387. And you had a previous knowledge that those mobs were to be brought out, on the day of the polling, in a certain event?—There was a report that a certain course would be adopted.

4388. Did not you say just now that two or three days before the election you knew that it was intended that, if the two Liberal candidates were not in a large majority at nine o'clock, those mobs were to be brought out?—That was the general rumour, and it was verified.

4390. Although Mr. Miles's committee had this knowledge, you are not aware that they took any means for protecting the voters against this intimidation?—I am not aware of it. I have heard, and I believe it is correct, that the troops had some sort of intimation sent to them that possibly their services might be required, and I know that they were kept under arms in readiness.

4391. Do you not know a case in which special constables have been appointed in Bristol?—Of my own knowledge I do not.

4392. Do you know the mode in which they can be appointed?—No, I am sorry to say I must plead ignorance to that also; I really do not know; I suppose it is upon sworn information, or some process of that sort.

4393. But no such sworn information was laid before the magistrates?—I have not heard of it.

4394. You were a member, you said, of Mr. Miles's committee in 1868; did you take much interest in the petition which was presented against his return?—I did take some interest in it.

4395. You said just now that you believe that he was declared not duly elected for something connected with bribery; are you not aware that the report of the Committee enumerated a good many persons by name who had been bribed by persons acting as the agents for Mr. Miles?—I wished to have stated that it did not appear that Mr. Miles himself had taken any personal part in the bribery; of course I am aware that he was unseated for acts of bribery by his agents.

4396. He was acquitted of any personal knowledge of the bribery?—He was acquitted of all personal knowledge, I believe.

4397. Still there were a considerable number of persons proved before that Committee, were there not, to have been bribed, and to have given votes in consequence of those bribes?—Undoubtedly; there were, I believe, one or two.

4398. Was not it also proved that treating prevailed to some extent?—Yes, I think it was.

Major Robert Bush.

30 April 1869.

4399. Is it not the case generally at Bristol that the public-houses are opened at the time of the election; I mean that they are opened at the expense of the candidates or their agents?—I think they were; I am not aware of any public-houses having been opened by the Conservatives.

4400. Not at the election of 1868?—No, certainly not in 1868.

4401. Do you believe that there was this treating which the Committee reported upon in 1868?—I cannot say that there was.

4402. Was there much drunkenness at Bristol at the time of the election?—Yes, I should think there was.

4403. Have you any remedy to propose for those evils of which you have been speaking?—No.

4404. Do you not think that it would be desirable to close the public-houses at the time of election?—Yes, I think that if that could be done, it would be desirable.

4405. Do you think that the evil is incurable and that the elections at Bristol must always be conducted in this way, and do you abandon all hope of any remedy?—I think myself from what took place at the last election, there is still so strong a feeling existing that if ever there should be a contest again, unless immense strength were given to the police or a large military force were ordered in, there would almost be a certainty of bloodshed taking place.

4406. You think that the remedy against intimidation would be to have an increased police force, and a military force in attendance?—Not the only remedy.

4407. What other remedy would you suggest?—There might possibly be a different way of taking the votes adopted, such as voting papers or something of that sort; I do not know whether it would come properly within the scope of my evidence, but perhaps I might be allowed to say, that already some steps have been taken by the town council of Bristol upon the subject of doing away with the nomination of the candidates and the declaration of the poll; we think that that would be exceedingly beneficial.

4408. You said that there were mobs on both sides at the nomination?—Yes, there were mobs on both sides, and both equally violent.

4409. Was there much difficulty in obtaining a hearing for the candidates?—It was a perfect caricature of the whole form, because there was not a single word heard from either of the candidates.

4410. What was the majority by which the successful candidates were returned at the last election over Mr. Miles; was not it about 2,000?—No, it was a little over 1,000, I think.

4411. Just look at the numbers in Dodd, and see whether they are correct?—Berkeley, 8,759; Morley, 8,417; Miles, 6,694; I was not aware that the majority was so great. The fact was, after 12 o'clock, the intimidation having commenced, many of the committee rooms were closed, and the Conservatives gave up, seeing that the people were actually afraid to go out of their houses to vote for Miles.

4412. You do not know how many remained unpolled?—I do not; but I can tell you that, as far as promises were concerned to Mr. Miles, something like 900; and I can also tell you that at the previous election (to show the correctness of the canvass), the gross number polled for Miles was within something like 150 of the actual canvass return.

Major Robert Bush.

4413. Did those 900 abstain altogether from voting, or did not any of them vote on the other side?—Yes, I dare say a portion of them voted on the other side. There were cases of men who took a leading part on the Conservative side; for instance, I can refer to one person, the chairman of the Conservative Operatives' Association; he made three different attempts to get from his house to vote, and was intimidated and driven back, and I believe on one occasion he was very seriously assaulted; I merely mention that as one of a very large number of cases. I might mention the case of another man, who was told that if he voted he would be assaulted; he did vote, and he was assaulted, and very seriously damaged.

4414. What is the number of the police in Bristol?—I should think it is under 400, but I may be wrong; I may be out 100, one way or the other.

4415. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What is the population of Bristol?—The population of Bristol and the suburbs, I suppose, is about 150,000.

4416. Chairman.] Do you desire to see the adoption of the system of voting by means of papers?—I think voting papers might remedy a good deal of the evil.

4417. But for that reason do you desire to see their adoption?—I should myself individually.

4418. You do not take much interest in the municipal elections, you say?—No, I do not.

4419. You have not watched personally what is the effect of voting by means of papers at those elections?—No, I have not.

4420. Do you not think that although with a system of voting papers the elections might be more tranquil, that system might be open to other objections?—I am not aware of the objections.

4421. Would not it make bribery more easy?—I do not think it would make it much easier than it is at present.

4422. Would it not make the exercise of undue influence by one individual towards another very much easier?—I cannot see it myself.

4423. Have you considered what would be the effect of the adoption of the ballot upon the tranquillity of elections?—I have not given it any consideration, or very little. I think that the adoption of the ballot, generally speaking, would be very ill received by the Conservative portion of the electors.

4424. Why?—I am not prepared to give my reasons, but merely as a matter that you occasionally hear talked of as being un-English, and contrary to their general notions.

4425. In your opinion, would it be likely that those scenes of riot and intimidation would continue under a system of voting by ballot?—I think it is possible that they might, inasmuch as a great deal of riot, intimidation, and treating takes place before the election, and I do not see how the ballot can put a stop to that.

4426. I understand that the violence which you have described to the Committee did take place on the day of the polling?—It did.

4427. And with the object of preventing Conservative voters who were known, from coming up to the poll?—I presume that that was the object.

4428. Have you considered whether it would be so likely that the same sort of mobs would be organised if the system of secret voting were adopted?—The object would not, I think, be gained by anything of the sort; and the feeling generally, I think, amongst Conservatives is against secret voting.

4429. Mr. Hunt.] The ballot has been very much discussed in Bristol, has it not?—Yes, I think it has occasionally.

4430. I think your own Member is in the habit of bringing forward the question in the House of Commons?—Yes, he generally takes every opportunity of bringing it forward upon any public occasion.

4431. Has not that given occasion to a good deal of discussion in Bristol upon the subject?—Yes, I think it has.

4432. You say you think that the Conservative party generally are against it; do you know whether the Liberal party are in favour of it there?—I should consider it presumptuous in me to offer an opinion as regards the Liberal portion of the voters.

4433. Do you know whether the advocacy of the ballot by your Member for Bristol gained him any support in the city?—I do not find that the feeling in favour of the ballot, either amongst the Conservatives or the Liberals, is on the increase at all. I give that merely as my individual opinion.

4434. What is your own opinion; do you think that if the ballot system were instituted, the secrecy would be maintained by the voters?—I do not think it would have that effect.

4435. Since this last election, when you say all this intimidation was employed, has there been no discussion about the ballot amongst the Conservatives in Bristol?—No, I do not think there has been much discussion. I have heard a few Conservatives, and some of them leading ones, express favourable opinions with regard to voting papers, but I do not think that the ballot goes down with them at all.

4436. Have they not considered whether the ballot would be a protection against this kind of intimidation which you have described?—I have heard very little said about the ballot per se.

Mr. Frederick Stokes, called in; and Examined.

Mr. F. Stokes.

4437. Mr. Hunt.] Do you reside at Kingstown?—No, I reside in Dublin; my country house is near Kingstown.

4438. You are a magistrate, are you not, for the county?—Yes.

4439. Have you resided in that neighbourhood for a great many years?—In Dublin for the last 40 years.

4440. Have you taken an interest for the greater part of that time both in the Parliamentary and the municipal elections?—I have taken an interest in most of them during that time, both in Dublin and in the county of Dublin.

4441. There is a local Act regulating the municipal elections in Kingstown, is there not?—Yes, and also in Rathmines, of which I am chairman.

4442. Are Kingstown and Rathmines under separate Acts?—Yes; each under a separate Act. I am chairman of Rathmines and Rathgar, which which is now connected with Kingstown, and have been so for many years.

4443. You are also a commissioner under the Local Act of Rathmines?—A commissioner in both places.

4444. Do those commissioners perform the duties which are performed by town councils in other places?—Yes, substantially they do.

4445. What is the mode of election?—The mode of election is personally appearing there.

4446. Do they vote by voting papers?—No; they vote in person.

4447. What is the qualification?—The qualification in Rathmines is a 10*l.* householder, and in Kingstown a 4*l.* householder.

4448. Have you contests in Kingstown in the elections of commissioners?—There have been frequently; not very frequently; but several.

4449. And do the elections turn on politics at all?—Yes, entirely; everything does in Ireland. In Rathmines we had an overwhelming Conservative majority, so that no politics enter into the contests there.

4450. But at Kingstown parties I believe are tolerably equally divided, are they not?—No; the Conservative candidate had a considerable majority there at the Parliamentary election, and they ought to have a very great majority in the municipal also.

4451. Have you frequent contests in Kingstown?—There have been two or three within my notice. I have never taken part in any of them myself.

4452. Is there freedom of election at those elections in Kingstown, or is there any kind of intimidation or undue influence used?—One can hardly call it intimidation, but certainly there is no freedom of election.

4453. How is freedom of election prevented?—The constituency is a very considerable one. I heard the other day that it was about 1,200. The election is held in a very small room, and this is usually filled by a mob who prevent the Conservative voters from coming up till it is too late. They are all men of business, and it is impossible for them to wait. They go from Kingstown to Dublin for their business early in the morning, and the poll opens at nine, and closes at four, and the only time when they can vote conveniently is between nine and ten, and in point of fact, I believe, they never can vote except they vote on the Liberal side.

4454. Are they obstructed from voting by mobs?—They are obstructed from voting by the room being filled with the workmen of the commissioners and others, some of whom have votes and some have none.

4455. Is there no means of multiplying the places for voting under the Act?—Parliament is just about passing a new Act; in fact a Bill was passed last week for the purpose of abolishing the present mode of the election of the Commissioners, providing a remedy for that to which I have referred; cutting it up into several wards so that each man can vote without obstruction, and also providing a revising barrister to make a list of voters for the purpose of enabling men to vote who are entitled to do so. Another mode of obstruction is to challenge every one who comes up, and to cause as much delay as possible in discussing his qualifications.

4456. Is it the fact that at those contests a large number of voters have been prevented from voting by reason of the polling place being besieged by a mob?—The Committee will judge of that when I say that, out of about 1,200 voters not more than about 250 or 300 have ever voted, and the majority has always been on the Liberal side, although the voters in reality, there is no doubt, are immeasurably on the other side.

4457. Is there any other kind of influence used to prevent persons voting, or to induce them to vote in a particular way at those elections?—Not that I am aware of; priestly influence goes a very long way in Ireland, and it enters into the elections.

4458. You know something, do you not, about the Dublin City elections?—I have been at most of them.

4459. Both the municipal and the Parliamentary?—Yes, both.

4460. Just take the municipal first; is there any bribery at the municipal elections in Dublin?—Very little; there are one or two wards inhabited by a low class of voters, and it is generally understood that they get something for coming up; but that is always on one side, the Liberal side. The ward is composed of a low class of voters who will not come up at all unless they are paid; but it is not frequent.

4461. Are they paid for their loss of time?—It is generally understood that they get 15*s.* or 1*l.* a piece at the municipal elections; I am confining myself now to one ward, it has been a matter of notoriety that the thing has been done there.

4462. What ward is that?—I think it is called the North Dock, but that is only on one or two occasions.

4463. Do the municipal elections turn on politics in Dublin?—Entirely; no other ingredient appears to enter into them.

4464. Do ministers of religion take any interest in the municipal elections in Dublin?—They do; the Roman Catholic clergy take a very active interest.

4465. How do they vote at the municipal elections in Dublin?—They vote in person from the registration list.

4466. What is the qualification?—None at all; that is to say, there is no money qualification for the municipal elections.

4467. Is there any register?—Yes, there is a register; the qualification is rating and residence.

4468. All rated and resident inhabitants, householders, are entitled to vote?—Yes, a 5*s.* cabin will qualify.

4469. The O'Conor Don.] Is anyone rated in Dublin unless his premises or house is up to a certain value?—For Parliamentary purposes 4*l.* is the limit; for municipal purposes, I believe, there is no limit.

4470. Mr. Hunt.] Have the freemen votes at the municipal elections?—No, not at the municipal elections.

4471. Do I understand that all rated inhabitants vote?—All rated inhabitants who have occupied the same premises, I think, for three years consecutively, and have paid their taxes.

4472. You stated that the Roman Catholic priests exercise a good deal of influence at the municipal elections; in what way do they exercise that influence?—They call public meetings; they take the chair at those public meetings; and they act in every way as partizans on the Liberal side.

4473. That is to say, they take the chair as citizens, but do they exercise their influence as ministers of religion?—I cannot tell you, because I am not a Roman Catholic, but there is no doubt of the fact that they do reach every Roman Catholic in some way.

30 April 1869.

4474. But you are not able to say how?—No; I am not, but it is by spiritual intimidation that the thing is done.

4475. You, I think, were concerned in managing one Parliamentary election?—I managed the election of 1852 for the high sheriff.

4476. Did you manage it for a candidate at that time?—No; the sheriff would not give the election to the sub-sheriff; he wished to keep it in his own hands, and I managed it entirely for him as a friend, not professionally.

4477. Did you return for him?—No.

4478. You acted as deputy?—I acted as sub-sheriff on that occasion only.

4479. Out of friendship for the sheriff?—Yes; he was a gentleman with whom I was largely engaged in business, and I undertook the management of it for him.

4480. Was that election conducted peaceably and purely?—I would not say much for the purity of it, but it was perfectly peaceable; we had an overwhelming force of police and troops if any attempt had been made to break the peace.

4481. On that occasion did you increase the number of polling places?—On that occasion the law first came into force which scattered the polling-places all over the city, instead of concentrating them in one spot.

4483. Do you know anything about the Parliamentary elections since 1852?—Yes; I have been present at all of them.

4484. What has been the character of those elections, first, as regards bribery?—Excepting on very rare occasions there has been bribery on both sides.

4485. How was it as to treating?—No, there has not been much treating.

4486. Was it by direct money payments?—Yes, by direct money payments.

4487. As regards mob intimidation, how has it been?—There has not been much of that.

4488. As regards spiritual influence?—Spiritual influence is of course paramount on those occasions among the Roman Catholics.

4489. Is it the case that the Roman Catholic voters look to their priest to tell them how to vote?—Entirely, I imagine so; I cannot speak from my own personal knowledge, but I know in many cases where Roman Catholic voters have promised me to vote, in 99 cases out of every 100 they have broken their word, and I refer that to the influence of the priest, because they were otherwise persons who would have liked to have voted as I wished.

4490. But the influence of the priest was so great that they were constrained to vote against their own inclinations?—Yes, against their own inclinations.

4491. Then are you in favour of voting papers?—I think voting papers, combined with a very minute subdivision of the polling places, so as to bring only a moderate number to each place, would be the most efficient remedy that I can see.

4492. A remedy for what?—For preventing either intimidation or bribery.

4493. Voting papers are in use now to some extent in Dublin, are they not?—They are used for Poor Law purposes.

4496. You think that the ballot would not be any protection from the priests?—It could not, because they would have to tell their priests that they had voted.

4497. When would they have to tell their priests how they had voted?—Whenever they were asked, and at confession, as a matter of course, but it would not necessitate that, because they would not refuse to tell the priest; they dare not.

4498. You think in no case would they refuse to tell the priest?—There are a few independent Roman Catholics, but very few.

4499. So that the priest would in every case be able to worm out of a voter how he had voted?—He would not need to worm it out, he would tell him at once.

4500. In that case you think the priest would have means to prevent the voter voting against his wish another time?—Yes, a Conservative would have no means whatever of knowing how a voter voted; he might say that he had voted for the Conservatives, when, in reality, he had voted for the other party.

4501. If you had a Conservative priest, I presume he could get the information out of the voter?—If there was such a thing as a Conservative priest.

4502. Putting aside the question of Conservative or Liberal, you think that in all cases a priest would be able to get the information from the voter?—Yes; there might be a rare exception of independence, but it is very rare.

4503. So that as regards Roman Catholic voters in Ireland, you think that the ballot would be no protection whatever?—You might just as well hand over the election, as far as the Roman Catholic voters are concerned, to the priests.

4504. At the present time, are Roman Catholic voters amenable to other influences besides that of the priest?—I think they are; I only speak of the county of Dublin, which is the only county I know

I know much about. I think, as a rule, they prefer voting for their landlords, from motives of self interest no doubt.

4505. Do the landlords exercise any undue influence over them?—They expect their tenants to vote for them. I daresay the other side would call that undue influence; but at the last election but one for the county of Dublin we had to bring all the country voters, or most of them to the city, and keep them there till the day of the election, to prevent them being worked upon by the priests.

4506. Then at all those elections it is generally a question with the country voters between landlord and priest, in the case of a Roman Catholic voter?—Very generally so, but sometimes they split and give one to the landlord and the other to the priest.

4507. And you think that if you had the ballot, and secrecy was maintained against the landlord, the priest would have the entire influence?—Every one of them would vote against us.

4508. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Did you not say that the voting in the municipal elections was personal voting?—Yes.

4509. Have you a system of the nominations of candidates, or how are the candidates brought before the notice of the community?—By advertisement, and that is one of the evils I should have mentioned. At Kingstown, people complain that instead of letting voters poll as the law allows at nine o'clock, they get up this humbug of nomination, by which considerable time is wasted in speech making.

4510. And that is the reason why the poll is not taken of those who attend?—Yes, generally speaking, they make long speeches in nominating candidates.

4511. For the purpose of shutting out the voters?—Yes, for the purpose of shutting out the voters. I entirely confine myself to Kingstown, because in Dublin it is perfectly free; every man in Dublin can vote without the least difficulty or delay.

4512. Do you think that the evils which you have spoken of would be remedied by having a greater number of polling places?—The evil is about to be remedied in this particular case in the Kingstown Improvement Bill.

4513. Does that Bill do away with the hours of nine and four?—No, it leaves the hours, but it cuts it up into small polling places, and it makes them have a register, which prevents the time being wasted in discussing the right of voters to vote.

4514. You alluded to the election for the county of Dublin, before this last one, when you said it was necessary to bring up the country voters and keep them in Dublin; will you state the reason why that was done?—To prevent them falling into the hands of the priest was the avowed reason.

4515. Had those voters promised to vote?—They had promised their landlords to vote.

4516. And you were afraid that in the interval means might be found to get them to vote otherwise?—Yes.

4517. Have you any acquaintance with elections in other parts of Ireland besides Dublin?—Not any.

4518. You speak from a general knowledge of Ireland?—Yes, from general knowledge.

4519. You think that spiritual influence is very largely exercised in elections?—Very largely.

4520. Is it a matter of notoriety that every Roman Catholic consults his priest upon all those occasions?—Not particularly consults him, but he takes the wishes of his priest.

4521. The O'Conor Don.] I think you have told the Committee that everything which you object to with respect to the municipal elections at Kingstown is being done away with by a private Act that is about to be passed?—I think that the evils will be very much remedied; I can speak with regard to my own township of Rathmines, that when there has been a contest, which has been some 10 or 12 years ago, there was no difficulty whatever in taking the poll.

4522. Do you believe that after the passing of this Act all those difficulties which you say exist at present in the way of voters recording their votes will be removed?—If honestly administered.

4523. How do you mean by honestly administered?—I consider that the Act at present is not honestly administered, because undue influence is thrown on to the side of the Liberal party, and in a new election they will inevitably return a majority of Conservatives.

4524. I understood you to say that the difficulties at present were difficulties arising from the smallness of the room, and from the consequent waste of time from the moment the poll opened till it closed?—Yes; but the chairman could remedy all that if he liked, because he has power to provide as many booths as he pleases at present.

4525. This Bill gives no further power in that respect?—It gives no further power in that respect, but it compels the division into wards.

4526. Of course each ward will have a separate chairman?—Yes.

4527. And a separate polling booth?—Yes.

4528. Therefore the new Bill makes compulsory what at present would be at the option of the chairman, namely, having more polling places?—Yes; I fancy the Bill also provides a barrister to oversee the register of electors.

4529. I understood you to say that very little bribery or corrupt practices prevailed at the municipal elections in Dublin?—Very little; not worth speaking of.

4530. You made an exception to that with regard to the north ward?—It was spoken of as having been done on one or two occasions by bribery in that small style, about 1 l. a head.

4531. Is that ward usually contested?—There are very frequent contests; I may say it is usually contested.

4532. Was it contested on the last occasion?—It was, and the man was turned out, because he had voted for a Protestant for the municipal election.

4533. It was a contest by two Liberals then?—Yes, by two Liberals; by a sort of Tory-Liberal, and an out-and-out Liberal.

4534. That ward is considered usually a Liberal ward?—Yes, certainly.

4535. It is not usually contested by Tories?—Not very frequently; Tories have no chance there at all; it was a fight between two Liberals.

4536. You stated that all rated inhabitants in Dublin vote at the municipal elections, is that so?—They are entitled to vote under certain conditions; ditions; every rated person; it does not require to be a householder.

Mr. F. Stokes.

4537. Is there any qualification for being rated?—None at all, I think, except residence for three years and payment of taxes, occupation of a house, or keeping a counting-house, or some other things in the city; an actual residence, if not in the city, within seven miles of it.

4538. When you say payment of taxes, what taxes do you mean?—I think the poor rate, and some one or two others.

4539. Is any man rated to the poor rate in Ireland who does not inhabit a tenement over 4 l. in value?—Yes.

4540. Is that an exception in Dublin?—No, I think not; you may be rated anywhere where you claim to be rated and pay rates.

4541. You are rated upon claiming to be rated, is that what you say?—I cannot answer the question; I do not know how they get on, but I know they do get on.

4542. Persons inhabiting houses under 4 l. in value do get on?—Yes; there are very few in Dublin that come under that category; but the municipal contests are carried on so fiercely that every possible strength is got hold of.

4543. You stated, did you not, that those elections, as far as Roman Catholic voters are concerned, are all carried by spiritual intimidation?—I did not go so far as that, but it enters into every election, more or less.

4544. Will you explain what you mean by spiritual intimidation?—The influence which a priest has over the conscience of the members of his flock.

4545. The influence that he has in persuading a man that one thing is right and another thing is wrong, is that what you mean?—He will incur spiritual destruction if he does not take the priest's view of it; that is what I conceive to be spiritual intimidation.

4546. You conceive that spiritual intimidation is the influence which a priest, as any other person in the community, would have in persuading a man that a certain course was a right one?—The priest will say that voting against the Liberal party is voting against his God; that is the way it is put.

4547. Have you ever heard that expression used, or are you speaking now from hearsay?—It is a matter of notoriety; I have heard it, but I will not undertake to say it.

4548. You will not undertake to say that you ever heard that expression used?—Certainly not; I have heard it from the lips of Roman Catholics, and that was their view of it.

4549. Their view was, that if they voted against the priest they were voting against their God?—Yes, quite.

4550. Is this the way that Roman Catholics speak upon the subject?—Yes, that they are bound to look up to the priest for instruction, and to follow his direction.

4551. Because they believe the priest to be right?—Yes, because they believe the priest to be right, and to have the power of influencing them.

4552. Then it was no intimidation on the part of the priest, because those people believed that the priest's view must be right, and consequently followed it?—That is one way of putting it, no doubt, but there is a bodily intimidation as well, because if this man did not follow the directions of the priest, if he was rebellious, he would be very apt to get mob violence in addition.

4553. Then the intimidation is of two classes, the one being direct intimidation on the part of the priest?—Pressure, if you like.

4554. It is priestly pressure for a priest to tell a man who believes that the priest is right, that a certain candidate ought to be supported; that you consider priestly pressure?—Yes.

4555. In addition to that, you say that there is a second spiritual pressure brought to bear upon the voters?—I cannot call it spiritual pressure; I meant mob pressure.

4556. Mob pressure, induced through ecclesiastical or spiritual authority?—Quite so, supporting the priest's spiritual influence by physical influence.

4557. Do you believe that the priests enforce their spiritual influence by this mob intimidation?—Yes.

4558. Is that carried on to any great extent?—Not in Dublin.

4559. Neither in the county, nor in the city?—Neither in the county, nor in the city.

4560. You stated to the Committee that upon a certain election in the county, the Conservative party had to take their voters into Dublin?—They brought a large number of them in, some couple of hundred.

4561. How long before the election?—A week I should think, quite.

4562. How did they bring them in; was it in large bodies?—That I cannot answer, but I believe it was in large bodies.

4563. Did they come in accompanied by military or the police?—No, they came in by themselves.

4564. Did the voters walk in by themselves?—They came by railway train, I presume, and they were entertained at various hotels in Dublin.

4565. They were, in fact, treated during that week?—Yes, they lived like fighting cocks that week.

4566. You did not consider that that was a breach of the Corrupt Practices Act?—I am very sure it was, but nobody did the treating; how it managed was not known to anybody.

4567. Did the voters pay for their treat that week?—No, certainly not; I imagine they did not; indeed I know they did not, but somebody paid for them.

4568. Some one on the Conservative side?—That is a fair inference.

4569. And you stated that they were brought to Dublin a week before the election in order to take them out of the reach of ecclesiastical influence?—Yes; on a former election, I believe, they were sent away altogether down to the country, out of the way of the election, so that they could not have been polled at the election by the opposite party.

4570. In those cases is it the landlord that brings the voters in, or do the men come in of themselves?—They come in, I think, rather in neighbourhoods, a body from one neighbourhood. I do not think that the landlord exactly brought them in, but they came in considerable bodies.

4571. Did they express a wish themselves to come in?—I did not see any of them, so that I cannot tell.

4572. You never heard that they did?—I did hear that they did; that they did not wish to be found at home.

4573. You have been mixed up a good deal with with those elections, you say?—In the county of Dublin I have taken a deep interest in all of them.

4574. Have you belonged to any Conservative committee?—No, I never formed part of any political combination of any kind.

4575. Have you never heard that a Conservative landlord would be requested to send in all his tenants a week before?—I think it is just probable, but I never heard of it.

4576. The vote of his tenant would be considered to belong to him?—I cannot put it so strongly as that in the county of Dublin, because they are tolerably independent, but most of the Conservative landlords in the county of Dublin are very popular, and the tenants, as a rule, unless there is strong pressure on the other side, will vote with them; and they always have voted with them of late years.

4577. A Conservative candidate who wanted Roman Catholic occupiers to vote for him would go to the landlord; I suppose he would not go to the tenants?—He would go to both, I believe; he would probably go to the landlord first, and go round with him to the tenants.

4578. He would not suggest to the landlord, have all your Roman Catholic tenants brought in a week before the election?—I am sure he would not be such a fool as to suggest it himself; he could leave it to somebody else to do that.

4579. But it would be done on his behalf, would it not?—I think it very probable.

4581. Who took them to the Exhibition?—Somebody in charge of them who attended to their wants. I do not mean that they were in custody. I mean that they were in the charge of persons waiting upon them and keeping them together.

4582. They were kept together, were they?—Yes, they were kept together, of course.

4583. They were not allowed to go out as free men into the city, individually, as they wished?—I think it is very likely they were not.

4584. They were under a sort of surveillance?—They could have gone as they liked, but they kept together as a matter of understanding.

4585. As a matter of understanding, will you explain why they were kept together, if they were quite willing to be in those places that were provided for them?—They were not kept in the house; they went out whenever they liked, but I apprehend they did not let them scatter, because it would have been a hard matter to get them together again.

4586. Why would it be a hard matter to get them together again, if it was their own wish to be there?—That I cannot tell you.

4587. At all events, they were not allowed to scatter?—I fancy not.

4588. When they were at the Exhibition, were they brought in a body, under the charge of one leader?—A gentleman of the party went with them, and took and showed them round, because it had been charged upon us at the nomination that they were imprisoned.

4589. In order to show that they were not imprisoned, they were sent there under the charge of a certain individual?—There was a gentleman of the party went with them.

4590. Only one gentleman?—That is all.

4591. He would see of course if any one of them made an attempt to separate himself from the rest of the party; that was the object of sending him?—There was not any likelihood of their separating, because they were getting too good living; that was about the best thing towards keeping them together.

4592. If that be the case, I want to know why they were sent out in a body at all; why they were not left to walk about the city just as they pleased?—I think it was done in answer to a charge made at the hustings that they were imprisoned.

4593. You think letting them out at all, even in a body, was merely done in answer to that charge?—I think it very probable.

4594. You think that but for that they would not have been let out at all?—I do not know that; I do not know that they were not let out; you are assuming that.

4595. You told us that they were let out in a body?—They were kept together, that is all I know.

4596. From that we should naturally conclude that they were not allowed to go individually into the city if they wished?—They would go if they liked, but poor country people from a country place were not likely to go straying about the city, but they might have gone if they had liked.

4597. Do you consider that at present there really is freedom of election at county elections in Ireland?—Certainly not; in the country parts of Ireland certainly there is no sort of freedom, but I know nothing personally except of the county of Dublin.

4598. You were asked a question with respect to what effect the establishment of the ballot would have, and you stated that it would be to hand the Roman Catholic voters altogether over to the Roman Catholic clergy?—Yes; because they would have the means of knowing which way a voter voted, and the opposite party would not.

4599. In what way would they have the means of knowing which way a voter voted?—They would disclose it, as a matter of course, to their priests.

4600. Of their own free will?—Of their own free will.

4601. Without any intimidation on the part of the priests?—No, no intimidation; they would answer the question the same as I would answer what o'clock it was.

4602. With regard to those voters who would vote according as the priest wished them, do you think, if a man voted differently from the way the priest wished him, he would tell him in that off-hand way?—He would not dare to vote any other way than the priest wished him, because he could not keep it secret; he would have to tell it in confession, if he did not tell it before.

4603. Are you aware of that; do you know anything about the confessional?—Nothing at all.

4604. Still, not knowing anything at all about the confessional, you state here that the priest would find it out in confession?—I have no doubt of it; I am giving my opinion and belief.

4605. What is the ground of your opinion and belief when you tell us you know nothing about it?

Mr. F. Stokes.

30 April 1869.

it?—I am not a Roman Catholic, therefore I cannot tell you anything about the confessional.

4606. Although you know nothing about the confessional, you express your opinion and belief that it could be found out in the confessional?—I have not a doubt of it.

4607. What is the ground for that opinion?—Common intercourse every day with Roman Catholics, and knowing the footing that they are upon with their spiritual confessors from public notoriety.

4608. What do you mean by public notoriety; has there been any notorious case?—No; but you would just as soon think of questioning that the sky was above you as that a priest had power to get any information he wanted.

4609. Through the confessional?—Without going to confession at all.

4610. You stated that through the confessional the priest would find out how this man voted?—Because I believe that in confession they must answer any question that is put to them.

4611. You believe so?—Yes.

4612. But you do not know?—I do not know.

4613. What is your ground for that belief?—It is difficult to define the grounds of belief; it is an impression that has come upon me from long residence in the country.

4614. Have you any other ground than that, because you have told us that you know nothing about the practice of confession?—Nothing.

4615. If the ballot were established, one description of this spiritual intimidation would be done away with, namely, that carried on by mobs influenced by the priest, would it not?—I do not think so at all.

4616. Why not?—Because in Ireland every man's politics are just as well known as the noon-day, and Conservative voters would be intimidated whether they were going to the ballot, or whether they were going to vote openly, if there was a chance of intimidating.

4617. I am speaking of spiritual intimidation brought to bear upon Roman Catholics; you told us that the spiritual intimidation at present was twofold; first, upon the individual in persuading him that a certain course was the right one, and, secondly, by making him afraid that if he voted differently from how the priest told him the priest would induce his Roman Catholic neighbours to do him injury?—It would to some extent; but if this mob of people knew that Thady or Tim were going to vote against the priest, they would very soon bring intimidation to bear even with the ballot.

4618. Do you think that if Thady or Tim were going to vote against the priest, he would tell him of it?—I do not think he would, as far as that goes.

4619. Therefore, as far as that goes, the ballot might be an improvement upon the presen system?—It might, as far as that goes.

4620. At present spiritual intimidation, as exercised, destroys freedom of election, you say?—I think it does; I think, as a rule, Roman Catholics are willing to vote with their priests, but if a man is unwilling to vote with him he has no chance of carrying out his wish; I am not putting the case that every Roman Catholic voter who votes for a Liberal candidate does it because he is intimidated; on the contrary, most of them might be inclined to do so, but a man has no chance of breaking away from that party without being intimidated.

4621. But if the ballot were in existence, he would have a chance of doing so?—He would not have a chance, because he would have to disclose it to his priest.

4622. Do you mean that he would have to disclose it, whether he wished it or not?—Not a doubt of it.

4623. It might occur that a man wished to conceal how he voted, but you say he would be obliged to disclose it to his priest?—I have not a doubt of it.

4624. Sir George Grey.] With regard to those persons that you have been speaking of, who were brought to Dublin and kept there a week before the election, to keep them out of any priestly influence, how soon were they sent back to their homes after they had voted?—Directly. The polling place was in the neighbourhood of their places of residence; they went down in a special train on the morning of the election, and voted, and the thing was done.

4625. And the priests, of course, knew how they voted?—Yes.

4626. Then did any consequences result to them on account of their votes?—Nothing in particular; there were a few ricks burnt and a few cottages wrecked, and so on.

4627. I want to know whether the priest exercised any influence or control over them, or whether they suffered any spiritual censure or punishment for having voted contrary to his wish?—Not that I know of, nor have I any reason to suppose it was so.

4628. You have been conversant with the elections in the county and city for some time; have you been professionally engaged in them?—Never. I only went to take the part of the sheriff professionally, but I did not act professionally.

4629. You said, did you not, that money payments were made on both sides at the election?—That I believe. I have no knowledge personally.

4630. Do you mean not generally; do you confine it to a particular class of voters?—It was chiefly among the freemen, but it was also among the poor householders.

4631. To a great extent?—I will not say to a great extent. For instance, the Liberal candidate had 650 freemen at the election before the last; at the last election he had only 300, and I assumed that no doubt the remaining 350 were all bribed.

4632. How do you account for the diminution in the number of freemen who voted for the Liberal candidate at the last time; do you think it was owing to their being bribed?—I do not suppose he bribed at all the last time.

4633. Then the bribery was all on one side this last time?—I think it is quite likely; in fact we have had it proved that it was so.

4634. Did the money given to this low class of voters counteract the influence of their priests, or was it not the same class of voters?—Not in the slightest degree, because the freemen are all Protestants without exception, or with very rare exceptions; I do not suppose that out of 3,000 who are freemen there are 10 catholics; they would not admit a Roman Catholic at all into our corporation.

4635. Are the Committee to understand that bribery operates upon the Protestants, and priestly influence upon the Roman Catholics in Dublin?—Both parties are open to bribery; it is not only the Protestants who are bribed, but both classes are bribed, but the Protestants I should say to the greatest extent.

Colonel EDWARD S. HILL, called in; and Examined:

4636. Mr. Hunt.] YOU are in partnership with your brother as a ship builder at Bristol and Cardiff?—I am.

4637. And a large employer of labour at both places?—Yes, we are.

4638. You are a colonel of volunteers at Cardiff?—Yes.

4639. And a member of the town council?—I am.

4640. Did you take an interest in the Bristol and the Cardiff elections?—I did.

4641. The polling day was the same at Bristol and at Cardiff, I think?—Yes, it was.

4642. You voted, did you not, in the morning at Bristol, and you returned to Cardiff to vote?—I did.

4643. What time did you arrive at Cardiff on your return from Bristol, on the polling day?—Ten minutes or a quarter past 12.

4644. In what state did you find the town of Cardiff when you returned?—A very excited state indeed.

4645. More excited than the town usually is at a contested election?—Yes, I think it was.

4646. Did you go to vote shortly after arriving at Cardiff?—I did; immediately on my arrival I proceeded to the polling booth.

4647. Had you any difficulty in getting to the poll?—Yes; almost close to the railway station I was attacked by a mob, I suppose 150 of them altogether wearing the colours of the Liberal candidate. They first of all began with abuse, then they took to flinging mud and filth at me, and eventually they took to stones and brickbats; several of those stones struck me; one struck me on the forehead and cut my forehead open; I believe if I had not been able to beat a hasty retreat into a public-house close at hand, I should certainly have been killed, and if I had not succeeded in stopping one stone with my umbrella, it would have given me a very severe blow indeed; in fact, after I got into this public-house it was beseiged for some time, but eventually I succeeded in getting away from them, and recorded my vote.

4648. Were you assaulted more than once?—Yes; I was assaulted again in driving in a cab from the place where I recorded my vote through the principal street of Cardiff to the central committee-room; the cab was stoned and the mud flung into it.

4649. Was yours a singular instance of assault, or was it the case that voters generally were assaulted who were on one side of politics?—Yes; it was so much so that not only was a voter not safe in going down the street wearing the Conservative colours, but he was obliged to wear the Liberal colours.

4650. Voters were obliged to go to the poll in the guise of Liberal colours, to protect them from the mob?—Yes; it was quite unsafe for any person wearing a blue favour, which was the colour of the Conservative party, to walk down the street.

4651. Supposing you wore no colours at all?—We should have been equally unsafe; we abstained from wearing colours. At one time the town was in such a state that the stipendiary magistrate read the Riot Act.

4652. Had the reading of the Riot Act any effect?—There was a charge of police afterwards; an hotel had been attacked at that time, which was an hotel favourable to the Conservatives; the state of seige, so to speak, was raised, but there was a great deal of stone-throwing, and the magistrate was struck even while he was reading the Riot Act.

4653. Do you know what the mob was composed of; were they residents in Cardiff?—Yes; but there were no doubt importations from the surrounding hills, the mining parts of the district.

4654. Do you think that they were persons brought there for the purpose?—I could not say that; I think that there is no doubt there was an organised mob, in fact it showed itself on several occasions; there was no doubt that there was an organised mob at the nomination, on the part of the Liberals, for they would not listen to a single word from the Conservative candidate, and there were mobs at other times that met at a particular place.

4655. Are you acquainted with Mr. Shirley, Mr. Giffard's agent for the election?—Yes, I know him very well.

4656. Do you know anything about the attack that was made upon him?—Yes; I know that he went from the committee room to the town hall: I saw him start and I saw him come back with a gentleman, who also was assisting at the committee, and they were both injured and pulled about.

4657. Were you present the day after the election at a meeting at which Mr. Giffard addressed his supporters?—I was.

4659. Do you think that the mob-intimidation had any effect upon the poll?—I have no doubt of it.

4660. Do you think that many persons were deterred from voting?—I am quite sure of it.

4661. Do you think that many persons were made to vote contrary to what they had intended by reason of the intimidation?—I should think it was very likely it would have that effect.

4662. Is that kind of intimidation a usual thing at Cardiff?—I have not had experience of a contested Cardiff election before, therefore I cannot say.

4663. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] There had not been a contest for some time, had there?—No, not for something like 11 or 12 years.

4664. Do you remember the numbers at the close of the poll on this last occasion?—Not accurately.

4665. Mr. Hunt.] The number polled for Colonel Stuart was 2,501, and for Mr. Giffard 2,055?—Yes, as near as I can recollect.

4666. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Were you acquainted with the result of the canvass at all?—No, I do not know that; not positively; I have heard of it.

4667. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Can you say who organised those mobs?—No, I cannot name any one.

4668. Mr. Raikes.] Did the Dissenting ministers take take any very active part in the election at Cardiff?—Yes, they took a very active part indeed, by holding meetings in their chapels, and other means.

30 April 1869.

4669. And bringing, I suppose, a great deal of pressure to bear upon the members of their own body?—No doubt of it.

4670. On which side was this influence exercised?—Upon the Liberal side; I know one or two instances of my own men, in which it was exerted in a very strong degree.

4671. Are you aware of any cases in which persons who had promised to vote for Mr. Giffard were induced afterwards to vote for his opponent by any pressure of that sort?—I know two cases in which it was attempted.

4672. Those ministers, I believe, exercise very considerable spiritual influence over persons who are members of their congregation?—No doubt.

4673. Mr. Leatham.] Were there many arrests?—There were not very many; there were some.

4674. Any convictions?—Yes, there were some convictions.

4675. Do you remember how many?—No, I do not.

4676. Were they all confined to one party?—To the best of my belief, they were.

4677. To the Liberals?—Yes; but I cannot speak quite positively upon that point.

4678. At the nomination you said that the Conservative candidate was not listened to; was the Liberal candidate well listened to?—He was. There was no attempt on the part of the Conservatives to bring any body of men there at all; but the Liberals had a large party, and they marched up in a body and took possession of the front of the hustings.

4679. You spoke of intimidation by Dissenting ministers; Dissenting ministers are maintained by their flocks, are they not?—I believe so; I do not know.

4680. Do you think it is likely that a man who is dependent upon his flock for his maintenance, would exercise intimidation upon them?—No; but I cannot say.

4381. Sir George Grey.] Did the clergymen of other denominations take an interest in this election?—Yes.

4682. The clergy generally took an interest in the election, did they not?—Yes.

4683. And they exercised what influence they possessed?—Yes.

4684. You said you voted at Bristol; had you any difficulty in getting to the poll there?—No; I voted early in the morning, just shortly after the poll opened in Bristol.

4685. There was no difficulty in getting to the poll then?—There was a crowd around the poll, but it was all good humoured; there was nothing going on wrong at all; I left Bristol at a quarter to ten.

4686. Have you any suggestion to offer to the Committee to remedy proceedings like those which you have described at this election?—I think that mobs should be prevented by force from intimidating and molesting the electors; and although I have not gone very deeply into the matter, I am inclined to favour the suggestion of voting papers under proper safeguards.

4687. Have you had any experience of the system of voting papers at elections for poor law guardians?—Yes, I have used them for voting.

4688. Do you know what the number of the police of Cardiff is?—I think there are about 60 police in the town; and there is another body of police paid by Lord Bute for the care of his docks, called the Bute police.

4689. Were they on duty; did you see them in the streets when those proceedings were going on?—Yes.

4690. Did they give what assistance they could to persons who were so assaulted?—Yes, certainly they did. In fact, in the instance I referred to of the gentleman who accompanied Mr. Shirley, if there had not been a sortié made by the police there is no doubt that he would have been very seriously injured; he was down then and about being trampled upon.

4691. Chairman.] Have you any other suggestion to make?—No, I am not aware of any.

4692. Mr. Raikes.] You said that the clergy took an active part on the other side in the election?—They took a part, but not so active as the others; some more and some less.

4693. Did they use what may be called spiritual influence?—I do not think they did.

4694. Did they preach political sermons or anything of that sort?—I never heard of anything of that sort being done by them.

Mr. Thomas Colborne, called in; and Examined.

Mr. T. Colborne.

4695. Mr. Staveley Hill.] Are you a Solicitor practising at Newport, in the county of Monmouth?—I am.

4696. You have had some reference in connection with the Parliamentary elections in the counties of Wilts and Monmouth, have you not?—Yes, both for boroughs and for counties.

4697. Your father was living at Chippenham, was he not, and you were very intimately connected with the Chippenham election of 1865?—Yes, I am a Chippenham man, and my father was one of the oldest medical men who lived there, who lived to be over 80 years, and had been in practice there for some 50 years, and I think was bailiff, that is mayor of the borough, when we had the honour of the late Sir Robert Peel being our Member, and he was three times mayor after the passing of the Municipal Corporation Act.

4698. So that your father and yourself were both very well known as belonging to one particular party in Chippenham?—Yes. I have left Chippenham some years, but my father was there till his death about a year ago, and had never left the place.

4699. At that election in 1865 a disturbance took place at Chippenham, I believe?—Yes, a very serious riot; about 50 houses were attacked.

4700. Did those houses all belong to one political party?—I believe so, without an exception.

4701. Your father's house was amongst those that were damaged, was it not?—Yes; my father was very aged then, and his house was attacked, I think, about 10 o'clock at night of the polling day, when he was lying in bed.

4702. Two Conservatives had been returned, had they not?—Chippenham then had two Members, and two Conservatives had been returned; there was one Liberal candidate, but the two who were elected were Conservatives; Sir John Neeld and and Mr. Goldney were the Conservative candidates; Mr. Lysley, the Liberal candidate, had been previously Member; he had sat for Chippenham from 1859 to 1865.

4703. Had the election been conducted quietly? There had been no disturbance till towards the afternoon, and no actual outbreak until after the election was over; I believe that the first real disturbance in the way of breaking windows did not occur till about 6 o'clock; of course, the poll closing at 4 o'clock, and being a small borough, the return would be made very shortly after. At 6 o'clock the disturbance commenced, but it abated, and was resumed, I think, somewhere between half-past 8 and 10 o'clock, and rather later the violence raged, and the attack upon my father's house was as nearly as possible about 10 o'clock.

4704. Sir George Grey.] Then it could have had no effect upon the actual return, because it was all after the election had closed?—There had been a previous gathering, but there was no outbreak in the way of actual damage till after the close of the poll.

4705. Mr. Staveley Hill.] It was long after the closing of the poll that the principal damage, in fact all the damage, was done to the houses?—Yes, I believe that the outrageous attacks were all later in the evening and in the dark.

4706. Was there any claim afterwards made upon the hundred for the damage that was done to the houses?—Yes, there were claims, I believe, to the number of 50 for compensation; the majority of the claims were under 30 l., and in those cases the Act of George the Fourth provides that application for compensation shall be made to the magistrates in petty sessions as a claim against the hundred, but where the amount claimed is over 30 l. it is to be by process in the superior courts against the hundred.

4708. Were any claims paid?—Not a single claim was allowed; the magistrates were so advised after the hearing of the case; of course there was a failure of evidence that the intention was to pull a house down in any case.

4709. Were any parties to the riot brought up before the magistrates?—Yes, and they were committed for trial at Salisbury; and I believe various sentences of imprisonment were given against them, varying I believe from four to six months; I think about 16 persons were apprehended and sent for trial to Salisbury.

4710. How were those men defended?—Funds were provided in some shape or other; I have no certain knowledge upon that subject.

4711. Now let me bring you to the Monmouth borough election in the November of last year; will you tell the Committee what took place about the disturbance at that election?—I had the charge of about one-half the town of Newport; that is to say, the control at the central rooms of the returns and the management of the election for about one-half of the town; therefore I was not out much during the day, because it was my place to be in the committee-room; the town became at an early hour in a great state of excitement; there was a great crowd, commencing, I believe, with boys either from the factories, or those who were idle, and gradually bringing within its scope the women and then the men.

4713. Was there such intimidation by the mob, in your opinion, as to prevent voters coming to the poll?—For myself, passing up from the committee-room to the place where I had to record my own vote about half-past ten, there was that state of gathering together, and of excitement in the town, which upon people of timid nerves would certainly have a very deterrent effect. I tell you candidly, I should not have dared to have exhibited any colour myself. I should have done it only at the risk of my life.

4714. Did this rioting continue at all after the close of the poll?—Yes.

4715. To what extent?—There was an attack made in the same manner as at Chippenham upon the houses of some of the most conspicuous Conservatives; that is to say, of Conservative tradesmen; Conservative hotels, and a Conservative newspaper office; all in the main thoroughfares.

4716. What were the class of people who were engaged in this matter?—The class of people who were apprehended were mostly, I take it, the labouring class, men connected with the wharves or docks.

4717. Were there any people who could be discovered as instigating or setting on the mob?—No, we have never obtained any information as to the ringleaders. We memorialised the Home Secretary for an inquiry, and we memorialised the Town Council to offer a reward, which they did, of 20 l. for the apprehension of the ringleaders; but I am not aware that a single ringleader was apprehended.

4718. I think we understand you to say that there was no such intimidation as to prevent persons polling?—I say that a man must have been a very bold man to face the mob.

4719. But do you know any instances yourself?—Reports were brought to me, but I cannot say otherwise than from the appearance of the streets when I myself went to record my vote, there was that sort of tremor and agitation which would act upon a nervous person.

4720. Were the constituents pretty well polled up?—No. I believe there were a good many absent who could not be accounted for; that is to say, who had promised and were not, and who could could not be, brought up to the poll. Our returns failed us. I have, perhaps, myself not very much reliance in the value of canvassing, but still our returns failed us, I think, by 400 or 500.

4721. What was the amount of damage done that day at Newport?—The riot was resumed on the next day, the day after the election, and the amount of damage sustained on the two days was about 400 l. spread over 90 claimants; it was principally windows and perhaps some small furniture.

4722. Do I understand you to say that that was going on all the next day?—On the next day there was just that scene in the streets that there would be a row. I felt myself so certain of it that I applied to our magistrates. I went and saw two or three magistrates, mostly gentlemen I am well known to, and I said, "You ought to take measures for preventing the rioting being resumed, and you ought to issue a proclamation begging all people to remain at home; it would be no harm to those who are quiet to do so." This was not done. The police were all kept indoors. I think there were 90 in the town. The mob, in the evening of the second day, got the upper hand, and again attacked a great many Conservative houses, and the damage upon the two days (I cannot distinguish one day from the other), as claimed before the magistrates, was about 300 l. or 400 l.

4723. Sir George Grey.] Do not you think that if proper provision had been taken by the magistrates, they might have put an end to this rioting, which lasted, according to your account, two days after the election was over?—I do.

4724. Mr. Staveley Hill.] Were any of those claims paid?—Those claims were all disallowed upon the same principle as the claims at Chippenham.

4725. At the Monmouth county election what took place?—At four different iron works, Tredegar, Pontypool, Abersychan and Blaenavon, at each of those polling districts, the Liberal candidate was in a majority, but on the aggregate of the county, he was in a minority. About the time varying from two to four o'clock in the afternoon of the polling day, when the returns went into each district of what the aggregate voting was throughout the county, it being divided probably into 10 or 12 or more districts, the rioting commenced at those four districts. I had myself a telegram from my clerk stationed at Tredegar about half-past two, that the window smashing had commenced at that time, and that the mob were getting very tumultuous.

4726. At all those four places was the rioting about equally as bad?—At some of the places certainly the outrages were worse; they went to the length of getting into a house, destroying the furniture, and turning (where it was a public-house) the wine or spirits into the street and drinking them, and they actually cut the gas-pipes to set the house on fire.

4727. Sir George Grey.] Where was this?—It was at Abersychan, one house, and another house at Blaenavon.

4729. I believe those places were destroyed, speaking especially of the "Red Lion" in Blaenavon, an old woman's shoe shop, and two or three other houses, all belonging to persons of one political party, but not places at which any committee-rooms were held?—I am not aware that there was any committee-room; the hotel at Blaenavon attacked was the most important one I think in that place.

4730. I believe that the unfortunate proprietor of that had 1,800 l. worth of damage done?—Yes; he received 750 l. from the hundred, because they considered there had been an intention there to demolish.

4731. What was the total amount that has been calculated of damage done on the claims over 30 l.?—I have the returns, and they run into thousands.

4732. How much was it altogether?—The claims for that district of Abersychan, Blaenavon, and Pontypool, were something like 1,800 l., as allowed and paid by the hundred. It is right that I should say that the greater portion of the damage sustained is not considered within the provisions of the Act, that is to say, if money were taken or spirits, I believe the hundred would not allow for it; it is confined to the actual structure of the building.

4733. Mr. Locke.] How much was claimed altogether?—One man claimed 1,000 l., and he was allowed 414 l.

4734. Mr. Staveley Hill.] How much was it altogether?—In one district, speaking roundly, the claims appear to have been 4,900 l., that is to say, the claims above 30 l., and the allowance was 1,750 l.; they are to have that amount of compensation from the hundred.

4735. They gave a judgment upon the district, did they not?—The process is, that the verdict or claim is allowed against the hundred, and the clerk of the peace then has to levy something in the nature of a county rate, or rather a hundred rate, upon the inhabitants of that hundred to raise the amount.

4736. Have you got altogether the amount claimed in the whole counted for those places?—No; the claims at Tredegar above 30 l. were allowed at about 400 l.; as to the minor claims under 30 l., I would say that about 150 l. was allowed, that is rather under the mark.

4738. And this was all done in the course of some two hours on the polling day, was it not?—No; it extended till late in the evening; and it was only stopped by the interference of the military, who were sent to the places attached to Tredegar, to Blaenavon, and to Abersychan, I believe; we have one of Her Majesty's regiments at present stationed at Newport; they telegraphed from the different places to the officer in command to send the men off in the afternoon or evening to the different places where the disturbances turbances had commenced; I believe that in the absence of the military the amount of damage would have been something fearful, because at places like Abersychan and Blaenavon there are what are called companies' shops; and the stock at an iron company's shop might be 10,000*l.* or 15,000*l.*, and if those had been attacked (and they were threatened) it would have been a very serious thing for the ratepayers.

4739. Did the military arrive about eight or nine o'clock?—Yes; they were sent from the different railway stations to the places attacked; I saw some of them on the way back.

4740. Did the magistrates take every step that was possible to stop the riot?—The county magistrates took what steps they could, but at those iron works there was only one magistrate and the usual complement of police, numbering three or four; therefore, they were perfectly powerless unless they had special constables, and unless the military were sent for.

4741. Was there anything to show you that there was any possibility of getting at the persons who led the mob or the ringleaders, as to who they were?—There was great difficulty in identifying those who had fomented the riot; of course some of them who were actually caught in the act were apprehended.

4742. To what class did those people belong?—The bulk of them were workmen belonging to those works that I have been speaking of, and some of them were bearing, up to that time, respectable characters.

4743. Were there 48 tried at Monmouth and 38 convicted?—I think so.

4744. Thirty-eight were men of very good character indeed, and good workmen?—Yes; I saw from the report that their characters were spoken to by different witnesses.

4745. As to Blaenavon, was it not the case, that at the beginning they were all, as far as you could find, perfectly sober; but that by the time they had gutted three or four public-houses and drunk the spirits, they had got into a state of almost mad drunkenness?—I believe that was it; they took beer at some places, and in others, in order to satisfy them and to stave them off, I believe, beer was supplied under the implied promise that they would not attack the house.

4746. Which promise they failed to keep when they had the beer?—Yes.

4751. Sir George Grey.] What is your suggestion upon that point?—If you can in any way by such means as the Committee may devise visit this act upon those in whose assumed interest this outrage was committed, I do not think that the outrage would take place; if the parties committing it knew that their friends would suffer for it, or the cause which they espoused, I think it would have a deterrent effect.

4752. Do you mean that the defeated candidate should be responsible?—No, it is not always the defeated candidate; I say this, that when, as in the case of the Newport election, a riot had been committed by those who ostensibly wore the colours of the elected candidate, I would bring it home to the party, just the same as I would bring home to him any act of bribery or treating on the part of his committee or his supporters.

4755. Mr. Leatham.] You think that the ballot, in a case of this kind, would not be at all efficacious?—I feel certain that not a tittle of the damage, which I have spoken of, would have been obviated by the ballot.

30 Arpil 1869.

4756. You stated that the riot was owing to the state of the poll having become known in the course of the day?—It occurred at the time when the returns would be coming in.

4757. It was due to the state of the poll becoming known; of course under the ballot the state of the poll would not have become known?—Quite so.

4758. Therefore, in that point of view, the ballot would be useful?—Yes; but in the case of Newport, the serious part of the riot was some time after the election was over.

4759. I am speaking now of the Monmouthshire election?—Quite so; the poll, as you are aware, cannot be, and is not declared sometimes for a day or two afterwards.

4760. Was the Monmouthshire election a free election; did the tenants generally vote without the exercise of any coercion on the part of their landlords?—I am not aware of any coercion on the part of the landlords; if you ask me whether the agents of the landlords did canvass, I have no doubt they did.

4761. Were not the charges very general that the coercion was almost universal?—Those charges were made, but I do not believe in them.

4762. Do not you attribute the fact of the riot to the belief that coercion was general on one side?—No. As you have asked me candidly what I attribute the riot to, I will tell you; there were inflammatory speeches made; it was one of the most bitter political fights that could possibly stir up passions, and if you ask me the cause of the riot, I do think it was from political religous rancour.

4763. Did you take an active part in the election for the borough of Monmouth?—For the Monmouth boroughs I acted on the committee of the Conservative candidate, not as a professional man, but as a friend, and in that capacity I took an active part.

4764. The riot began, did it, by an attack on a "blue" house there?—Yes, I believe that house had been attacked before in the election of 1852; it was a marked house.

4765. Are you aware whether there were any electors bottled there?—I believe there was no provocation whatever given; I have never heard of any.

4766. You were not aware that there were any electors bottled in that house?—I do not believe there was a single elector bottled, certainly not upon the Conservative side, throughout the election.

4767. A large part of Chippenham belongs to one proprietor, does it not?—The Neeld family, the late Mr. Joseph Neeld and his successor in the estate, Sir John Neeld, own a large number of houses; it is possible they may own 50.

4768. Were those the houses that were sacked?—Some of them; my father was his own freeholder, and had lived in his own house for many years.

4769. Neither you nor your father were agent for that family?—My father had been medical man to Mr. Neeld, and had nominated and sometimes seconded the Conservative candidate over probably a period of 20 or 25 years.

4770. Were not the charges of intimidation general at Chippenham at the election against that side; were they not publicly made?—I believe they were made, as they always are; but I may say, from my knowledge of the place, that I never heard that they were supported.

4771. Did you take an active part in that election?—No, I did not; I was at Newport then; my father's and brother's houses were both attacked, and that led me to investigate the case, and to take it up.

4772. Can you tell me how many tenants of Sir John Neeld were voters?—If Sir John Neeld owned about 50 houses, the probability is, perhaps, allowing for ladies and others, there would be 40 to 45 of them voters; I am not skilled in statistics, and I may have understated it; it may be possible that Sir John Neeld has 60 houses.

4773. Can you tell me how many of them voted the other way?—I cannot tell that.

4774. Do you think that any of them voted the other way?—I do not know anything to the contrary, but I cannot tell whether any of them did or did not. It might require a little effort of mind to call it to memory.

4775. Was it notorious that they all voted one way?—No, I have never heard it mentioned as a matter of notoriety.

4776. Mr. Locke.] You said that you thought that those riots might be put an end to if those who are responsible for them were made answerable; will you distinctly say who you mean by "the persons who are responsible for them"?—I meant those who, by previous inflammatory language, or language calculated to promote a breach of the peace, had brought about this outrage.

4777. Then you would have two things to be proved: you would have, in the first place, the inflammatory language, and, in the next place, that the outrage was brought about by that inflammatory language?—Yes; I am aware that is the difficulty.

4778. Do not you think that a person is now, in the present state of the law, liable under those circumstances?—I think that the present state of the law, or the present machinery of the law, would be a very cumbrous weapon with which to reach him; my suggestion would be, that that there should be a searching inquiry.

4779. If a person, by his language, excites those persons to commit those acts, is he not answerable now, or if he directs the persons?—I do not say that there is any direction at all; but I say it follows as a consequence. I do not for one moment attribute to anyone that he would be so unwise as to say, "You go and commit this outrage or riot;" but I would only say that the consequence of certain language used beforehand was a breach of the peace."

4781. What would you consider sufficient; how would you frame your law?—It may be an error of opinion, but I attribute those riots to previous inflammatory speeches and misrepresentations on the part of those in a better position, and taking an active interest, on the one side or the other, in the election; and I said, inasmuch as you follow the case of bribery on the part of an agent back to

to the party, however innocent, on whose behalf it is committed, so I should follow back or punish this outrage upon the party in whose behalf it was committed, or ostensibly committed.

4782. Whether he had anything to do with it or not?—Quite so, just the same as whether he had anything to do or not with the act of delivering 5 s. to a man that is bribed.

4783. Do you mean to say that when the houses of persons who had supported the successful candidate, as I think they were in this instance, were ransacked, you would punish their opponents at the election, because their supporters had committed that offence?—In that case, inasmuch as I understand that the unsuccessful party are the ones who have committed the outrage, you must try, if you can, to obtain compensation from those to whom, in some fair and impartial mode of inquiry, blame may be attributed.

4784. Do you think that a sort of proposition which could be so far defined as to be put into an Act of Parliament?—I believe that abler heads than mine might devise something in that shape; but I would have it that it should be the subject of a most searching and impartial inquiry, conducted perhaps by a barrister, or some gentleman in whom the House had confidence.

4785. Would you have those offenders tried by a jury, under your new Act of Parliament?—If you like, it might be before the sheriff; you might go before the sheriff to assess damages.

4786. Would you have a jury to decide it?—No; I should prefer it being left to the decision of either a judge or a barrister; some one whose impartiality should be above suspicion.

4787. Can you find such men?—I believe there are many at the Bar, and that we might have them just the same as the appointment of a judge.

4788. You would have a sort of arbitrator, would you?—No; an inquiry, just the same as an election inquiry.

4789. Who is to appoint that man?—I believe that your Honourable House would have the appointment, just the same as they have the appointment of the judges who conduct election inquiries. I should hardly consider that an inquiry like this was worth the expense of sending down one of Her Majesty's justices, and, in lieu of that, I should propose sending down a member of the Bar of the status, perhaps, of a judge of a county court.

4790. Would you leave it to the judge who tried the election?—I only shadow this out; I would not presume to suggest to the Committee the way in which it should be carried out; but I will take the converse of your question, if you will allow me, that in the case where the successful party is the one by whom or on whose behalf the outrage is committed, then, if it is clearly brought home to that party, it should upset the election, just the same as in the case of an act of bribery.

4791. But your point was this, that you would punish the unsuccessful candidate for a riot by other people?—No, I would suit my remedy according to the power that I had in my hand to apply it

Mr. T. Colborne.

4793. If he does those things, of course he is liable; but if he does not, why should he be liable merely because those people commit such acts?—Because I understand, in the case of bribery, however innocent a candidate may be, still if bribery is committed on his behalf, or ostensibly so, he may not know it, but still, if it is proved to have been done, he suffers, although innocent.

4794. Not unless it is his agent, a person whom he has employed?—No.

4795. Mr. James.] I daresay it was quite wrongly so felt, but was there not a feeling amongst those ignorant people that two landowners in Monmouthshire had exercised very grest influence over the electors?—I do not know that it was so much amongst the ignorant; that charge was brought by gentlemen of the same social position nearly as the representatives; I never heard of that charge coming from the ignorant.

4796. Was it not a charge made so that the ignorant knew of it?—Yes, certainly; perhaps that may have been so.

4797. Was not there a very undue employment of attorneys at that election?—There were a great number employed.

4798. How many were employed at the last Monmouthshire election?—I cannot tell you.

4799. Were there 100?—Not that I am aware of; my own employment was very little; I took no special part in canvassing.

4800. When you speak of religious feeling, and make that a charge of undue influence, did not two great landowners employ almost every attorney in the county of Monmouth?—The charge was made of the Conservatives having bought up all the attorneys.

4801. The number of attorneys was returned, I think, in the election account?—The election account was a very heavy one.

4802. Colonel Clifford, the Liberal candidate, was a very popular person, was he not?—I presume he was as popular with his side as the other candidates were with their side; I am not aware that there was any difference in that.

4803. Sir George Grey.] You were professionally employed in the election for Monmouthshire?—In the election for Monmouthshire, I took a general part; I did not go into details, but I attended upon the day of the polling, and I went to one or two of the works; I did not go into the details of the canvassing.

4804. Do you know what was the expense incurred in that election?—As nearly as possible on the Conservative side for the two candidates, from 11,000 l. to 12,000 l.

4805. Do you know how that expense was incurred; can you distribute it into items?—The payment to solicitors ran away with a great deal of it.

4806. How much was paid to solicitors and agents?—Speaking off-hand, it is very likely 5,000 l.; I may be above the mark, it may be 3,000 l. or 4,000 l.

4807. How much for the conveyance of voters?—A very considerable sum, I believe; I cannot tell; it may have been 500 l. or 800 l.

4808. How much in payment of public-houses?—I do not know, except for the use of public-houses as committee-rooms. I should have thought thought from what passed under my own notice, that the payment under that head would not have been very heavy in any district; it would not have anything to do with the payment for the use of public-houses, except for meetings.

4809. Have you any suggestion to make as to the diminution of the large expenses now incurred in contested elections for counties?—I must tell you that in this case it was a three or perhaps a four month canvass, and that increased the expense, as the candidates had been in the field for such a long time. I assure you that so far as I am concerned, if anything could be devised which would prevent solicitors having anything to do with canvassing, I for one should be most pleased. I do not consider it any very honourable part of our profession; but I do not see any remedy for it, because it is just as bad if it passes into the hands of a land agent, or one who will use influence in that way.

4810. You have no suggestion to offer, which would tend to diminish the expense of county elections?—Unless you could adopt something in the shape of voting papers, or do away with the nomination. Certainly I do not see any use in the nomination; I think the nomination sometimes gets a large number together, and if they are ready for mischief, they begin to be ready one day, and complete the mischief the next.

4811. Do you know what the expense of the nomination day was, at the Monmouthshire election?—The expense of the nomination would not be very much, but the expenses of the returning officer for the number of polling places was something considerable.

4812. Mr. Hunt.] You would wish to do away with the nomination; have you considered this, that if there were more candidates than vacancies to be filled up, if you have no nomination and show of hands, you must go to the poll?—I believe it is the system adopted in the municipal elections, that a candidate must be named a certain number of days before, and that you must have no poll if you have no more candidates than there are vacancies.

4813. But in case of there being more candidates nominated than vancancies to be filled, how would you ascertain which candidate was the strongest without going to the poll?—I do not consider the show of hands at a nomination the slightest test.

4814. Is it not the case that many persons are nominated who do not not wish to go to the poll now?—If a man chooses to have that luxury of being nominated, you must make him responsible in some way or other for his expenses.

4815. Would your proposition be this; that there should be a sum of money lodged or security given for expenses in the case of a nomination?—Unless it is possible some man were nominated entirely against his will, and then you must put the responsibility upon the parties who do it.

4816. You would affix some pecuniary penalty to anyone who was nominated without going to the poll?—Who caused expenses to be needlessly incurred.

4817. How would you arrive at that?—You may put it in this way; if he polls only a certain number, or if it is merely a sham nomination, as nominations often are, he should pay a certain amount.

4818. Do you think unless he polled a certain number he should pay a fine?—He would at the present moment pay his contribution towards the expenses.

4820. How many days before the poll would you have the nominations take place?—I think probably a week, because there are a great many arrangements to be made, which are always more expensive if made in a hurry at the last moment.

4821. Supposing this happened, that after the nomination had taken place, something was found out against the personal character of the candidate, so as to make him a person whom the electors ought not, for their own credit, to elect; would you have no means of supplementing the nomination by bringing forward another candidate?—I do not see how you could draw that distinction.

4822. Have you ever heard of the case of a candidate being found to be a person of infamous character, after having addressed the electors?—Not except by public reports of certain trials, it has not come under my own observation.

4823. How would you get over the difficulty if the nomination had taken place, if there was no means at the last moment of substituting a new candidate?—That is a difficulty certainly to be encountered, and to be provided against; I do not know that I am wise enough to suggest a remedy.

4824. Have you ever heard of the case of a candidate being proposed on the day of the nomination unexpectedly, and coming in at the head of the poll?—I believe there was such a case reported from the north this time, and I have known at Salisbury a gentleman brought forward on the nomination day and polling a very respectable number, but not coming in; that circumstance I can speak to myself.

4826. You think that the nomination should take place a week in advance of the election; but supposing a person whom everybody would wish to see in Parliament had been rejected at one place, your plan would interpose great difficulty upon him in his being nominated for another place?—Yes, certainly; in remedying what we consider the greater evil, it would involve what I should consider the lesser evil.

4827. With regard to county elections, the forcing of persons to go to the poll, in order to decide between the candidates who are nominated, would entail upon the electors very great inconvenience, and upon the candidates very great expense?—Yes, and I think no good really comes from it.

4828. Sir George Grey.] Am I right in supposing you to recommend that there should be a week's interval between the nomination and the polling?—It would be convenient, in order that, if the candidates had to provide for expenses, they they might make their arrangements; it would be inconvenient for them to have notice of opposition at 24 hours, which occurred, I believe, in the case of Herefordshire.

4829. What time would you allow between the issue of the writ and the day of the nomination?—I should say that, unless it was in the case of an unexpected vacancy, it really matters not; because at a general election they are prepared with candidates long before the writs come down; but in the case of vacancy by death or acceptance of office, or anything of that kind, they should, at least, have a week after the issuing of the writ before the nomination.

4830. Then in case of an occasional vacancy, your plan would involve the delay of a fortnight before the seat could be filled up?—Yes, it would.

4831. Mr. James.] Why should you not have this silent nomination, which you recommend, two days before the poll, as you have now?—Because it would not do away with this evil that I complain of, of a candidate being brought forward at a very short notice, and entailing such heavy expense.

4832. That evil exists, does it not, under the present system?—Certainly.

4833. Then we should have no greater evil if we had a silent nomination?—No, certainly not; if you consider that a lesser evil.

4834. If a candidate is brought forward at a moment's notice, generally speaking he has not the same chance of success as one who has been long in the field before the constituency canvassing?—Not if the organisation of the canvassers is complete.

4835. If a certain sum of money were deposited every time a person is nominated in this manner, would not that give sufficient security to prevent candidates springing up?—Yes; if it was a sum sufficient to cover the expenses.

4836. You would have more security, would you not, than you have now, because of the candidate's liability?—Yes.

4837. Mr. Staveley Hill.] You spoke of those people being inflamed with political and religious rancour, and by speeches; where were those speeches delivered?—Perhaps they had been unfortunately led up to it by speeches either in chapels or sometimes in public-houses; a great many meetings were held in chapels.

4838. Mr. Leatham.] Did the clergymen of the Church of England take any part in the election for Monmouthshire?—They were generally helping in the various districts.

4839. Did they make any speeches?—I cannot call to mind a single speech made by a clergyman of the Church of England during the contest.

4840. Mr. Hunt.] Did you ever hear of their preaching in their churches in favour of one candidate or the other?—I never heard of it.

4841. Did you hear of that being done at other places of worship?—Yes.

4842. At chapels of what denomination?—I think the Wesleyans had the reputation of avoiding political-religious matters as much as possible.

4843. With the exception of the Church of England and the Wesleyan chapels, places of worship were used for the purpose of preaching sermons of a political character?—I cannot speak so distinctly as to preaching sermons; certainly many meetings were held at chapels.

4844. Do you understand that sermons preached in some chapels in favour of particular political candidates?—It is only a floating impression that I have; I should not like to speak distinctly of sermons having been preached, as I do with respect to the meetings.

4845. Sir George Grey.] Is it the habit to hold public meetings at those chapels for ordinary purposes?—I believe tea meetings and revival meetings are generally held in chapels.

4846. But no meetings for secular purposes?—No; those people consider such meetings a part of the business of the chapel, I fancy; the everyday business.

4847. Mr. Locke.] Do not they deliver lectures in them frequently?—Connected with religious subjects.

4848. Not always religious subjects?—I suppose they would be what they would call religious-secular lectures.

4849. Not irreligious subjects, of course?—I mean some branch of knowledge directly associated in one way or other with religious subjects, like missionary lectures, or lectures on the Holy Land. I do not believe that they use the chapels for lectures on geometry.

4850. Sir George Grey.] You mean, in the case of an election, they do hold meetings at chapels?—There is no doubt about it.

THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JOHN HUGHES, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Hughes.

4 May 1869.

4851. Mr. Cross.] YOU are a large Boot and Shoe Dealer in Liverpool; are you not?—I am.

4852. You have two establishments there?—Yes.

4853. I believe you acted as secretary for the Conservatives at the municipal election of 1867?—I did.

4854. Mr. Johnson told the Committee that at that election the Conservative candidate gave out a number of drink tickets, but it cost him nothing, because the increased custom to his public-houses was such that he got something for his outlay; is that true?—It is perfectly untrue.

4855. Is it not the fact that this brewer had not one single public-house in that ward which he was contesting?—Not one; he had not then, nor has he now.

4856. Therefore all that is perfectly untrue?—It is perfectly untrue.

4857. I believe you yourself were elected as assessor?—Yes.

4859. He also says, in answer to Question 1992, "At both the elections the polling-booths were blocked by the treated and bribed voters, so much so that no respectable persons could really go and record their votes; that is to say, if they were known to be of adverse politics; but their own party were always led up by one of this organised staff, and the crowd immediately opened and let them pass, but no one else was allowed to pass;" is that true?—No; it is not. He refers there to the municipal elections of 1867 and 1868.

4860. Is there any truth whatever in that statement?—None whatever; because I sat there as assessor in 1868. What he immediately refers to is this; there was an old gentleman above 90 years of age who came and voted, and he came without any difficulty.

4861. It is untrue?—Yes, it is untrue.

4862. Then he is asked, "Was there much drunkenness"?—A great amount of drunkenness. On that occasion, the night before, I went to a certain public-house where they held their committee; I went with one of their own party, and he showed me a room in which there were at least 60 or 70 people, all absolutely drunk, and they were kept there during the night, and taken up in a body the next morning to vote; and those were the parties, together with others, that blocked the polling-booth;" is that true?—It is not true.

4863. Sir George Grey.] What public-house does the question refer to?—He says that it was a committee-room; we had only one committee-room, and that was the "Royal Oak," and that public-house would not hold 60 or 70.

4864. Mr. Cross.] Was there much drunkenness there?—No; besides, it was perfectly unnecessary to bottle, because we had a majority of 250.

4865. Sir George Grey.] Was there any drunkenness?—Certainly, upon every occasion there is a little excitement.

4866. Do you mean drunkenness from excitement, or excitement the consequence of drunkenness?—Drunkenness in consequence of political excitement.

4867. Mr. Cross.] Then, at Question 2037, the question is asked Mr. Johnson, "Do you know whether there was any difficulty in obtaining such evidence?" what did that relate to?—The evidence in the county court.

4868. The

4868. The answer he gives is this, "Yes, there was very great difficulty in getting witnesses, inasmuch as the assessor" (meaning you), "who had arranged the whole machinery, endeavoured to get them away. He got many of the witnesses away by paying them a certain sum of money, and allowing their families so much per week while they were away; but this man he could not get out of the way, though he had had 10 l. offered to him, and I think he told me 30 s. a week for his wife and family as long as he was away." Is that true?—It is not true.

4869. Did you ever make any offer of the kind?—No, not to anyone.

4870. At Question 2129 Mr. Johnson is asked whether the shoemaker, meaning you, was one of the assessors, and he says, "Yes, he was one." He is then asked, "He being a skilled person, and understanding the law upon the subject, he first of all went and revised the list in October, and then he was employed at the election?—Yes." Did you revise the list in October?—No.

4871. You had nothing to do with it?—Nothing to do with it; the man did not know what he was talking about.

4872. Is that all that you wish to contradict?—Yes.

4873. Mr. Villiers.] Are you an overseer?—No; I was elected overseer, but the magistrates considered that there was a Conservative monopoly in electing me overseer, and they substituted a Liberal for my name.

4874. How are the overseers chosen; are they not by election?—No, they are merely recommended to the magistrates, and the magistrates have the absolute appointment, but generally about half-a-dozen names are recommended to the magistrates, and those that have the greatest majority in the vestry are generally taken by the magistrates.

4875. But your name was submitted to the magistrates, and they would not accept you?—It is unfair to put it in that way; there was no personal objection to me, only that I was the third Conservative having the least number of votes of the three Conservatives, and I being the lowest on the Conservative list they substituted a Liberal instead of me.

4876. Are you chosen according to your politics?—That is a consideration with the party, of course.

4877. You have been acting for some time as assessor, have you not?—No, only two years as assessor.

4878. And who does appoint the assessors?—The assessors are elected just in the same way as the council; the same qualification is required for an assessor as there is for a town councillor, and the same penalties for the non-performance of the duties.

4879. Will you just tell us what is your duty as assessor; is it to prepare the list, in the first place?—No, not at all; the overseers prepare the list. There is an overseers' list which is nailed up to the church doors, and then any person not seeing his name upon it, if he has a right to vote he puts in a claim for it, and then there is another list of claimants made out, and this overseers' list is submitted to the two borough assessors and the mayor. There are two borough assessors as well as two assessors for each ward.

4880. The mayor appoints a day for revising the list, does he not?—Yes, that is so; and the mayor sits with the two borough assessors.

4881. When is the list revised; because this was a board of assessment, was it not?—No, it goes through the regular course prescribed by the municipal law.

4882. And the mayor has two assessors to assist him in revising the list?—Yes, who are elected by the ratepayers and not appointed by the mayor, as has been said.

4883. Were you one of those assessors that were with the mayor to revise the list?—Not at all; they are generally legal gentlemen.

4884. Then the overseer of the ward goes before them, does he?—No.

4885. Who answers for the list?—The rate-book clerk; he, in fact, has the preparation of the list.

4886. And not the overseer?—The overseer in name, but the rate-book clerk does it, and he is paid for doing it.

4887. The overseer is actually answerable, is he not?—Yes.

4888. What is the process of revising the list; who comes and states objections?—The person that is objected to.

4889. Does he come before the mayor and state his reason for being put upon the list?—Yes.

4890. What part have you ever taken in this matter?—None whatever; only I have been objected to by the Radicals often enough.

4891. Sir George Grey.] What does the ward assessor do?—The ward assessor is also elected by the ratepayers and he sits there, and he is one of the returning officers. In fact, the alderman and the two assessors are the returning officer for the ward at the election; they receive the votes and go to the town-hall and sign the return, stating that such and such a person is elected.

4892. Mr. Villiers.] You have not yet told us what you have to do with the revision of the list?—I have nothing in the world to do with it, not as assessor; I am assessor for the ward, not for the borough.

4893. You do not appear before the mayor?—No. There are two assessors elected for each ward, and they act at the election; there are two assessors elected for the borough, and they act at the revision.

4894. Was there any charge brought against you as to the manner in which you had proceeded in the ward?—No, they could not bring any charge, or they would have been very glad to do so. The gentleman who appeared before the magistrates, although he himself had been guilty of bribery, made very vague statements that my name cropped up pretty frequently. He stated that my name cropped up pretty frequently in the proceedings in the county court, but there was nothing in that; there was no charge made against me.

4895. What do you mean by your name cropping up pretty frequently in the proceedings in the county court?—That is the statement made by Mr. Johnson, that my name very frequently cropped up in the proceedings, as connected with the election.

4896. Sir George Grey.] I think Mr. Johnson's statement was this, that there was some inquiry into the proceedings at this election, and his name (that is your name) came out very prominently minently in the reports that were made; is that what you are referring to now?—Yes.

Mr. J. Hughes.

4897. Did it not come up prominently in the reports of those proceedings?—I cannot tell, I am sure, because they subpœnaed me as a witness, and I was obliged to turn out; but they did not dare to call me.

4898. Mr. Hunt.] Who subpœnaed you; was it the other side?—Yes.

4899. Mr. Villiers.] You were not examined, I think you say?—No; but, of course, they kept me in the dark as to what was going on, so that I could not advise the counsel that appeared.

4900. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] You were obliged to leave the court, were you?—Certainly. There was a gentleman there, a Mr. C. T. Bawring, a town councillor and a magistrate, who has been mentioned here; and, although all the witnesses were ordered to leave the court, he sat in the court throughout the proceedings, and when he saw an opportunity to make a statement he got up and made that statement.

4901. Mr. Leatham.] You had a good deal to do with Mr. Parrott's election, had you not?—No; I could not have had a good deal to do with Mr. Parrott's election; I was assessor. I was a member of the committee, but I was not secretary of that election; a Mr. Cowen was secretary.

4902. Do you object to state how much you received for your labours at Mr. Parrott's election?—No, I do not object. I did not receive anything.

4903. Can you tell what the total expense of his election was?—No.

4904. Have you been convicted of bribery?—No.

4905. Not before the county court?—No; they never brought a charge against me.

4906. Had you anything to do with Mr. Walker's election in the previous year?—Yes; I was secretary.

4907. You afterwards took a trip to Malvern, I think?—No.

4908. Do you deny that?—I have never been to Malvern in my life. I am quite willing to state all that I know; but I cannot admit those things which have been put to me.

4909. Have you never been the subject of any proceedings in consequence of any conduct of yours at any election?—No; I wish they would try it on.

4910. Sir George Grey.] You say that, as ward assessor, you were the returning officer in fact of the ward?—Yes.

4911. As returning officer, did you still sit on the committee of one of the candidates, and take an active part in promoting his election?—No, not as assessor. I do do so generally.

4912. But, at the same time that you are assessor for the ward are you also a member, or have you been a member of the committee promoting the election of particular candidates?—Yes, I have.

4913. Is that a usual practice in Liverpool at those elections?—Yes.

4914. Is it common for the assessors, who are the returning officers for the wards, to act as members of the committees of particular candidiates?—Yes; I have seen a Radical alderman sit in St. Ann's ward, allow the Radical assessor to run out and collar a man, and bring him up to vote.

4915. That was not you, I suppose?—No, I never did that.

4916. Still is it the practice in Liverpool for the assessors of wards, who are, as you say, the returning officers, to take an active part in promoting the election of particular candidates?—Yes, certainly. They are elected because they belong to one particular party, and you cannot divest a man of his feelings.

4917. They are not expected, then, to act impartially as returning officers?—No; the alderman is expected to act impartially, but the assessors are a check upon each other, and upon the alderman too.

4918. Mr. Hunt.] That is to say, one is appointed on each side?—Yes, they are elected.

4919. Are they supposed to protect each their own party before the alderman?—Yes.

4920. Mr. Edward Egerton.] When you say that you are the returning officer, do you mean that you are the returning officer that is appointed by one particular party to look after the interest of that party?—We elect the returning officers, and the three persons combined make the returning officer.

4921. But the alderman is the returning officer surely, is he not?—He is the presiding officer, but I think that the two assessors are just as essential; in fact, the vote would not be legal, I am informed, without he is present.

4922. Mr. Hunt.] Is it the case that a partisan is elected on each side as assessor?—Yes.

4923. In order that they may keep watch over the returning officer in the interest of their own party?—Yes, that is the practice; in fact, it is so understood, and although the parties are nominated, they never proceed to election; it is understood between the two parties.

4924. But if there is any difference of opinion, do they vote upon any question?—I never saw a difference of opinion.

4925. Mr. Villiers.] Do I understand you to say that the assessors are not really elected, but they are nominated?—They are nominated, and if there is no objection, of course, they are elected; that is the election.

4926. Would not it be possible to have two assessors on the same side of the question if they were elected freely?—Yes, if they were elected, but then it is understood between the parties that one is nominated on one side, and the other on the other.

4927. Would there be any legal objection to two assessors of the same party, supposing they were elected?—None whatever, if they were regularly elected.

4928. They might be both on one side?—Yes.

4929. But it is the practice to name one on each side?—Yes.

4930. And that without election?—The nomination is the election, if there is no opposition, in the same way as a Member of Parliament would be elected if he was only nominated and there was no contest.

4931. Who nominates them; is it the alderman?—No; the burgesses of the ward, or the adjacent ward; any burgess can nominate an assessor.

Mr. J. Hughes.
4 May 1869.

4932. Could you go to the poll for an assessor?—Yes.

4933. Did you ever know one go to the poll?—Yes, there has been one.

4934. What was the result; did they choose one on each side?—I really do not recollect now; I do not know the case; I have merely heard of it.

4935. Mr. Hunt.] If there is an occasional vacancy by the death or illness, or departure from the town, of one assessor, is it the practice to fill up that vacancy by electing a man of the same politics?—No; immediately after the election of the assessor, the assessor appoints a deputy, and he signs a declaration that he will attend in case of sickness or absence of the assessor.

Mr. Robert Ascroft, called in; and Examined.

4936. Sir George Grey.] Are you the Town Clerk of Preston?—Yes.

4937. Why have you attended here to-day; what do you wish to state to the Committee?—I merely wish to hand in the resolutions agreed to by the town council at their meeting on Thursday last.

4938. What was the occasion of the meeting?—It was their usual meeting, but their special attention was drawn to the proceedings of this Committee, and certain resolutions were framed and sent round to the council, and they were considered. The town council adopted those resolutions, which I hand in, with the view of their being laid before this Committee (delivering in the same, vide Appendix).

Mr. Daniel Collen, called in; and Examined.

Mr. D. Collen.

4939. Sir George Grey.] What is your occupation, and where do you reside?—I am a miller and corn factor, residing at Chippenham.

4940. Is it by your own wish that you come before the Committee to-day, or have you been summoned?—By my own wish I came up.

4941. For what purpose do you come before the Committee?—I came here, as I understood some evidence had been given the other day respecting the riots at Chippenham, that they were totally unprovoked, and I thought it only right that, knowing the circumstances as I do, I should come up to give some facts on the matter.

4942. What statement is it in the evidence which you have seen, that you wish to make any observation upon?—The statement I understand has been made by a person who was not a resident in Chippenham at the time; that there was a very serious riot in Chippenham, and that it was totally unprovoked.

4943. Was there a riot?—There was a riot.

4944. That riot took place, did it not, after the poll was closed at Chippenham, at the election to which that evidence refers?—A riot took place, but it began in the morning of the day, owing to the conduct of a woman, the landlady at the committee-room of the Conservative candidate.

4945. You do not deny the existence of the riot?—Not at all; there was a very serious riot, only it took place in the evening of the polling-day, after the poll had closed.

4946. Is there any other statement that you wish to make?—I wish to state that there were serious reasons to prove that the riot was provoked.

4947. Mr. Villiers.] Did anybody furnish you with a copy of the evidence or any written statement of what was stated in this Committee-room?—I have been furnished with some particulars, but not a copy of the evidence.

4948. Do you know what evidence was given?—I understand that evidence was given to the effect that the riot was quite unprovoked, and that it was caused by the Liberals of Chippenham, whereas, I can tell the Committee that not one of the Liberal voters was convicted at all of taking any part in it, although very large rewards had been offered.

4949. Mr. Leatham.] With regard to the influence of the proprietors in Chippenham, do you attribute the riot in any degree to the common rumour, that undue influence was exercised over the voters by certain proprietors in Chippenham?—There is a very strong feeling to that effect in the town, and there was at the time.

4950. Are you aware of any instances in which that undue influence was exerted?—Yes, I am aware of that.

4951. Are you in a position to state them to the Committee?—Yes, if it is necessary.

4952. Did intimidation by landlords exist to any great extent?—Yes, to a very large extent.

4953. Mr. Hunt.] When you say that intimidation by landlords existed to a very large extent, what do you mean by intimidation by landlords?—I mean to say this, that the landowners in the neighbourhood, and the agents in the town, and in fact all the legal profession are all on one side, and that there is great influence used; it is the custom, it is well known, and I know instances in which the houses of the great landowners have been let with the distinct understanding, that the tenants shall vote Conservative, and also be Churchmen, otherwise they have no chance of getting the houses.

4954. That is what you mean by the word intimidation?—That would be coercion, I suppose.

4955. It would be in the nature of an agreement, would it not?—It would be in the nature of an agreement, certainly.

4956. A sort of contract that the occupancy of the house was to ensure the voting for the landlord?—That is so.

4957. Mr. Whitbread.] Is that the only species of intimidation which you know of at Chippenham?—There are other ways in which it is used, in the shape of large employers of labour exercising influence on their workpeople.

4958. You call it great intimidation; do you know of any cases in which people have been turned out of their houses, or discharged by their employers, employers, because of their voting, or that a threat has been held out to them?—I have proof in my pocket of notices that have been served after the election of 1865, by a large owner, on tenants who voted Liberal, six or seven at a time; that was at the time when the riot took place. I have got a copy of the notice.

Mr. D. Collen.

4959. What was the notice?—The notice is as follows: "To So-and-So,—We do hereby give you notice, and you are required on the 29th day of September next ensuing the date hereof (or at end of such other day, which coming next after the expiration of one half-year from the date hereof, shall be the last day of the then current year of your tenancy), to quit and yield up the possession of all that piece or allotment of land in a field, &c." There is a great deal of land let out in that way in Chippenham.

4960. Do you know of many cases where workmen have been either discharged, or threatened to be discharged, by their employers on account of their votes?—I know that there has been very strong influence used by the managers of works.

4961. My question was, do you know of many cases in which workmen have been either discharged, or a threat of discharge has been held out to them on account of their vote, or their intention to vote?—I know that influence has been used very greatly, but I am not prepared to speak of any particular instance; in the case of the largest employer of labour in the town, his works were very low two or three months previous to the election, and he took on a great many men just before the election.

4962. Did that intimidate them?—No.

4963. Mr. Leatham.] Do you know how those men voted?—They all, or nearly all, voted one way.

4964. Mr. Whitbread.] Have you anything more to state to justify the charge of intimidation which you speak of?—I cannot speak to particular instances, but only to the general feeling in the town that people will lose their work unless they vote on that side.

4965. Sir George Grey.] What do you know about that notice; was it acted upon?—It was acted upon.

4966. How do you know that it had anything to do with the election?—I do not know that it had; only that it came for the first time after the election.

4967. What evidence is there that it was connected in any way with political feeling?—Nothing more than that the same landlord is known to let houses on the distinct understanding that the tenants shall be Conservatives, and in this case they had voted Liberal, and those who voted Liberal had those notices.

4968. Mr. Villiers.] Were the notices served immediately after the election?—The first half year after the election, those notices were issued.

4969. Mr. Hunt.] Do I rightly understand you to assume, from the fact that this notice was given immediately after the election, that therefore it was given on account of the voting of the occupant?—I do not assume that it would be always the case, but I assume that it was in this case.

4970. You assume that, in Chippenham, if a Conservative owner of land gives notice to a tenant to quit after the election, it is done in consequence of the election, and is connected with the election?—No, not always.

4972. Did you make any inquiry as to those matters?—I did not make any inquiry, but one of them who gave me the information I know to be one of our leading tradesmen in a large way of business, iron-works, so that I do not think at all that there could be any reason for it; they are mostly independent men; one of them, whose name I see now on the paper before me, has just built a house for himself.

4974. Mr. Villiers.] You said that it was notorious that this party gave those tenancies with a view to political influence?—Yes; everything is done in the town with that view, I believe, or nearly so.

4975. He was of opposite politics to his tenants; the tenants voted in a way that he did not expect they would have voted, and half-a-dozen received notice to quit after the election; is that the case?—That is the case; I cannot speak to every instance that the agreement was to that effect, but I know that those agreements are usually made to that effect, and with that understanding.

4976. Is it not notorious in Chippenham that that is the case?—It is quite notorious that that system prevails.

4977. Mr. Brand.] How many tenants, having votes, has this gentleman in Chippenham?—I suppose he has 60 houses, besides a great many tenants who have these allotments of land.

4978. Sir George Grey.] Did they all vote Conservative?—Yes.

4979. Including those which are allotments of land, how many tenants, having votes, had he?—I should suppose he had nearly 100.

4980. Can you say how they voted?—All Conservative, or very nearly, with the exception of these.

4981. How came those notices to be served upon any of them?—There was a very small proportion who voted against the Conservatives; I should think not 10 per cent.

4982. Were notices served upon all who voted against the Conservatives?—I believe there were.

4983. Mr. Villiers.] Were any notices served upon those who voted in conformity with the landlord's opinion?—I never heard of any.

4984. Mr. Hunt.] I suppose you would not have heard of them, would you?—I think I should.

4986. Mr. Villiers.] What election are you speaking of?—1865.

4987. Mr. Whitbread.] What is the extent of those allotments of which you have been speaking?—They are pieces of accommodation ground for gardens.

4988. Mr. Villiers.] Those were 10 l. occupants, were they?—No, not all of them. Some of them were smaller than that I think.

4989. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Are they about a quarter of an acre each?—More than that; I should think about an acre, most of them.

4990. Mr. Villiers.] That was before the passing of the late Reform Bill?—Yes.

4991. Mr. Hunt.] Was it the case that all the tenants of that landlord voted with him at the election of 1868?—I think so, or very nearly so. Quite as large a proportion as I have said.

4992. Still some were independent and did vote against him?—I do not know one instance, and I do not think that there is one instance of a tenant that voted against him in 1868.

4993. Mr. Villiers.] Was there any influence used over the new voters?—There was very large influence.

4994. What kind of influence?—Influence in the way of employing labour, and I believe that, in the cottages, they were very much afraid of losing their houses.

4995. Were they mostly in arrears of rent?—No, not at all; they were good mechanics who I know would not be in that way; but they were afraid of losing their houses.

4996. Did all the voters occupy cottages in 1868?—No, not at that time.

4997. They lived in rooms, did they not, some of them?—No; I do not know of any that lived in rooms of the parties that I spoke of.

4998. Mr. Cross.] Do not you consider that the landlords of those houses have had their influence very much weakened by the new voters?—Yes, they have. In the case of the houses that I have been speaking of, the larger houses, the influence has been weakened.

4999. The power is not so much in the hands of a few as it was?—No, it is not, not with the larger houses; but it comes to the same thing with the small houses.

5000. A greater number of people used the same kind of influence this time, did they not?—Yes.

5001. Sir George Grey.] Do you mean that this kind of influence is used in Chippenham by everybody who has the power to use it?—No, I would not say that, because I know it is not by myself; but I believe it is used by others besides those that I have spoken of.

5002. By both parties?—No, not by both parties; I do not think it is.

5003. Mr. Locke.] Are all the large landlords in Chippenham Conservatives?—Most of the proprietors there are Conservatives.

5004. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Is the land that you have been speaking of let below its value?—It is let at about the same rent, or rather over what it would fetch to a farmer in large farms.

5005. Mr. Cross.] What election are you speaking of, with regard to those notices?—1865.

5006. How many notices do you believe, according to your report, were sent out?—I cannot speak to any number.

5007. I thought I understood you to say that they were sent to pretty nearly all the tenants?—Six or seven, I said.

5008. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Were you employed at all as an agent on the Liberal side?—No, not at all.

5009. How came you to get those notices?—They were handed me because I have taken a great interest in the elections.

5010. Mr. Hunt.] Have the parties left their holdings in consequence of those notices?—I believe that everyone has.

5011. Have they got other holdings?—I do not know.

5012. Mr. Whitbread.] Are there any allotments now let to Liberals?—No.

5013. Mr. Cross.] I suppose that this letter, which is attached to the notice, is all that you know about it?—No; I have had some conversation with the man.

5014. But this is the sum and substance of your information?—Yes.

5015. Will you read the letter to the Committee?—I should say that I had had some conversation with this man who gave me this information before, and I asked him to give it to me in writing.

5016. Sir George Grey.] Is this letter addressed to you?—Yes, it is as follows: "Chippenham, March 27th. Mr. Collen. Dear Sir,—I beg to hand you names of parties that have received notices to quit so-and-so's allotment ground, which are as follows: Thomas Aland, Alfred Button, Thomas Honniball, Jesse Stacey Baker, James Stacey Baker." I see there are five. Thomas Aland has signed his name at the bottom and at the top as well, and I had reckoned him as the sixth.

5017. Mr. Whitbread.] What is the position of most of them; I think you say that one of them has iron-works?—One is a partner in a foundry; an agricultural implement maker.

5018. It was not much intimidation to him to turn him out of a quarter of an acre allotment?—No, not much intimidation.

5019. Mr. Leatham.] He was not in the same position as he is in now, perhaps?—I do not think he had so many men then.

5020. Mr. Whitbread.] Still he was an employer of labour himself at that time?—Yes.

5021. Employing how many hands, for instance?—I suppose six or seven.

5022. What is the position of the next man?—Alfred Button is a shoemaker.

5023. A master shoemaker?—Yes, he is a master shoemaker; but I think he does most of the work himself. The next is Thomas Honniball; I think he is a timekeeper at some works there. Jesse Stacey is a master baker in the town; I believe that he has men under him; he is one of our principal bakers.

5024. Sir George Grey.] Is there much value attached to those allotments, and much desire to get them in Chippenham?—It is a great accommodation, and people are very glad to have the land; they live in a town, and those people have not an opportunity of having gardens.

5025. Mr. Villiers.] In speaking of this riot, did you refer to 1868 or 1865?—1865; there was no rioting in 1868.

5026. And was there any petition?—No.

5027. Was there no treating?—I think there was treating.

 5028. However,

Mr. D. Collen.

5028. However, the seat was not disputed in 1868?—The seat was not disputed.

5029. Sir George Grey.] There was a contest, was there not?—Yes; but I do not think there would have been any use in petitioning.

5030. Mr. Hunt.] You attribute this riot, do you, to provocation arising out of the action of the landlords?—Not altogether.

5031. To what do you attribute it?—On the polling day there was a son of the magistrate there who whipped a boy in the street, which excited a great deal of feeling there, and that was followed by the wife of the landlord at the Conservative committee room flinging some water out of the room, and flinging the jug out with it, which cut a woman's head open; and this woman went about the street, I think, for some time, and caused great excitement. That was before the riot took place.

5032. You think that that caused the general riot?—I think it had great effect in causing it.

5033. Sir George Grey.] There was no riot during the polling; it was all after the polling was over, was it not?—It was during the polling, when this jug was thrown out of the window, and those windows were all broken. The mob at once were enraged and broke the windows in.

5034. Mr. Hunt.] Was not the riot in consequence of the resentment felt, on the part of the Liberals, at the success of their opponents?—I do not think so.

5035. Do you think that, if the Liberals had been successful, still the broken jug and its consequences would have resulted in a riot?—No, I do not think so, as a whole. I think that the people knew the state of things, and the coercion, and they did not require so much to excite them as they otherwise would.

5036. Mr. Locke.] You said that there was no use in petitioning; why was that?—I think it would have been no use, for the reason that the other candidate would have had no chance of getting the seat, otherwise I believe there would have been a petition; might I be allowed to say that my firm opinion is, that we shall never, under the existing state of the law, have any chance of having a fair election by what we have seen; I wish to state that as my own opinion, because I have felt great interest in the state of things, and principally from feeling certain that things were so, and that there was this undue influence used.

5037. Mr. Villiers.] Do you know of any change that would tend to alter the state of things?—I think nothing but the ballot would do it.

5038. Mr. Cross.] Do not you think that if the people were very much better educated, that would of itself have some effect?—I do not think it would in our borough.

5039. Are you aware that there is hardly any bribery in Scotland?—I am not; but I am aware that there is very little bribery in Chippenham.

5040. Mr. Locke.] Were those persons that you have spoken of as having notices given to them, well educated; the man who employed seven or eight men, for instance, is he tolerably well educated?—Yes, he is tolerably well educated; he has a shop in the town besides his works; he is very well educated for our country.

5041. Are those persons who have allotments generally rather above the ordinary class?—Not all of them.

5042. Are not some of them?—No, I should not say they were above the ordinary class; I should say they were quite the ordinary class.

5043. Are they people who can read, write, and cypher?—Yes, every one of them I should think could read, write, and cypher.

5044. Sir George Grey.] How would the ballot have prevented the riot which took place on the evening of the polling-day?—I think that if the people had felt that it was a just election, there would not have been that strong feeling that existed.

5045. Mr. Villiers.] The impression now is that it was not fair?—It is.

5046. And that undue influence was used?—Yes, it is.

Mr. Arthur Cheese, called in; and Examined.

Mr. A. Cheese.

5047. Mr. Hunt.] You are a Solicitor, practising at Hay, in Breconshire?—I am.

5048. You have been engaged for many years at different periods in elections?—I have.

5049. You have had experience for several years, have you not, in Wales, of Welsh elections?—Yes, since 1851, in South Wales and Herefordshire.

5050. You were engaged professionally, were you not, in managing the Brecon election of 1866?—I was.

5051. Were you engaged in the election at Brecon in November 1868?—I was.

5052. Had you been engaged in the Carmarthenshire election of 1868?—I had.

5053. Are you acquainted with the influences that were used at those elections?—I am.

5054. Is it the case that ministers of religion in Wales take a very active part at elections?—They do.

5055. All of them?—All of them; more so at the last election than, to my experience, at previous elections.

5056. Was that the case with the clergymen of the Church of England?—Yes, I should say that they took a greater interest in the last election than they had in previous ones.

5057. Was that in consequence of the Irish Church question being the main topic of interest?—Undoubtedly.

5058. Is it the case that Dissenting ministers of different denominations took a very active part in this last election?—They have taken a more active part, because in many instances they have been actually paid agents.

5059. Have places of worship been used for political meetings?—Yes; in Brecon one chapel having refused permission, another chapel granted permission for a political meeting to be held in the chapel, at which the Liberal candidate attended. I am speaking now of November 1868.

5060. Was that the first time that chapels had been been used for political meetings?—I never heard of them being so used before.

5061. At those meetings was the political business the only business?—The only business.

5062. Do you know that the minister of the chapel was present?—He was, and he addressed the meeting.

5063. That was at the borough election of Brecon; are you aware of chapels being used for political meetings in other parts of Wales?—No, I cannot speak positively to other parts; I can only speak by rumour that they have been; but I cannot speak with accurate knowledge.

5064. With regard to Carmarthenshire, was that the case?—In Carmarthenshire I am aware that the Dissenting ministers took an active part in canvassing, in organising, and in bringing voters to the poll. I acted as an inspector at a booth in Llandovery, and two of my clerks acted as deputy sheriffs, one at Llanelly, and another at Llandovery the same day in the county; and that was the experience which I had that the dissenting ministers were most prominent in bringing men up to the poll, and polling them.

5065. And you say at that election they were paid agents?—They were paid agents; in some instances they sent in their accounts, and were returned in the same way as other paid agents would be.

5070. Would that be looked upon as a disgrace?—Yes, certainly, that would be the effect of it; it would be a disgrace. I think I am right in the definition of it, that disgrace would follow.

5071. Mr. Villiers.] What do you mean by society?—It is the term that is generally used in speaking of the particular society, the particular sect, or the particular church.

5072. Do you mean that the Baptists would call themselves a society?—Yes, or the Calvinistic Methodists would call themselves a society; what they call society meetings are constantly held, at which the members meet for prayer, and for religious conversation; and on one of those occasions, it was urged upon the members, as a matter of duty, to support the Liberal candidate, those meetings being usually held for religious conversation and for prayer.

doubt there was very great intimidation exercised upon them by their ministers.

5077. Is it the case in the elections in which you have been concerned, that the landlords use undue influence over their tenantry to induce them to vote?—The custom certainly is otherwise. It is usual for a candidate to obtain a letter from the landlord saying that he supports him, and that letter is shown to the tenants in the canvass, but the tenantry usually go with their landlords. The letter is generally worded in this way: "I shall have great pleasure in giving you my vote and influence, and I should be very glad to know that any of my tenantry support you." That would be a specimen of the usual letter which a landlord would write to a candidate. There is a strong traditionary feeling on the part of the tenants, that they have been in the habit, and their forefathers before them, of voting with their landlords, and they look upon it very much as a matter of course. I know many instances where men who entertain strong views, and are known Dissenters, holding under Conservative landlords, invariably poll for the Liberal party, without the slightest interference between themselves and their landlords.

5078. From your knowledge of the practice in those counties, have you found that where a tenant has voted against his landlord at an election, he suffers any ill consequence from it?—I never knew an instance of the kind. I have known a landlord feel and express disappointment at the time, during the day of the election, when he has been there, but I never knew it followed by any ill consequence. I am speaking with great knowledge of the Herefordshire contested election in 1852, and I was well acquainted with the contested election in 1856, and in the last election in 1868, when suddenly a contest arose; I am well acquainted with those three elections, and I never knew one instance where a person received a notice to quit that could reasonably be attributed to his having voted contrary to his landlord.

5079. Still, as a rule, tenants do vote with their landlords?—Yes, they do.

5080. Do you think they really do it as a matter of inclination?—If they were told that their landlord did not care how they went politically, the majority of them would endeavour to find out what would best please him in order that they should so vote.

5081. Even though the landlord had no wish at all to interfere?—Yes, I have found that to be the case.

5082. Have you ever heard tenants express a wish to have the ballot, in order to keep their votes secret from their landlords?—Never, as a rule; amongst farmers there is no general expression of that kind; if you meet with a farmer who belongs to the Liberal party, of course any particular "tenet" of his party, he would be found, as a rule, to hold with, but speaking of the farmers generally, I never heard them so express themselves; I am a member of two Chambers of Agriculture, and have been much mixed up with the landed interest, as an agent, and am otherwise familiar with the farmers in their houses and elsewhere, and with men holding different views, but I have never heard them so express themselves.

5083. Does the Chamber of Agriculture consist chiefly of tenant farmers?—Chiefly so; I am happy to say that the landlords now are joining them to some extent.

5084. You are not aware that the ballot has been a subject of discussion at those Chambers of Agriculture?—No; they keep from those matters as much as possible, and endeavour to avoid as much as possible almost any politico-agricultural subject, much less the ballot question, which is almost wholly political.

5085. Have you any opinion of your own with regard to the ballot?—I believe that any electioneering agent would almost be able to put his hands upon any person who had promised one way and voted another; I mean to say, that those who would be under such a suspicion would not consist of above five or six men; five or six men may be that sort of character that you would doubt them, even after their promises, but as a rule, you can tell at the end of the canvass pretty well how men intend to vote.

5086. Is it your opinion that, supposing the ballot was instituted at Parliamentary elections, it would be generally known in the neighbourhood of a voter how he voted?—Yes; more especially in the agricultural counties, because they have to travel to record their votes, and they travel with others and come back with others, and their conversation must tend to show how they are going to vote and how they have voted, unless there is a great deal of deception practised, which is not the characteristic of the people.

5087. In fact you mean that parties avow their politics and are proud of them?—Yes, at the time of an election they are; they are fond of wearing their colours and of showing on the day of the election how they voted.

5088. Do you think that if they voted under the system of the ballot, they would avow how they voted, and make no secret of how they voted?—That would be by far the prevailing idea, with very few exceptions.

5089. Do you think it would be an advantage that voters should have facilities for voting nearer their own homes?—I believe it would be a very great advantage.

5090. Have you ever at all considered how that could be effected?—Unless, parochially, in the board room of the parish; I have had experience with the present system of taking an election for guardians, and have always found it work extremely well. I have myself contested a town as an elected guardian, and have had an opportunity of seeing how it works, and I have seen it work extremely well. Under the Health of Towns Act, in appointing members, the same mode is adopted of taking votes, and I have always seen it work well.

5091. Do you think that the votes for Members of Parliament might be taken parochially?—I believe it would be a very great advantage if it could be so.

5092. That would take away the inequality which now exists between different voters on account of the unequal distances that they are from the polling-booth?—Yes; it is very hard upon an agricultural labourer to have to travel so far; he has to travel a long way at his own expense unless he is conveyed to the poll.

5093. That would save his losing the whole day?—Yes, and he would lose the excitement also, which very often ends in drunkenness, at the town where usually the voting is taken.

5094. And it would save, for the most part, any mob violence, would it not?—It would.

5095. Mr. Villiers.] What do you mean by voting parochially; do you mean voting as people do for guardians?—No, I meant that they should record their votes in the parish where they dwelt, and that they should not travel out of their parish to record their votes.

5096. You mean that there should be some booth erected in the parish where they live, and that they should go and record their votes there?—Yes; if a room could be had so much the better; but if there was not one it would be very easy to erect booths.

5097. That plan would get rid of a good deal of excitement, would it not?—To a very great extent it would.

5099. How would it be with the influence which you have been speaking of so much; would not the dissenting minister have more power over them on the spot?—No, he would not have more power; he may exercise the same power, but he would certainly not have more power; but having got to the town, at the time of recording their votes, the town would be pretty full, and the booth being surrounded by a mob, would rather lessen the power of a dissenting minister than add to it in the county elections.

5100. But if any influence were to be used by a landlord or by a clergyman, it would have more effect on the spot than if you had a mob at the county town, where you would meet a great many different people?—I think it is open to that observation; I should fancy that it may be so.

5101. And you would recommend that?—I recommend the system not for that reason; I think that would be, perhaps, one of the weak points of it.

5102. With respect to the spiritual influence which you have referred to, I think I recollect that you never heard and never saw it exercised yourself?—In bringing up voters I saw it.

5103. But I think you alluded particularly to what took place in a dissenting chapel. I think that you said that they had preached political sermons, and that they had almost threatened their flocks, if they did not vote in a particular way, with what would happen hereafter?—I have understood so.

5104. You have never attended a chapel when anything of this sort has gone on?—I have not.

5105. Have you heard it from other parties?—I have.

5106. Did you ever hear it said by any person opposed to you in politics?—I have.

5107. They have told you, and have complained of it, have they?—I have heard it as short a time back as yesterday, at Brecon, from a Sunday teacher, who was present at a chapel in Brecon, when his minister preached to the effect which I have mentioned.

5109. He said that they were traitors to their own religious sect; but did he go so far as to speak to what would happen to them in the future?—No, not in that case; that was the other man.

5110. I think you told us the same thing was done pretty much in the Church of England?—I did not intend to say so. I was entirely misunderstood if I was supposed to say so.

5111. I understood you to say that the established clergy used their influence, also, over their flocks?—I am not aware of any influence used by clergymen of the Established Church in their churches. I have known them canvassing in their parishes, in the same way as any other person may canvass.

5112. In fact the clergy of all denominations were very busy at the last election, were they not?—Yes, more than I have previously seen them.

5113. They considered, did they not, that there was a religious question involved?—Yes, undoubtedly.

5114. I suppose you have heard language used by the clergy, and by persons taking the view which they do upon this matter, as strong as any that has been repeated to you that has been used by dissenting ministers, have you not?—No, certainly not.

5115. Do you ever look at the papers and see the account of the public meetings which the clergy attend?—I constantly read the papers.

5116. Have you not seen strong language used upon the subject of the Irish Church?—I have seen the political opinions of clergymen and their opinions upon the national policy of the Ministry; but as applying to voters amongst their own congregation, or elsewhere, I have not.

5117. Have you not seen that they said, that persons would be traitors to their religion, and disobedient to Heaven, if they voted for the Irish Church measure?—No; on the contrary, I have known a great number of clergymen who voted the other way; the vicar of my own town voted for a Member who was in favour of the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church.

5119. Personal intimidation they have not much power of using, have they?—Yes, in this way, way, which is very different to the Church of England; if any member acts inconsistently with what they consider his obligations to their sect or society, his conduct is brought at once before the governing body; that is the custom and prevailing practice of Dissenters.

Mr. A. Cheese.

5120. Sir George Grey.] Do you apply this to all Dissenters in Wales, because there is a great variety of them?—The Wesleyan body are very free from it; and I should say that the Welsh Baptists refused permission for a meeting to be held in their chapel at Brecon, but it was held at another chapel afterwards, so that there is not uniformity amongst the different sects.

5121. Mr. Villiers.] You have only told us of a few, and you do not know them personally?—I have not been present in the chapel when such language has been used, but having heard it, I have endeavoured to obtain it from as good information as I could; I have inquired into the correctness of it, in order to see whether I should be justified in repeating it.

5122. What was it that you meant by using the chapel for political purposes?—Holding a public political meeting in the chapel, as it may be in an hotel or elsewhere.

5123. Or a vestry-room?—I never heard of a political meeting being held in a vestry-room.

5124. Have you ever known a public meeting being held in a chapel before?—I do not recollect any occasion upon which a public meeting was held before in a chapel, for a like purpose.

5125. Then it was peculiar to this occasion?—Yes; permission was refused by one dissenting chapel when it was asked for for that purpose.

5126. With respect to the influence that is used by landlords, you say that it consists in a letter that is sent to the candidate, and he shows it to the tenant, and thereupon the tenant votes for the candidate?—The election agent accompanying him round, and the other agents going round, use that letter. If more than one is required, copies are given, so that each agent undertaking the canvass of that district may be armed with that letter containing those sentiments.

5127. Have those tenants got leases?—No; it is almost the prevailing custom in my district of Herefordshire to hold as yearly tenants, but there is great fixity of tenure.

5128. That is to say, the same persons continue in occupation for a long time?—I should say that the average holding, even at one rental, would be equal to an average life ownership.

5129. And those people generally vote with the landlord, you say?—They almost invariably do; I look upon it as a relic of the old system, when the estates used not to be divided, when they paid no rent, and when a party of his men went with the landlord to the wars; that feeling seems to have been handed down, and it is a sort of traditionary policy to vote with their landlord; and I have heard that, for the last century at least, the tenantry have almost always voted with their landlords.

5130. Whatever his politics may be?—Yes.

5131. So that if a person votes black one day, and the landlord dies and his son succeeds him, and he is asked to vote white for him, he does it?—That is very much the case.

5132. That is when he ascertains what the landlord wishes?—Yes.

5133. And if the landlord does not send a letter round, they try and find out what will please him?—If there is a contest in the county, it is sure to be brought to the tenant's knowledge what the sentiments of his landlord are.

5134. You see no objection to that, do you; you can conceive a man wishing to vote against his landlord, as far as his opinion went, but you do not see any objection to his complying with the wish of the landlord?—I do not see any objection to his voting the same way as his landlord.

5135. And you object to the ballot?—I have not given such an opinion; the question was, how far I considered it would be a means of securing secresy; that was the question that was put to me.

5136. Are the Committee to infer that you are not altogether opposed to the ballot?—I do not feel any very strong idea about it; I do not think that it would effect what many believe it would; nor do I believe that it would be any disadvantage to the Conservative party.

5138. But you would not do away with canvassing, would you?—I very much question whether you can entirely do away with canvassing; you may do away with paid agents for canvassing; and although I am a paid agent myself, I think it would be a very good thing if it were so done away with; but I do not think that you can prevent canvassing.

5139. But whenever there is a canvass the electors are liable, are they not, to be influenced by the person who addresses them?—But where there is a canvass now, some of the electors are liable to be influenced on the one side as well as on the other.

5140. Do you think that it would be an advantage for the voter to exercise his own judgment as to how he should vote?—It is almost impossible to leave it to his own unfettered judgment when people discuss matters of that kind. I say that every person is, more or less, biassed by the opinions of others.

5141. But you think he is fit to have a vote, do you not?—Yes.

5142. Ought not he to be considered fit to exercise it freely?—Certainly; you ought not to intimidate people in forming their own judgment, but the majority of the electors of the country are men of no strong political feelings; and many of them, perhaps, have formed an opinion solely because their landlord, or some other person in whom they have confidence, have formed an opinion, but in forming their own political views they have not thought any of these matters out for themselves.

5143. You admit that there is influence used by the clergyman, and influence used by the landlord, and, upon the whole, you are satisfied with the result?—Yes; I believe that the exchanging of opinion by all those parties, and other people in the parish, tend to instruct them upon upon the matter, and they take their advice. I believe that there is no bad effect from it.

5144. That is not always the only influence that is used in the Welsh elections, is it?—No. I am sorry to say that both in England and Wales we have heard of other influences being used.

5145. When you alluded to Brecon just now, that was the election in 1868, was it not?—Yes, it was in November 1868.

5146. That was inquired into afterwards, I believe?—It was.

5147. I think there was a proceeding at the assizes in certain cases, was there not?—There was an indictment preferred.

5148. An indictment for bribery?—Yes.

5149. And an inquiry into the validity of the seat?—Yes.

5150. And the member unseated?—Yes.

5151. There was extensive bribery exercised at Brecon, was there not?—No; the judge reported that there was not extensive bribery.

5152. He did not report against the place altogether?—No; he reported that there was not extensive bribery prevailing at Brecon during the last election.

5153. Was the bribery only exercised by the agent of the sitting Member?—It was proved to be exercised by a man keeping a public-house there.

5154. But I suppose he was an agent, or supposed to be so?—He was returned as having received money, acting as an agent, for keeping a number of men to help to keep the peace, and so on. Upon those grounds the counsel for the then sitting Member explained that he should not contest the seat, and therefore he withdrew from the case.

5155. That was a clear case; but is there much of this sort of bribery in the elections throughout Wales; do you speak generally of the principality?—No; in South Wales there are very large boroughs, and I should think that their extent would prevent there being much bribery. I have recently seen another borough election, where I do not believe there was any bribery on either side.

5156. What place was that?—The contributory boroughs of Radnor. I believe that was an extremely pure election on both sides.

5157. But, in the large boroughs of Wales, was there treating?—I have no doubt that, the public-houses being open, partizans upon either side treated others whom they knew, and anybody, probably, who had not voted; and it is done by both sides. I mean that the same man may drink Conservative drink as well as Liberal drink the same day before he records his vote. There is a great deal of that, which tends very much to demoralise the polling day, going on through drinking.

5158. The public-houses are open on both sides, are they not?—Yes, the public-houses are open on both sides, and each person who knows that there is an unpolled man, on each side, is in the habit of treating him, and endeavouring to obtain some influence in that way; and it is one of the most demoralising scenes that you see upon the polling day.

5159. And after a good deal of that there is rioting, is there not?—We have seen that there have been riots at some places; English people are wonderfully free from quarrelling, notwithstanding all the excitement of an election; quarrels are not general amongst the English population.

Mr. A. Cheese. 4 May 1869.

5160. How is it with regard to the Welsh?—The Welsh are excitable; for as we have heard there was one case of riot; I do not know whether I am speaking accurately, but I am pretty clear that there was one very severe case: in the Monmouthshire election, there was a very serious riot.

5161. So that you must allow that treating, bribery, and undue influence were extensively practised in the Welsh elections?—I would not say that; I must leave out the middle word; I am not aware that bribery was extensively practised.

5162. With regard to those boroughs that you have spoken to, I think you say that it has not been practised except lately in the boroughs?—No; I said in answer to your question that some cases of bribery, by a person keeping a public-house, were considered as proved at the recent inquiry at Brecon.

5163. Chairman.] I understand that in your experience a large number of voters are subjected to two kinds of influence; the influence of the landlord on the one side, and the influence of the dissenting minister on the other?—Dissenting ministers have exercised considerable influence in these last elections.

5164. But do I understand you that a landlord usually exercises a certain influence over his tenant's vote?—I explained that, as far as I knew, the landlord, generally speaking, does not personally go from house to house to canvass his tenantry, but he writes a letter to the acting committee of the district for the candidate, stating what his views are, and generally saying that he would be glad if his tenants are able to give their votes in the same way.

5165. Still his opinions and wishes do exercise a certain influence over the votes of the tenant?—They do; but I think that the tenant is as anxious to vote the same way as his landlord is that he should.

5166. That is influence exercised by the landlord, is it not?—Undoubtedly it comes to an influence.

5168. Have you known any case in which a tenant has been dismissed, or suffered any bad consequences from voting against his landlord?—I never knew such an instance. I have known a landlord annoyed for the time being, but I never knew a tenant who had to leave his farm in consequence of his having voted differently to his landlord. I do not say that such cases do not exist, exist, but I speak from considerable experience as a land agent.

Mr. A. Cheese.

5169. Is there not a very general apprehension among tenants that they will suffer if they vote contrary to their landlord?—Yes, there is no doubt that it may be taken that if they wish to keep their landlord pleased with them, it is better not to risk doing any act which will make him displeased, but beyond that general feeling I know of nothing else.

5170. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Was the election 1868 the first occasion upon which the influence of the dissenting ministers was used so very extensively, as you have stated?—Yes; it has been far more extensive at the late election than before.

5171. I suppose most of those dissenting ministers are Welsh, are they not?—Yes, they are.

5172. And they address their congregations in Welsh?—Yes.

5173. Those chapels belong in some degree, do they not, to the flocks who generally have a large interest in them?—Yes.

5174. And it is a sort of subscription, is it not?—Yes.

5175. They are members of a sort of building fund by which the chapel is raised?—Yes, they raise their chapels by a fund of that kind. Sometimes they have a debt upon their chapel, but generally speaking one of the body lends the money, and they have meetings and subscribe together until gradually they release it from that debt.

5176. Is it in consequence of that, do you think, that some of the members claim to hold meetings at those chapels?—No, I do not think so.

5177. Do you think that that is the action of the minister alone?—I think it is the act of the minister and the deacons. I do not know that they are exactly analogous, but the deacons are something like our churchwardens. They exercise, I think, the chief power over the chapel, and they have great power in that respect, because I think the building is in their name and it has been originally conveyed to them; the chapel has to be conveyed to trustees, in order to comply with the requirements of the Act of Parliament.

5178. As a general rule, do you think that the Welsh people are very susceptible of religious influences?—Very considerably so. For instance, a body of Welsh labourers coming down to reap will spend their Sundays in singing sacred music, although perhaps their week days were very differently spent, or rather the nights of the weeks, in drinking cyder to excess. They observe the Sabbath very particularly indeed, and they are certainly subject to considerable religious influences.

5179. You state, do you not, that you are in favour of taking the votes by voting papers?—I have seen it act well in the case of the elections of guardians.

5180. Do you not think that the same influence would be used for the purpose of filling up the voting papers in the way that the ministers wished?—Not if the penalties were made not too large and were strictly enforced. I do not think that great punishments in cases of that kind are very advisable. I think if the penalties were smaller and they were strictly enforced, it would be a means of preventing much interference with those papers.

5181. Are your elections of guardians generally contested?—Very often they are disputed in one parish or other in the union. The union with which I am connected, would average two or three contested elections.

5182. Have you found any instances of fraud practised in filling up the voting papers at the election of guardians when party feeling ran high?—No; I am speaking perhaps from a limited experience, as I only speak from what is within my own knowledge; I have not seen it so; I can imagine that it may be done when feeling ran high, but then it would be detected.

5183. There have been complaints from different parts of the country with regard to the election of guardians, have there not; I do not know whether there have been any from Wales?—I am not aware of any, but in collecting the papers you would have considerable means of detecting anything of that kind.

5184. In what way, when a paper was once signed, could you detect whether the signature had been obtained by influence or not?—You can examine the paper itself, and examine the voter as to whether it had been done by him or whom it had been done by.

5185. In the case of a large number of persons voting, it would be very difficult, would it not, to inquire whether every signature had been given properly?—If you had any reason to believe, in any particular case, that that was so, you could get at the fact.

5186. There are a large proportion of those Welsh tenants who are hardly able to write, are there not?—I am coroner in one county and I am deputy coroner in another, and I am glad to say that you very seldom meet now with persons acting upon a jury who cannot write their names; a few years ago you would have met with them, but you scarcely ever meet with them now; the old people are very much ashamed of it, when that is the case with them, and almost all the young people can write their names.

5187. You think, therefore, that education has been progressing very much in Wales?—Yes, very much indeed.

5188. You say that most of those tenants are perfectly willing to vote for their landlords; do not they take any interest themselves in political questions?—Generally in Wales they do not, except so far as regards questions that may be connected with their religion.

5189. Mr. Raikes.] You were asked just now whether bribery, treating, and intimidation prevailed extensively in the Welsh elections; are you aware how many petitions have been presented as the result of the last general election in Wales?—I cannot quite say; I do not at this moment recollect, but in South Wales I think there were extremely few; I do not know at this moment, besides Brecon, where to mention the next place.

5190. Are you aware that there were only two petitions presented in the whole of Wales, namely, Brecon and Pembroke?—I do not believe there have been more; I am under the impression that there have not been.

5191. Are you not aware, that for the last 20 years there has scarcely been a single case of an election petition in Wales?—I believe it is as you say.

5192. You have been asked about bribery at the last election at Brecon, in 1868; has there ever ever been any rumour of bribery on any occasions besides 1868, at Brecon?—Yes, I should say there had been, speaking by rumour; answering the question generally, I should say I have heard rumours; you hardly ever come to the end of an election without there being rumours of bribery at the time, and generally threats, which very often come to nothing afterwards, but I am bound to say yes in answer to your question.

5193. I believe that Brecon has the character of being rather an exceptionally corrupt borough for Wales; is that not so?—Indeed I do not think that; the cases in which bribery was proved were chiefly amongst railway people, not inhabitants of Wales, but people who may be called in some measure a migratory or a new population, who are engaged on the railway, and those were the cases where bribery was alleged.

5194. You have had an election since 1868 at Brecon, have you not?—Yes.

5195. Was there any talk of bribery at that election?—I would rather say nothing about that, because the three weeks for lodging a petition have not passed, and I should not be justified in saying anything about it.

5196. With regard to the difference of the influence which clergymen and dissenting ministers use, I think I understood you to say that the influence used by the clergy was merely a social influence, such as any number of gentlemen might bring to bear upon persons with whom he was acquainted?—Yes; it was a mere matter of canvassing.

5197. But the influence exerted by dissenting ministers was an appeal to the superstitious or the religious feeling of their flocks?—Yes, I so wished to put it.

5198. Mr. Whitbread.] With reference to an answer which you gave early in your evidence, you said that it had come to your knowledge that threats had been held out to some members of a dissenting congregation that their names would be posted on the wall if they did not vote in a certain direction; did you ever know any persons' names posted on the wall?—No, I did not; I made that inquiry, and I found that no such thing had ever taken place.

5199. And you never heard of such cases occurring?—No.

5200. Is the fact of a man's name being posted on the wall supposed to be likely to be followed by his expulsion from the society?—What I said was, that I thought it would convey to the members a disgrace as between themselves and their co-religionists.

5201. Then this vague fear of being posted on the wall, which has never been realised in any single case, is sufficient, in your mind, to intimidate those who are so anxious, but for that, to express their political feelings, and show their colours?—I think that is one of the things that worked together, and made them feel that, as far as they could, it was their duty as a religious community to vote for the Liberals.

5202. Suppose you had the ballot, how would it be possible for a religious community to exercise that intimidation over any of its own members who chose to vote against the dissenting minister?—If political sermons are preached, and political addresses delivered in chapels, I fancy that the religious effect would be produced, and would carry this result as much with the ballot, or perhaps more with the ballot, than in any other way.

5203. I ask you how it is possible a man can be threatened with having his name posted on the wall if he voted under the ballot?—I do not see that it would.

5204. The possibility of that would be done away with, at all events?—Yes, by means of the ballot, recording his vote in secret, it would be as you suggest.

5205. Then that threat would be done away with?—Yes.

5206. Does not your evidence come to this very much, that you see no objection to a landlord, who is an educated man, and has formed a strong opinion upon political subjects, conveying that opinion by means of a letter to his tenants, and the tenants universally accepting it?—I see no objection to his making his own sentiments known.

5207. But you do see a very strong objection in a dissenting minister forming a political opinion and expressing it, and in his congregation accepting it?—I see an objection to his mixing it up with his religious duties, and making it a means of influencing his flock; I look upon that very much in the nature of priestly tyranny or interference, which has always been objected to by Protestants.

5208. Mr. Leatham.] In the Welsh villages and small towns, are there many buildings large enough for public meetings to be held in them?—There is now, generally speaking, a good national school-room in each village.

5209. But that would not be accessible to persons holding dissenting views?—No; I mean for the purpose of recording votes, not for the purpose of holding meetings.

5210. Is not the national school-room generally used as a place for holding meetings on the Conservative side?—I never knew a Conservative meeting held at a national school-room.

5211. Where were the Conservative meetings held?—I have known them held at hotels chiefly; almost always at hotels, and at shire and town halls.

5212. Were there not meetings held in the villages in Wales?—I do not know of any being held there; I dare say they may have been, but I do not know of my own knowledge of any being held in the villages.

5213. On either side?—With the exception of the chapel meetings.

5214. Of course it would be in those very villages in which there do not exist any large rooms that chapels were used for the purposes of holding meetings?—No, the only place I have spoken of as having been used for that purpose was at Brecon, where other places do exist.

5215. I thought you mentioned other places besides the town of Brecon in which chapels were used?—Then I did not make myself understood.

5216. Then you only refer to one public meeting in one chapel?—I only refer to one public meeting that came within my own knowledge.

5217. Is it not the practice in Wales to allow lectures on secular subjects to be delivered in chapels?—Yes; lectures delivered upon secular subjects, not upon political subjects, that I am aware of.

5218. The issue raised at the last election was regarded regarded as a religious issue by both parties, was it not?—In Wales it was particularly so.

4 May 1869.

5219. So that the political meetings of which you speak were regarded as having a strong religious element about them?—Undoubtedly.

5220. I understand you to say that you object strongly to the political and spiritual influence exercised by dissenting ministers at elections?—Yes, I do.

5221. Can you suggest any remedy for that state of things?—No.

5222. Has it ever occurred to you that the ballot would be a remedy for that state of things?—I do not think it would at all; I think it is a strong mental influence which the ballot would not be a remedy for.

5223. Do we understand you correctly that you have not quite made up your mind as to the ballot?—I doubt whether the ballot will give the secrecy that many believe it will, because I think that people in their general communications with each other, must, more or less, make known how they have voted, because they must make their political feelings known.

5224. Did I understand you correctly to say that you would not consider the adoption of the ballot a disadvantage to the Conservative party?—I do not believe it would be.

5225. Nor would it be a disadvantage, I presume, to the country in that case?—I do not know that it would.

5226. Mr. Hunt.] What I understand you to mean is this, with regard to the influence used by ministers in elections, that if a minister threatens a man with eternal punishment if he votes in one way, and a person believed it, he would act upon it, whether he voted secretly or openly?—That is exactly my opinion.

5227. So that that sort of influence is an influence which no ballot protection would ever touch?—I quite believe that.

Mr. Ben Thomas Williams, called in; and Examined.

Mr. B. T. Williams.

5228. Chairman.] You are a Barrister, are you not?—Yes, on the South Wales Circuit.

5229. Have you had much experience in Welsh elections?—Yes, since the year 1861 I have had considerable experience in some elections.

5230. Have you heard the evidence which has just been given?—Yes.

5231. Is there any observation which you wish to make upon it?—I think it is entirely incorrect with regard to the undue influence which dissenting ministers are said to exercise over their people.

5232. You think that such influence is not used?—No, not in the manner described by the witness. A dissenting minister, from his position and character, has considerable influence in the district in which he lives; but my experience of what ministers do at elections is this, that they appeal to the people on the ground of principle, and show to them that, as consistent Dissenters, they must take a certain line, or ought to take a certain line; but I have never known anything beyond that. And, as for holding out any threat with regard to what was likely to occur to them hereafter, if they voted against their party, or about expelling them from their chapels, in all my acquaintance with Welsh Dissenters, which is very great, I have never known an instance of the kind.

5233. They are generally, I believe, very active people in their neighbourhood?—Yes, they are consulted to a great extent by the people generally, especially in the Welsh districts; a Welsh farmer looks to his dissenting minister as his chief adviser in all things.

5234. Are they generally active and striving people?—They are very active in the discharge of their duties.

5235. And they have considerable influence among the voters quite apart from their spiritual character?—Yes.

5236. And they are good canvassers, are they not?—Yes. With reference to the use of chapels, the Dissenters have not the same feeling with regard to the sanctity of any particular place that members of the Established Church and other religious denominations have, and consequently they continually permit their chapels to be used for secular purposes, and it is by no means an exceptional thing that they should be used for electioneering purposes.

5237. Have you known clergymen of the Established Church take an active part in elections?—Yes, very.

5238. What sort of influence have they brought to bear?—They have exercised the same kind of influence that the landlords and country gentlemen in Wales always have exercised. I know very well, in parishes with which I am acquainted, the clergyman has been the great Conservative power in the parish for years.

5239. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What county are you connected with?—I belong to the South Wales circuit. I am well acquainted with almost every county in that circuit, but I am more immediately connected with the county of Pembroke, of which I am a magistrate and a native.

5240. Have any instances of undue influence, in any shape or form, come under your notice, either by the clergy or by the landlords, or by any person?—Yes; I think that the landlords in Wales do exercise an undue influence in the elections.

5241. Will you explain what is the nature of that undue influence?—In two ways; first of all, by intimidation. On many large estates in Wales they do not grant leases, and their tenants are yearly tenants. Of course there is that feeling on the part of a tenant that if he does not go with his landlord in an election he will be turned out of his holding, and in certain districts of Wales which I know, the north part of Pembrokeshire especially, the first question that a tenant always asks is, which way his master goes.

5242. Is it not the case, as explained by the last witness, that in the great majority of instances a tenant has no desire to vote against his landlord's wishes?—That is so, there is no doubt of it. In the rural districts of Wales distant from towns, there is very little notion of political independence on the part of the Welsh voter.

5243. Without

5243. Without any pressure whatever, he wishes to vote in the same way as his landlord?—He generally says that he should like to vote the other way, but he must just go with his master. That is the answer that has been frequently given to myself.

5245. Is it your experience that this is general, or is it only on one side?—I think that landlord influence has also been used by the great Whig houses in South Wales, as much as by the Conservative houses.

5247. Did you ever know a case where eviction has been threatened?—Not directly by the landlord, but I have known a case of such a threat by the solicitor acting for the landlord.

5248. Mr. Hunt.] Do you say that such language as the last witness has described, was never used in Welsh chapels?—Yes; the rumour got about, and it got into one of the papers; I have endeavoured to trace this rumour, and I have challenged the persons, who have been repeating it in my presence, to produce a single instance of anything of the kind.

5249. Did you ever make inquiry in Brecon?—No; I have been at Brecon, and I was professionally engaged there in the bribery cases at the last assizes.

5250. Have you ever made inquiry about the language used at Brecon in chapels by the ministers?—Yes, I have.

5251. Are you prepared to say that no such language has ever been used at a chapel in Brecon?—I do not believe it; I was not present, and of course I cannot say that it was not used.

Mr. JOSEPH MURPHY, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Murphy.

5252. The O'Conor Don.] YOU are a Solicitor residing in Limerick, are you not?—Yes.

5253. Have you had considerable experience of elections, both Parliamentary and municipal?—I have had a good deal of experience

5254. First, with respect to the municipal elections in Limerick, do you think that they were generally carried on purely up to a certain date?—I think they were generally.

5255. In 1865 was there a change in that respect?—There was at the general election in November 1865.

5256. What took place at the municipal elections in 1865?—There was a very close contest for the mayoralty in that year, which came off on the 1st of December; and then at all the wards in the elections of the 20th of November there was a great struggle between the two candidates' voters or friends at the elections.

5257. Nearly every ward in the city was contested I believe?—No; there were only four wards contested, I think.

5258. Was the contest a political one, or was it a personal contest?—Entirely personal.

5259. At that election there was a great deal of rioting, was there not?—There was very great rioting indeed.

5260. In one particular ward were you not called in to give advice in consequence of the rioting?—I was sent for by the presiding alderman at three o'clock to advise him whether he had the power to adjourn the poll, as he was called upon to adjourn the poll till the following day, in consequence, as was alleged, of the fact that voters could not come up to the poll; that they were afraid to leave their houses from the mobs that paraded the streets. I advised him that he had no power to do it under the Act of Parliament.

5261. Do you think there were many persons prevented from recording their votes from fear?—One of the candidates, the candidate who was thrown out, was Mr. M'Donald, who was a candidate for the mayoralty also, and, in my presence, he handed in the names of 10 persons who, he alleged, were not able to walk up to the poll.

5262. Do you think there was bribery carried on to any extent in addition to the violence?—I cannot speak of my own personal knowledge; but the general opinion was that there was considerable bribery.

5263. On both sides, or on one side only?—On one side only; on the side of the person who succeeded. I may mention that a burgess came to me to bring an action for him against the person who bribed him, from whom he received a half-note for 10*l.* to vote for particular candidates, and he voted for the other candidates afterwards, and he then came to me to know if I would bring an action against the person who gave him the half-note.

5264. Did you advise him to carry on the action?—I declined to be the person to bring it.

5265. Sir George Grey.] Did he get the other half-note?—Never.

5266. The O'Conor Don.] Was there much treating carried on at the election?—There must have been, for I myself saw a drunken mob parading the streets in all directions, and windows broken.

5267. Was the treating confined to treating the mob?—Yes.

5268. Not to treating the electors for their votes?—Not to my knowledge; I saw no electors drunk; but I saw plenty of drunken mobs.

5269. Has the defeated candidate at a municipal election any mode of redress if he be defeated by improper means?—No; practically he has no redress.

5270. Is there any provision in the Irish Municipal Act for the repression of bribery and corrupt practices?—Yes, there is.

5271. Could you state what is the provision?—Sections 90 and 91 of the Irish Municipal Act impose a penalty of 50*l.* upon any person who bribes, or any person who takes a bribe to be paid to any one who brings the action.

5272. Where

5272. Where can that action be brought?—In the superior courts, and the penalty of 50 l., with costs of the suit, according to the words of the Act.

5273. Such an action could not be brought without great expense, I presume?—No, not without considerable expense; the costs would probably be about 100 l.

5274. As far as your experience goes, has any advantage ever been taken of that Act; has there been any attempt made to put it in force?—Not during the time that I have been connected with Limerick.

5275. Would you propose any alteration in the law, giving a defeated candidate, at a municipal election, the means of redress when he is defeated by improper means?—I think that it would be very desirable not to leave him entirely without remedy, if he loses his election by unfair means; what I suggest would be that the defeated candidate, or any burgess, might present a petition similar to the one that is now presented in Parliamentary elections, but on a cheaper scale, to be tried before a judge of assize; it should be rather cheaper than the inquiry now held.

5276. Do you mean that there should be an inquiry before a judge of assize in the ordinary way?—Yes, the petitioner lodging 100 l. for costs; I think that the existence of such an Act would be deterrent, and moreover likely to prevent any improper practices at an election.

5277. At present there is no deterrent at all, because this action, in the superior courts, is one that never would be resorted to?—It never has been.

5279. The Parliamentary franchise is much lower than that, is it not?—It is one half only, 4 l.

5280. The number of the Parliamentary electors, therefore, is considerably greater, is it not, than that of the municipal electors?—There are about twice as many, but that is not altogether occasioned by the difference of the qualification, because there are liberties or rural districts about Limerick where the rated occupiers have the franchise to the town; I think there may be from 200 to 300 persons within the city proper, more upon the Parliamentary roll than upon the burgess roll.

5281. What is the mode of voting at the municipal elections?—There are an alderman and two assessors besides, and the voter signs a written paper giving the name and the residence of the person that he votes for; and it is open voting.

5282. Must the voter hand in the written paper himself?—Yes.

5283. Do you know whether there is any difference in the law between the Irish mode of conducting the municipal elections and the English mode?—I rather think not. I believe that the Irish Act was formed upon the model of the English Act; that is my recollection of it.

5284. Have you also had experience of the Parliamentary elections in Limerick?—Yes, I have conducted a good many of them.

5285. As far as you know, has bribery prevailed at those elections?—No; as a rule I scarcely know what bribery is in Limerick.

5286. Does treating prevail there?—The treating of non-electors has always prevailed there.

5287. And the hiring of mobs?—Yes.

5288. As to the treating of non-electors, is not that turned into a species of bribing the publicans and small grocers?—The publican or the small grocer will expect that he will get orders for drink from whatever candidates he is going to vote for; that is to say, from the friends of the candidates that he is going to vote for; he will expect it, and he will announce that he expects it.

5289. And do you think that the vote is to a certain extent dependent upon getting those orders?—I think it must be influenced to a very great extent by that circumstance.

5290. The hiring of mobs at those elections is almost the universal practice there, is it not?—Yes, it has been universal at every election that I ever knew in the city of Limerick; there have been mobs on both sides.

5291. When a mob is hired upon one side it becomes essential to the other side to hire a mob also, does it not?—It is indispensible then.

5292. At the last Parliamentary election for the city of Limerick, was there not a curious combination between the Conservatives and those of the electors who had Fenian proclivities?—Yes, one of the candidates had for his colleague Mr. Pigott of the "Irishman," and that, of course, evoked the feelings of any persons having Fenian sympathies in the town, and they went that way.

5293. And the Conservatives supported him also?—They did.

5294. This contest, I believe, was a very unexpected one?—It was unexpected down to the day before the nomination day.

5295. How did it first show itself; was not there a large mob hired?—It was unkown till the Monday morning, the nomination day being on the Tuesday, and on the Monday morning a large canvassing party for Tate and Pigott were seen in the streets, accompanied by probably from 400 to 500 men canvassing, and cheering and shouting, and making a general noise.

5296. And the other side immediately then had to engage a mob to counteract them?—It then became a matter of necessity for the canvassing party on the other side, as they could not go out to canvass.

5297. And between the two mobs the town for those days was in a state of complete disorder, was it not?—Yes; there was tumult, disorder, and breaking of windows.

5298. Sir George Grey.] Are you speaking now of the nomination day?—It was on the Monday, the day before the nomination day, that this scene took place about the hiring of the two mobs; and that night there was tumult and disorder in the town, and of course that continued until the election was over.

5299. The O'Conor Don.] Was this mob intimidation which you speak of, carried on to intimidate the voters or to prevent their going up to the poll?—To intimidate them beforehand.

5300. Was the intimidation to prevent their voting at all, or to make them vote in accordance with the wishes of the mob?—The object of course was to get them to vote in accordance with with the wishes of the mob, but what I meant to convey was, that practically upon the polling-day there was no obstruction to anyone that chose to go up to the poll or to his voting, because there were plenty of police and military, and the town was perfectly quiet upon the polling-day.

5301. Then, the mob intimidation was preceding the polling day?—The mob intimidation was on the day and night of the nomination day, and very much upon the intervening day.

5302. Do you think that a mob has much effect upon voters in frightening them?—I think it has upon the lower class of shopkeepers in the town; beyond all doubt, they are influenced very much by what is the popular current feeling of the town and of the people around them.

5303. Have you had any knowledge of landlord intimidation, or the influence of customers over shopkeepers being brought unduly to bear at those elections?—In the liberties or rural districts which contain between a third and a fourth of the Parliamentary electors, the usage is that the landlord and the agent bring up the voters in batches, when they take a part in the elections at all.

5304. Do they bring them up under a guard?—I have seen them brought up under a guard of police and military, and I have seen some of them brought in carriages and cars down to the polling place, surrounded by the military.

5305. Along with the under-agents or drivers, as they call them?—Yes; the agents being with them.

5306. Do you think that this mob intimidation which you speak of is brought to bear more upon the electors who are supposed to belong to the same side as the mob, and who are through other influences supposed to be going against that side?—Yes; I speak of Limerick now; to distinguish them, I will call them Catholic voters; and it is entirely to influence their votes that the mob is ever used or employed.

5307. The Liberal mob does not interfere with the regularly recognised Conservative voters?—No; very few cases occur of windows being broken belonging to the Conservatives, but they constantly break the windows of a Catholic elector who they think is going to vote against the popular party.

5308. The Roman Catholic priests in Limerick, as in other parts of Ireland, have a good deal of influence, have they not?—Yes; they have very great influence indeed.

5309. The influence that they have, I presume, is chiefly in persuading the people that a certain course is the right course?—Yes.

5310. Do you think that, if the people believed that the priest was taking a wrong course, he then would have such influence over them as to make them vote against their own convictions?—I think that the priests ask the people to vote, from my knowledge of the people, in the way that the people would like to vote themselves.

5311. Do you think that the priest's influence is rather brought to bear to encourage the people to stand up for their own convictions?—Yes; to counteract that of the landlord and agent.

5312. If those other influences were withdrawn the priests would probably not interfere much in the matter?—There would be no occasion, I believe, for the feeling of the people would be to vote for the Liberal candidates; I speak of the Limerick Catholic electors; their feeling would be vote for those who are known as the Liberal candidates.

5313. But supposing that there was such a case as this, that there were a priest of Conservative opinions, do you think that he would have much influence over those people in making them vote contrary to the Liberal politics, which they usually adopt?—I think not, if the landlord was not interfering, but if the landlord and the priest were together, of course it would give them great encouragement to vote for the Conservative candidate.

5314. What do you think is the only remedy for all this corrupt influence of much intimidation and treating?—I do not know of any other remedy to prevent those corrupt influences at elections but the ballot.

5315. Do you think that if the ballot were established it would put a stop to such influence as the influence of customers over shopkeepers?—I think it should, because I assume that the ballot would be perfectly secret, and that no one would know how a person had voted.

5316. And also the influence of landlords over their tenants?—Yes.

5317. Do you think it would also do away with what appears to be the state of things in Limerick, namely, the necessity for having mobs?—I think it would; if an election took place in Limerick next week I think it would be a matter of necessity to have a mob.

5318. If you had the ballot you do not think that that would be necessary?—I should hope so; that is the only remedy that I know of, or that can be suggested.

5319. At present, I presume, from your evidence, you think that there is not real freedom of election either in those municipal or Parliamentary contests?—I do not think that there is thorough freedom of election.

5320. Do you think that if the ballot were established, and any Catholic differed in opinion from his priest, and voted on the other side, he would afterwards tell the priest that he had so voted?—He might tell the priest, or he might tell the landlord if he voted for him.

5321. But if he voted against him, would he do so?—He would not tell him that he had voted against him, of course.

5322. You are a Roman Catholic yourself, are you not?—Yes.

5323. Do you think that if you voted honestly, according to your own convictions, the priest would have a right to ask you in the confessional how you voted, or if he did ask you, that you would be bound to answer him?—Most certainly not; I am quite certain that such a question would not be put.

5324. And if it were put, you would not feel bound to answer it?—Certainly not.

5325. Further, you do not think, probably, that the ballot would give the priest more than any other person any undue influence over the voters?—I do not think it would give the priest more influence; it would give the popular party very considerable advantage in the part of Ireland where I am living.

5326. Do you mean because it would enable people to vote in accordance with their convictions?—Yes, and that is the way in which the priest always asks them to vote; at least, that is the side which he interferes for.

5327. Mr. Villiers.] You spoke of mobs being hired; hired; do you know what the terms are, or whether any contract of any sort is made with the mob?—I heard it proved upon the petition for the last election, that they were hired on one side at 2 s. 6 d. a day.

5328. But what were they to do?—They were to assemble in the streets, and go along with the candidates and the canvassing party, and cheer, and shout, and then attend in the Courthouse upon the nomination day to cheer, and to get a show of hands for the candidates, and to endeavour to give them a prestige of popularity in the town; that is all that the mob do.

5329. Do they undertake to have any weapons, such as bludgeons, or any other means of intimidating people?—No, they do not undertake to do that, but they certainly come armed with bludgeons very frequently.

5330. Are they under any discipline; is there somebody that gives them directions, or leads them?—Yes; there is always some friend of the candidates who interferes, and who employs the heads of the mob.

5331. It is a well understood thing, is it, that they are hired and organised for the purpose?—It is.

5332. And it is perfectly notorious in the place?—Perfectly notorious.

5333. Then you say that as the election goes on they are induced to destroy property?—Yes, the mobs will then come in contact constantly, and assualts take place and lives have been lost even.

5334. I think you say that the mobs are very much regarded as a matter of necessity?—Yes.

5335. It is notorious, therefore, that those mobs are hired and organised for the purpose of creating a disturbance and intimidating the inhabitants?—They are hired for the purpose originally of accompanying the canvassing party, but it ultimately leads to a collision between the mobs.

5336. What part do the magistrates take upon those occasions?—The magistrates, of course, when any riot takes place bring out the constabulary and disperse the mob.

5337. But knowing what the purpose of those mobs is, do they not take any precautions beforehand to prevent collisions?—They do very commonly, and the military and police are brought into the town, but they cannot be everywhere; when the police and military are called out to a street it may be too late. Some breaking of windows have taken place and assaults have been committed, and then they come too late.

5338. If it is a recognised part of the election that there is to be those riots and intimidation, it is known before-hand that that will take place?—Not until one side hires a mob, and then it becomes perfectly indispensable that the other side should hire a mob.

5339. You have known several elections at Limerick, have you not?—I have known several elections.

5340. Is it usual at those elections to have those mobs?—It is perfectly usual.

5341. And there has been no attempt made to prevent it?—There has been no effectual attempt to prevent it.

5342. What has taken place after heads are broken and property destroyed; do the magistrates then interfere at all?—Then if the police upon information arrested anyone, they were brought out to be dealt with under the ordinary course of justice. At the last assizes there were several persons convicted for assualts and riots that took place at the election.

5343. Were the men on both sides convicted of those assaults?—Yes, on both sides.

5344. Do the magistrates never meet for the purpose of considering whether it should not be prevented before-hand?—They meet to make the best arrangements they can, and they very generally divide themselves through the town; a couple of magistrates preside in one part of the town and a couple in the other; but, as I said before, the military and the constabulary cannot be everywhere.

5345. You say, do you not, that the priests interfere and the agents and landlords interfere?—They do in the liberties especially.

5346. Each trying to influence the people dependent upon him to vote in a particular way?—Yes.

5347. And they do not do anything to disguise those mobs?—No; I do not think there is any effort made to disguise them or to put them down.

5348. It is looked upon as a necessary part of the election?—Yes, it is.

5349. I think you spoke of three parties, the Liberal party, the Conservative party, and another party, which was represented by the editor of the "Irishman," that is, the Fenian party?—Yes.

5350. Did the last have a mob of their own, or did they act with either of the others?—They had a mob of their own at the last election, and the Conservative party coalesced with them.

5351. Which did the two that coalesced lean to, the landlord party or the priest party?—The landlord party leaned to them and made use of them for the purposes of the election.

5352. The landlord party and the Fenian party combined?—They did; but the landlord party had no mob, they merely used the Fenian mob.

5353. Do you know what tempted the Fenian mob to act with them; was there an arrangement before-hand, as you state in other cases there is, was there a hiring of the Fenian mob of the landlord party?—I do not think there was a hiring of the Fenian mob, because I think that the Fenian mob acted upon their own impulse in opposing what were termed the Whig candidates at the election.

5354. Upon which side were the Roman Catholic clergy?—They were all on one side, in favour of the Liberal candidates.

5355. And the Fenians were against the Liberal candidates, were they?—Yes, they were entirely against them.

5356. When you speak of the landlord party, whom do you refer to in the borough of Limerick; would it be the owners of houses?—No; I am speaking more of the rural districts, the Conservative holders of land there.

5357. That is to say, there is some land included in the borough?—Yes; the rural district includes, I believe, between one-third and one-fourth of the entire constituency.

5358. Have the priests no influence over those tenants?—They have, of course, if the landlord does not interfere; but when the landlord interferes, he is almost always successful in getting one vote from the tenant; the tenant will always give one vote to the landlord and the other to his country, as he terms it.

Mr. J. Murphy.

5359. If the priests are on the one side, do they not act sometimes with the landlord?—I never knew an instance of it; that is to say, where the landlord was on the Conservative side I never knew an instance of it.

5360. Is it considered that the interests of the priests and of the landlord are antagonistic?—They are antagonistic in political matters, because the one is in favour of one set of principles, and the other in favour of another.

5361. The landlord being Conservative, and the priest Liberal?—Yes, the tenant being a Liberal and the tenant being a Catholic.

5362. But I suppose the tenants are Catholic in the country districts, are they not?—They are nearly all so.

5363. But in those cases they do not heed the influence of the priests?—They do by giving the priest one vote where the landlord presses for the other vote; and if the landlord does not press at all, the priest carries off the two votes.

5364. And unless the Fenians interfere, there is nobody else to influence him but the priest or the landlord?—There is no one else; but the voters in this district are a very intelligent body of farmers, and they appear to me, from my intercourse with them, to understand public affairs very well, and if neither the landlord nor the priest interfere, I think that they would be quite competent to vote for themselves.

5365. But as it is, they neutralise their vote, because they have been giving one to the priest and the other to the landlord?—That is the way it turns out where the landlord interferes.

5366. Is there ever an occasion when he does not?—Yes, at the last election for Limerick the landlords did not interfere generally at all.

5367. They relied upon the Fenians, did they?—There was not sufficient notice; there was not much organisation in the liberties, and the result was that the Liberal party led off nearly all the voters in those rural districts.

5368. Who went with the Fenians?—The voters in the town; a great many of the highest Conservatives in the town voted for Mr. Pigott.

5369. Was Mr. Pigott a candidate?—Mr. Pigott, the editor of the "Irishman," was a candidate, and a great many of the Conservatives in the town voted for him and Mr. Tate, and then a great number of the humble Catholic electors voted for the same candidates.

5370. However, you disapprove of this system of influence that takes place at Limerick, whether by rioting or by the influence of property, I think you say?—Of course I disapprove very much of the influence by rioting and mobs generally in Limerick, and would be very glad to see it put down.

5371. You have never made the experiment of applying the law to prevent it, but you think that the ballot would be the best course to adopt?—I think that the law has been put in motion as far as practicable to prevent it, but it is not possible to guard the town sufficiently. It is at night very commonly that the rioting takes place, and the windows are broken and the whole mischief is done before the constabulary can reach the spot.

5372. Do you think that everybody would abstain from using influence if you had the ballot?—I do not see what the object would be, for it would not be known afterwards how the people voted.

5373. I suppose the priest knows how to influence the voter as well as the landlord, by addressing him, and all that would take place, would it not?—Of course it would.

5374. You would not put a stop to canvassing?—No, certainly not to canvassing.

5375. You would have people assemble, and you would have strong speeches made?—Yes, merely for the announcement of their opinions, to address the people and tell them what their principles were.

5376. From what you know of the city of Limerick, do you think that the result would be very different from what it is now, supposing they all voted freely?—I do not think that the result, in a political sense, would be different. I think that Members of Parliament of the same principles would be chosen then as they are now; but the town would be saved from the tumult and disorder that prevail at the elections.

5377. I think you infer that the result would be the same in one respect, at least so far as the Liberal candidates went, because the priest generally goes with the people, and he does not attempt to influence them against their own convictions?—That is my belief.

5378. And do you believe, being a Roman Catholic yourself, that he would not have success if he were to attempt to do so?—I think he would not, unless the landlord was of the same side. If the landlord pressed for the vote of a tenant, and in that parish the priest was on the same side, I think that then the tenant's vote would be perfectly certain on that side, whereas it might be doubtful otherwise. Some would go with the priest and others with the landlord.

5379. Have you known an instance of the priests using their influence and failing, supposing they were against what was the popular view at the time?—Yes; I know that in the city of Limerick at the last election a great many Catholic electors voted against the arguments and persuasions, and influence of the priests.

5380. What are the Fenians generally; are they Roman Catholic?—They are. Some of the voters that I have last mentioned were of that class that have Fenian sympathies.

5381. They avow their independence of the priesthood, do they not?—Yes, they do avow their independence of the priesthood.

5382. What is the franchise in Limerick; is it very low?—£. 4 rating. The Parliamentary qualification is only one-half of the qualification of voters for the town council, which appears to me to be a very great anomaly; at least that is a question which ought to be considered.

5383. Then the franchise is higher for the town council?—Yes, twice as high.

5384. Do the same proceedings take place at the election of municipal officers as take place at the election of Members of Parliament?—No; because there is no interest to any extent taken in the result of those municipal elections.

5385. Sir George Grey.] You spoke of rioting, drunkenness, and bribery prevailing extensively at the municipal elections?—I did with respect to 1865 only.

5386. Do you apply that to one election only?—Only to one election; I never knew rioting to prevail at all except in 1865.

5387. Mr. Villiers.] You say, I think, that the military are called in upon the occasion of those elections?—They are.

5388. Did they act upon the last occasion?—The

The military were called in, but they really had no occasion to act; because upon the polling day, for which they were called in, everything was as quiet in the city of Limerick as it is in this room; there was no obstruction to any one.

5389. But were the mobs pretty equal on both sides then?—No, they were not at that time; the mob, I may say, very much disappeared on one side.

5390. But that is the important moment when people go to give their votes; does the mob generally cease to act upon that occasion?—They do.

5391. Is everything settled by what they have done before?—It is; whatever intimidation prevails is always brought into operation upon the day before the polling day; the mob appear to know the law that there must be no obstruction upon the polling day.

5392. There is no obstruction of voters on the polling-day?—There is not; at the last election, which was as violent an election as ever I knew in Limerick on the polling day, things were as quiet as they now are.

5393. There is nothing that you know of that makes it improbable that this would recur again; supposing there was to be an election at Limerick, there would be just the same proceedings repeated as you have described to-day?—I think if there was an election in Limerick next week, and one candidate were surrounded with a mob, it would be a matter of necessity to have a mob on the other side; then, unfortunately, the mobs will come into collision, and, according as the election goes on, they will proceed to actual violence.

5394. That is the state of Limerick now, and are you of opinion that something should be done to prevent the recurrence of those scenes?—Yes, I wish there was something that could be done.

5395. Sir George Grey.] What do you think could be done?—I have already suggested that the only thing that I could hope to be a remedy would be the ballot.

5396. What would the effect of the ballot be upon those mobs; if I understand you rightly each party canvasses accompanied by mobs?—Yes.

5397. And you think that the influence of one mob, I suppose, is about as great as the influence of another?—Yes.

5398. But on the polling day everybody is free to go to the poll as he likes?—Yes.

5399. How would the ballot prevent a candidate being accompanied by a mob on his canvass?—The object of such a mob is to influence voters, and, of course, a voter knows that the way he votes will be afterwards known, and he would be subjected to popular indignation if he did not vote in a particular way.

5400. Is there any disturbance after the election is over, after the polling is closed?—No; I have not known anything like a disturbance after the election.

5401. Have any acts of violence been committed by those mobs, or by other persons, upon voters voting contrary to the wish of the mob?—No; not after the election.

5402. I understood you to say that those mobs on both sides were equally strong, therefore the voters must vote against the convictions of one or other of those mobs; do those mobs, or the individuals taking part in them, practice any actual violence upon voters after the election?—The mobs do not remain equally strong, because one of them usually has the mastery; that occurred at the last election, because before two days the mob on one side, the Fenian side, had entirely disappeared.

5403. I think Mr. Pigott, who you say, was extensively supported by the Conservatives, polled a very small number compared with the other candidates?—He polled a very small number compared with the other candidates, but he was a mere stalking horse for his colleague, who polled within 74 of the next candidate on the poll.

5404. Mr. Cross.] I do not understand what you mean in your answer to the right honourable Member; how could the ballot possibly prevent those mobs?—Because the candidates would feel that there was no use in having a mob to influence a man's vote when it would not be known how he would vote.

5405. Do you mean that a man standing for election would not try to influence, in any legitimate way, the voters, although he might not know how they voted?—Of course he would.

5406. And if he thought that a mob would influence people, he would be just as willing to use a mob whether he knew how the people voted afterwards or not?—That would apply to bribery also.

5407. Confining yourself to a mob, will you show me how the ballot could possibly affect a man's making use of a mob or not?—If a candidate knew that the way in which a man would vote would never become known, I do not see what good it would do him to try to influence the voters.

5408. But a man would try to influence voters in every legitimate way, would he not?—Yes, every legitimate way, but I do not call a mob a legitimate way.

5409. Do not you think he would also try to influence them in an illegitimate way?—I should hope not.

5410. Then it is the fact of their knowledge simply that makes it advisable or not to influence them?—I think in the view I take of it, it would have the effect of preventing perhaps bribery as well as intimidation, the one as well as the other.

5411. Do the priests ever take any active part in the elections in Limerick?—Yes, very active.

5412. Are they in the habit of commending men in their sermons and spiritual discourses openly in the churches?—I never heard it myself; it so happens that I do not attend mass at the parochial chapel. I attend one of the chapels of the regular order at Limerick, but I never heard that myself; I never heard a word spoken from the altar in Limerick about political matters.

5413. Mr. Raikes.] I think you stated that one of the main objects of having those mobs was to give a candidate a sort of prestige of popularity in the town?—Yes.

5414. And as the mobs do not parade the streets as you say on the polling day, I presume they come out in great force on the nomination day?—Great force indeed, and on the intervening day I am sorry to say it is the worst of all. There is generally a day intervening between the nomination and the polling, and that interval is intended to give the sheriff an opportunity of erecting booths and making all the necessary details of the machinery for holding the election.

5415. Is not it very often arranged that the nomination nomination day shall be on the Saturday, and the polling day on the Monday?—If he is a friendly sheriff.

Mr. J. Murphy.

5416. But it is, as a matter of fact, very frequently the case that Sunday is allowed to intervene between the nomination and the poll?—Where there is a friendly sheriff, it is; but where there is an unfriendly sheriff, he may hold the election upon the Saturday, to guard against that.

5417. A friendly sheriff to whom do you mean?—A friendly sheriff to the popular candidate, to the Liberal party.

5418. But Sunday, I suppose, is a good day for canvassing on behalf of the Liberals?—That, I suppose, is the reason; but there is a practice prevails that the Liberal candidates always go out upon the Sundays to meet the voters of the parishes in the rural districts, coming out from the chapels and addressing them there. It has always been thought that the Liberal candidates have the Sunday intervening for that reason, and for no other.

5419. There is a great deal of influence brought to bear on both Conservative and Liberal electors, on the Sunday?—In the way I tell you; I have gone out myself with the Member, in the rural districts, and we have met people outside the chapel congregated before mass and coming out from mass, and have spoken to them.

5420. Has the priest never addressed them on those occasions?—Yes, he has, outside the chapel; he generally introduces the candidate, and he makes a speech himself.

5421. Do not you think that a good deal of this rioting might be stopped if the polling day immediately followed the nomination day, as it does in England, and if there was not a day's interval given upon which mobs can be brought to bear upon the people?—Yes, I do; I think it would be very well if there was no nomination day at all. There was a tremendous tumult at the last election at Limerick; there was not a single person heard on the other side, either the candidates, or the mover, or the seconder; it was all dumb show.

5422. Then you think there would be much less rioting, and much less use of mobs?—I think there would, because they could not be used upon the nomination day for the purpose for which they are used.

5423. You think that really the use of those mobs is rather to create a popular idea that such a candidate is strong in the town, than to intimidate voters on the election day?—That is the original intention; but, according as the excitement grows, they come into collision, and from collision they proceed to violence, and they break windows, and very often they break heads.

5424. Mr. Graves.] Did both mobs disappear on the day of the polling, or did only one?—Upon the day of the nomination there were two mobs in the Court-house, and they both had sufficient power of lungs to prevent each other being heard, but the mob on one side disappeared certainly before the evening of the intervening day.

5425. Can you explain that?—Because the other mob was the popular side, and became more numerous, and the mobs of the Fenian side disappeared; they were afraid to come into the streets as such.

5426. Was that the reason of the great quietness on the day of the polling?—No; in any election that I have ever seen in Limerick the polling day has always been quiet; it appears to be understood there that the polling day is always quiet.

5427. Do you remember the previous election, when Mr. Spaight was a candidate?—Yes, that was in 1859, when he petitioned.

5428. I thought two years ago he stood for Limerick, and withdrew in consequence of the rioting upon the day of the polling?—He did not petition upon that occasion.

5429. But he withdrew, did he not?—No; he went to the poll, and was beaten by Mr. Russell by 174 majority.

5430. Was there not considerable rioting on the day of the polling at that election?—I do not think there was on the day of the polling, but there was the evening before very considerable rioting.

5431. I suppose that a personal canvass rather conduces to those mobs?—Most certainly.

5432. And it makes it almost a necessity that the candidates should go protected by those mobs?—Where a mob appears on the other side, it does, but at the last election that mob appearing upon the Monday, the day before the nomination day, there was no mob of any kind whatsoever on the side of the Liberal candidates; they went out half-a-dozen at a time to canvass.

5433. Supposing a personal canvass was dispensed with, would you consider that that would be one means towards the end of quieting the town?—I do, because I think that the original intention of having a mob going about with a canvassing party is to give prestige and popularity to the candidate.

5434. Would you see any objection if personal canvassing was made illegal?—I would see no objection at all to that, because people appear to me to thoroughly understand every man in his politics.

5435. Had you a sufficient number of polling places do you think at the last election?—Abundant; the polling is kept open till 5 o'clock, and in some of the booths there was nobody polled after 3 or 4 o'clock, and there is provision in the Act of Parliament for having an increased number of polling places if a candidate chooses to call for them.

5436. You mentioned that some cases of convictions had taken place for assaults, can you mention at all what the punishment was?—At the last assizes there were three or four persons convicted of a riot and assault, and there was a very heavy sentence, 12 months' imprisonment, and they are in gaol at the present time.

5437. That, I presume, would be for some exceptional rioting, and not the usual punishment for election assaults?—There was an assault proved in that case.

5438. Is it generally the custom after an election to proceed with those cases?—No, it is not, unless it be a very aggravated case. There appears to be a kind of amnesty proclaimed after the election on both sides, unless there is something very bad.

5439. Do you think that the law is sufficiently stringent as it now exists, with regard to the punishment of offenders at an election for assaults?—I think it is, for the judge of assize has the power of inflicting up to two years' imprisonment, if he likes.

5440. Do you think it desirable that the law should be put in force more frequently than it is?—Yes, if you could get anyone to do it;

it; but all parties appear to have a disinclination to keep alive the ill-feeling, and the matter is allowed to drop, unless it be a very aggravated case.

5441. I think you said that voters were carried off; did you mean that literally, or merely to express that the Liberal party gained them as voters?—When I said that the priest carried off the two votes I meant to convey the idea that he succeeded in getting the two votes.

5442. Is there any such thing as bottling practised at Limerick?—Not on the popular side; there is no occasion, but on the Conservative side, amongst the owners and agents of property in the rural districts, it has been a custom for them to bring the voters in over night, that is to say, the night before the polling, and to keep them in houses and stores in the city, and bring them out in batches the following day to vote, and the excuse given for that is, that it is to keep them from the mob.

5443. Are those places ever attacked at night by the mob?—Yes, they have been.

5444. Have you exclusive dealing at Limerick?—No.

5445. That is not known there?—It never came to my knowledge, and I should be very sorry to think that it ever did exist.

5446. In speaking of the ballot as a remedy, has it occurred to you that there might be a practical difficulty with those voters who could neither read nor write?—I have not gone into the difficulties of the ballot at all; I was asked what remedy I could suggest, and I really could suggest none; but if there could be a system of ballot devised which would be perfectly secret it would be an advantage.

5447. From your knowledge of the voters in Limerick and the Irish towns generally, would any large proportion of the voters be unable to read or write?—An excessively small proportion, indeed; the National School system has taken root in Ireland, and people, as a rule, can all write.

5448. And that is gradually extending?—Yes, it is gradually extending; I come across no one now scarcely who cannot write.

5449. Mr. Fawcett.] Have you many paid canvassers in Limerick?—No; there is no such thing known as a paid canvasser.

5450. Is there much treating?—Yes; treating of non-electors, but not of electors.

5451. Are there meetings and committee-rooms held in public-houses?—No; no meetings are held at public-houses; at least the candidate does not meet the electors at public-houses.

5452. Nor yet committee-rooms?—No.

5453. Do you think that holding committee-rooms in public-houses leads to treating?—Necessarily, I should say, both electors and non-electors, their meeting in public-houses would lead to treating.

5454. As you say the meetings are not held at public-houses, should you see any disadvantage in forbidding committee-rooms being held in public-houses?—I should say that committee-rooms ought not to be held in public-houses, and they never were in Limerick.

5455. Are they now held in Limerick?—No, not at public-houses; they never have been held in public-houses; the upper part of some respectable house is taken and used as a committee-room.

5456. You find that there is no practical difficulty at Limerick in conducting an election without using public-houses at all?—None in the world.

5457. Mr. James.] You say that you have no paid canvassers; are those mobs paid at all?—Yes, the mobs are paid; but I can hardly dignify them by the name of canvassers.

5458. The candidates of course pay the mobs?—They ultimately pay them, but they know nothing about them at the time of the election.

5459. For how many years has this practice prevailed of candidates ultimately paying those mobs?—At every election.

5460. What sort of payment do they get?—About 2 s. 6 d. a day; what I heard proved upon the last election.

5461. How many would be employed at the rate of 2 s. 6 d. a day; would it be hundreds?—Yes, hundreds certainly.

5462. Is it thought objectionable in a candidate to employ those persons to intimidate in this way at so much a day?—It is thought very objectionable to employ them, and the result is that he never does employ them.

5463. But he ratifies it afterwards?—Yes, he certainly does pay them afterwards, and he pays it as a debt of honour.

5464. Do you think that if it were made illegal to pay persons in that way, together with the adoption of the ballot as a remedy, that would deter the employment of those mobs?—I believe it is an illegal payment at present, it comes under the head of undue influence.

5465. But those are non-voters?—Yes, I spoke of non-voters; if the hiring of a mob resulted in sufficient intimidation at the election upon the polling day, and obstructing the poll, then the candidate would be held liable for it, if it was done with his sanction and knowledge.

5466. You have told us that there were no mobs on the polling day?—No; but there were the day before the polling day.

5467. Did those mobs threaten people and tell the voters that they must vote, or use any violence towards them?—Yes, they surround the house of a voter, and they called out to him that he must vote for So-and-so, and they generally wind up by breaking his windows.

5468. Is that done in the presence of the candidate?—No, it is not done in the presence of the candidate; it is generally done at night.

5469. Mr. Villiers.] I think you said that those mobs were paid; are they voters?—No, they are not voters.

5470. Is it known that they are not?—It is perfectly well known that they are not voters.

5471. Is that inquired into before they are hired?—It is.

5472. Mr. Whitbread.] You desire, do you not, to see public nomination done away with?—I would, because I think it would do away, to a great extent, with the necessity of having mobs.

5473. Have you ever considered what form of nomination you would have instead?—I think an address in the papers, and posted generally through the town, and the suburbs of the town, would be sufficient, because it is generally men of mark, and men of note, that come forward as candidates, and people know all those men perfectly well.

5474. You would no longer have a candidate proposed for election by one or more of the electors, you would have him address the constituency himself?—Yes.

J. Murphy.
7 May 1869.

5475. Up to how late a date before the actual election would you have this formal address to be issued?—Up to the very eve of the election.

5476. And any candidate might propose himself, at any moment, up to the very eve of the election?—Yes.

5477. And what would constitute an election, because you are aware now that the nomination, if there is no contest, is the election, practically?—Yes, I know that.

5479. Mr. William Henry Smith.] You have expressed an opinion, have you not, that if the ballot were adopted, all intimidation would cease?—I said that I hoped it would cease, and that I saw no other remedy to suggest.

5480. Is it not know before hand in Limerick, pretty well, how every man intends to vote; do not the committees of the various candidates know from information obtained beforehand how they intend to vote?—No; indeed, there is always a considerable number at the last moment who are undecided.

5481. Are they a large proportion?—Quite enough to turn an election at any time; I know that the last election was won by 74 votes; I was conducting agent on one side, and there were certainly over 74, or, perhaps, over 100 that I did not know how they would vote.

5482. Do you believe that if the ballot existed the way in which men voted would not be known?—I stated in my answer to the question, that I only suggested the ballot if a perfectly secret way could be devised.

5483. But if that secrecy depends entirely upon the voters themselves, do you not think that the voter himself would state to some person how he voted?—I do not know that; I will put a case; supposing he was one of the Liberal party in Limerick, and that he voted for a Conservative; I do not think he would ever tell.

5484. Do you not think it would ever come out?—Upon my word, I do not think he would be likely to tell, because I do not see what would be the object of his telling.

5485. It matters not what the object be, but it generally transpires, without reference to the poll-book, how a man had voted, does it not?—It does, because the voting is open, and he is heard in the booth declaring for whom he votes.

5486. Do you think that their lips would be sealed, because there would be no power of ascertaining how each had voted?—That would depend upon the man himself; if he chose to keep it secret he could do so.

5487. And you are of opinion that he would keep it secret?—I think, as a general rule, he would keep it secret.

5488. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] I understood you to say that the Fenian mob was not a hired mob at the last election?—There were two candidates, Mr. Tate and Mr. Pigott, Mr. Pigott being a mere stalking-horse of that side to catch the second votes, and also to introduce on that side whatever of the known Fenian element the town might possess. I think that the Fenian branch of the mob were not hired; but there were, independently of them, a number of men hired on Mr. Tate's side.

5489. Mr. Tate is a great employer of labour, is he not, and not a landlord, I believe?—A very great employer of labour, indeed.

5490. And he had been three or four times mayor, had he not?—He was three times mayor.

5491. I understand you to say that the priests do take an active part in canvassing?—They do, a very active part.

5492. Did the Roman Catholic bishop at the last election sit in different polling-booths on the very day of the election?—No.

5493. Are you sure that he did not?—I am certain that he did not.

5494. Were you in the polling-booths?—I visited every one of the polling-booths twice or thrice in the day with Mr. Russell, the candidate, and I do not think I saw the bishop at all that day.

5495. Do the parish priests take part in the municipal elections at all?—They do.

5496. Is it not generally the case that the candidates get their approval before they come before the constituency?—They think it very useful to have their approval and co-operation.

5497. Chairman.] In your opinion, in the Parliamentary elections in Limerick there is very little freedom of the electors in voting, and but a small number of voters are able to vote as they please?—Yes, that is so in the rural districts or suburbs.

5498. Are they not generally under some kind of influence from the one party or the other?—They are; the influence of landlords and the influence of priests are both set to work upon the people on the one side or the other.

5499. Is it not, generally speaking, like a struggle between landlord and priest as to which shall get the vote?—It is as regards the voters in the rural districts a perfect struggle between the two.

5500. And there is very little independence for the voter?—At present there is very little independence for the voter in the rural districts.

5501. And the best way which you conceive to remedy that is the ballot?—I know of no other remedy than that; because the same scenes would occur again on another election next week if there were one.

5502. You mentioned that the polling-day is generally very quiet, is not that in consequence of the presence of a large military force?—That is one reason for it; but there is another reason, namely, that the people appear to know that there must be no obstruction upon the polling-day, because if there be any obstruction it may invalidate the election of the very persons they are anxious for; they appear to know that, and there is never any obstruction upon the polling day in Limerick.

5503. But there is a sufficient force of military to preserve the peace, is there not?—Yes; sufficient to preserve the peace of the town, of course.

5504. When were the military force brought into the town?—Not till about two days before the elections, because down to that time there was no intimation of a contest; it was only about two days before the nomination-day that the contest test became known as inevitable, and, therefore, the resident magistrate, who takes charge upon those occasions, was not able to have military in sooner.

5505. Was there rioting in the town after the military arrived?—Yes, there was; it was upon the intervening day that the rioting really took place.

5506. There were soldiers present on the nomination day, but they were not called out?—No; there were no soldiers in the streets upon the nomination day.

5507. And they were not called out on the day of the polling, were they?—They were not called out, because it was considered that the constabulary were strong enough to keep the peace of the town.

5508. Sir George Grey.] Were they called out on the polling day?—No.

5509. But they were there?—They were in the town.

5510. Mr. Villiers.] The peace of the town was not preserved, was it?—It was not preserved upon the intervening day; between the nomination day and the polling day there was rioting.

5511. But the police and the military were both out?—I did not see the military out; the military were in the barracks, and they were ready to be called out.

5512. And they were called in when the riots were over?—They were ready to be called out; they went away out of the town as soon as the polling was over.

5513. Mr. Bright.] You were asked about the priests taking part in the elections, did the clergy of the Established Church take any interest in the last election?—They took an interest, but I did not see them take an active interest, because the present electors of the town are, for the most part, Roman Catholics, that is to say, the great majority are Catholics, and, of course, any active interference with them would have been of no value.

5514. Amongst the supporters of Sir Peter Tate and Mr. Pigott were there a great many Catholics?—There were not a great many Catholics; there were a couple of hundred Catholics, and those couple of hundred were all the Conservatives of the town, and they brought Sir Peter Tate up to very nearly the lowest on the poll on the Liberal side.

5515. Mr. Cross.] What was the difference between the lowest Liberal and the highest Conservative?—Seventy-four.

5516. Mr. Bright.] You stated that in the rural districts the contest was between the landlord and the priest generally in your city elections?—Yes, in the city elections, between one-third and one-fourth of the constituency are farmers in the rural districts.

5517. Is that less so in the county elections in your neigbourhood?—No; at a contest in the county it is the very same struggle between the two parties.

5518. And between them in that contest, what do the electors think of their political rights; is the time of a general election a pleasant one to them or otherwise?—It is a very unpleasant one to them when they think they ought to vote one way and their landlord presses them upon the other side; I have already expressed my opinion to the Committee, that if the voters were let alone by both sides, they would vote for the Liberal candidates.

5519. At any rate they would vote as they liked?—They would vote as they liked.

5521. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You think that priestly influence is much more powerful than the landlords?—It is in this way, that the feelings of the voters (I speak of Catholic voters) would be for voting on the same side that the priest asked them to vote on, and if neither landlord or priest interfered, the voters would vote that way.

5522. Are leases general in that part of the country, or are they tenants from year to year?—On the largest estate in the country, Lord Devon's, there are leases, and that has been the case for the last 20 years.

5523. Mr. Bright.] Are they leases that have been granted lately, or old leases of 20 years back; leases for lives?—No, they were granted lately by the present Lord Devon, a great number of them; nearly all the tenants have leases.

5524. For what length of time?—They are for a long time; I think, for 60 years.

5525. The O'Conor Don.] Are those agricultural leases?—Yes, they are agricultural leases.

5526. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Is there any fine at different periods?—No, fines are scarcely known upon leases, because for the most part they are tenants for life with leasing power, and in all marriage settlements or settlements of land the lease would be void if there was a fine.

5527. Sir George Grey.] Was there any contest in the county of Limerick at the last general election?—No.

5528. Was any thought of?—There was one rumoured, but no one that knew the county believed it.

5529. Is it the practice whenever a contested election for the city of Limerick is expected, to send for the troops and have them quartered in the town during the election?—It is the practice.

5530. Mr. Villiers.] Did Mr. Pigott put out any address?—Mr. Pigott put forward no address, but there was an address put forward for him by Mr. George Francis Train, and posted upon the walls of Limerick. There was a petition against the last election for the city of Limerick, and one of the grounds of the petition was the hiring of mobs; and upon the side that I was concerned for, that is the sitting Member, we produced this proclamation, as it were, of Mr. Train's, and it was assumed by the judge as affording sufficient grounds for some preparation being made against the people who would be excited by that proclamation.

5531. Was a petition presented, and was an inquiry entered into?—Yes, and the present Members were declared duly elected.

5532. Mr. Pigott was decidedly opposed to Mr. Russell, was he?—Yes, decidedly so.

5533. And decidedly in favour of Mr. Tate?—Yes, they were colleagues.

Mr. J. Murphy. 7 May 1869.

5534. But he did not put forward any peculiar views of his own?—No; but the politics of the "Irishman" are as well known in Limerick as anything can possibly be.

5535. He identified himself, did he, with the politics of that paper?—He is the proprietor of the paper.

5536. And Mr. Tate was his colleague?—Yes.

5537. Did they have common committee-rooms?—They had common committee-rooms and common agents of all kinds, conducting agents, and inspectors and poll clerks; the whole machinery was joint.

5538. Did they canvass together?—Mr. Pigott did not canvass Limerick at all, nor Mr. Tate; but their committees and their canvassing party canvassed for the two.

5539. Did they say, "Vote for Pigott and Tate"?—Yes.

5540. The O'Conor Don.] When you speak of this contest existing between the priests and the landlords in the rural districts, is it your opinion that those rural voters have no political convictions of their own, or that they have strong political convictions?—They appear to me to be as well versed in politics as it is possible for men to be. They read the penny papers that come into the town, and they have very strong convictions of their own.

5541. And the action which the priests take in the matter is to make them act up to those convictions?—Yes, that is my opinion.

5542. Sir George Grey.] Do you believe that the return both for the county of Limerick and for the city of Limerick, at the last general election, was in accordance with the real political opinion of the constituency?—Of the majority, most assuredly.

5543. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Did Sir Peter Tate issue an address?—No; he did not issue an address.

5544. You mean that addresses were put up for them by some one in Limerick?—They were, by their friends in Limerick.

5545. Neither of them was in the place?—Neither of them was in the place; the great complaint against Mr. Tate was that he did not put forward an address. If he had put forward an address, of course his principles would have been known; the people were not going to vote for an unknown man, a man who would not put forward any principles.

5546. The O'Conor Don.] Do you think that if there were no influence on the part of the landlords in those rural districts there would be any necessity for pressure, or that priestly action would interfere at all with those voters?—No; the Catholic voters in the liberties entertain very strong opinions, and they will vote for Liberal candidates of their own mere notion.

5547. Have you ever heard any complaint of a want of polling places in the city of Limerick?—No, there cannot be, because Limerick is divided into eight wards, and there must be a polling place for each ward; and, further, if any candidate wishes it, he can have another polling place for the same ward, but they were not applied for.

5548. Mr. Raikes.] One of your Members for the county is Mr. Synan, is he not?—Yes.

5549. He is, I believe, a near relation of the very eminent Roman Catholic clergyman, Dr. Synan, is he not?—He is his brother.

5550. Did Dr. Synan take any interest in the election last time?—There was no contest last time.

5551. I suppose it was very much owing to the great influence which Dr. Synan possessed that Mr. Synan's election was not opposed?—I cannot see that any one clergyman could have anything approaching to that amount of influence.

5552. But he is very much respected, is he not?—He is respected, of course.

Mr. Richard Raleigh, called in; and Examined.

Mr. R. Raleigh.

5553. The O'Conor Don.] I believe you are a Town Councillor of the Corporation of Limerick?—No, I am not.

5554. Did you not at one time belong to the corporation?—No.

5555. Have you taken considerable interest in the municipal elections?—Yes.

5556. Do you remember the municipal election of 1865?—Yes.

5557. Have you heard the evidence of Mr. Murphy with respect to the mob intimidation, with the rioting that was carried on at that election?—Yes.

5558. Do you agree with that evidence?—Yes.

5559. Are you aware that bribery was also carried on at that election?—I have heard that bribery was carried on to a great extent.

5560. Have you known that persons, who actually canvassed with one candidate on one day, voted the other way the next day?—I have known that to be the case.

5561. Do you think that that was attributable to the influence of bribery being brought to bear upon them?—No doubt about it.

5562. Were there many voters paid upon that occasion for remaining away and not voting?—In one ward it is generally known (I am not stating anything from my own knowledge, I am merely stating what parties generally believe to be the case) that there were somewhere about 20 voters who were paid for voting or remaining away.

5563. Upon the day of the election, at that municipal election, was not the city in the hands of a mob?—Yes.

5564. And a mob that was infuriated by drink?—Yes.

5565. There was a great deal of damage done, was there not, during that election in the way of injury to houses and windows?—Yes; a great number of houses were injured and windows broken.

5566. I believe your own house was injured?—It was.

5567. In Ireland, after such transactions as these, there is the power of getting compensation from the presentment sessions of the grand jury for the damage done, is there not;—Yes.

5568. And was there a very large amount levied for damage after that election?—Yes.

5569. You heard Mr. Murphy's evidence with respect to the Parliamentary elections in the city of of Limerick; do you agree, in a general way, with what he stated?—I do.

5570. Have you anything particular to add to the statements which he made with respect to those Parliamentary elections?—Nothing more than that I think it is the feeling of men in trade like myself that it would be well to put an end to mobs of every kind on both parties.

5571. Have you ever heard complaints made by voters of being coerced by their landlords to vote contrary to their convictions?—I have.

5572. And have they stated publicly that they have voted for fear of being turned out if they did not vote in a particular way?—Yes.

5573. Are you aware that those mobs which have been spoken of are hired at so much a day?—I have heard so.

5574. Have you anything more to add to Mr. Murphy's evidence?—Nothing more that I am aware of.

5575. Sir George Grey.] Do you agree with Mr. Murphy that that municipal election of 1865 was an exceptional one, and that, with that exception, the municipal elections have been all quiet and peaceable?—I do.

5576. What was the cause of that election being an exception to the ordinary character of municipal elections in Limerick?—There was one gentleman, I believe, a merchant in Limerick, and a member of the council (Mr. John M'Donnell, J.P.), who canvassed the council for mayor, and, I believe, had a majority of the votes of the council in his favour. However, there was some private or personal feeling against him, and a certain party prevailed upon Sir Peter Tate, then Mr. Tate, to come forward as one of the candidates for the city.

5577. Therefore, the peculiar circumstances of this election arose, not out of any religious or political feeling, but out of personal feeling?—By no means out of political feeling; the city was in a state of great commotion for two or three days.

5578. Chairman.] You say that you desire to get rid of the mobs on the one side and the other at the elections; do you think that the adoption of voting by ballot would have that effect?—I think it would; I know of no more effectual means of preventing the hiring of mobs than voting by ballot.

5579. Why do you think that the adoption of the ballot would get rid of the employment of mobs?—Because I think it would be then useless to hire mobs as the voter could exercise the franchise without the knowledge of any party.

5580. What in your opinion is the precise object with which mobs are employed?—To intimidate the voters.

5581. And how do they do that?—They go into the houses and canvass with the candidates, in the first instance not being violent, but if the poor voter refuses his vote they come afterwards and smash his windows at night.

5582. And they extort a promise from him, do they?—Yes, they extort a promise from him; they do this; they put the other voters in a state of terror in that locality.

5583. Do you think that the priests exercise very great influence?—I know that they exercise very great influence.

5584. Do you think that they would continue to exercise the same influence under the ballot?—I do not think they would. I know that their influence at all times would be the same; and their influence amounts only to this: that they come between the landlord and the voter. The principles of the voter and of the clergyman generally agree. I am speaking of Limerick and the liberties of Limerick. They generally agree in principle and in politics.

5585. Sir George Grey.] As regards the town of Limerick; when you speak of the priest coming between the landlord and the voter, you refer to what are called the liberties?—Yes; I am speaking of the liberties.

5586. Do the priests exercise much influence over the strictly urban voters?—I think that the electors in the city are independent, certainly the majority of them are independent of the priest and the landlord both.

5587. Mr. Villiers.] You are alluding to tradesmen, I suppose?—Yes.

5588. Are they independent of their customers?—Certainly not; at least some of them are not.

5589. There is an active canvass by the customers, is there not, in that city as in all others?—There is, as elsewhere.

5590. Do you know any instance in which a man has refused to be influenced by his customers?—I do.

5591. And where he lost their custom afterwards?—No.

5592. You had the misfortune to have your premises attacked, had you not?—Yes, they were attacked.

5593. Was that connected with the voting?—When I say they were attacked, there was merely one plate of glass broken; I know that the mob that was opposed to the side I was on were against attacking my place.

5594. One mob is with the voter, and another mob is against him; and one mob attacked your premises; was it with a view to influence your vote, or because you did not vote as they wished?—To influence my vote.

5595. That one pane of glass being broken, I presume, did not affect your vote?—No, certainly not.

5596. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Are there no complaints made to the magistrates when a person's house is taken forcible possession of in that way?—On that occasion in 1865 there were.

5597. Do you know out of what fund reparation is made?—Out of the municipal fund.

5598. Out of the borough rate, in fact?—Yes, out of the borough rate; I believe the amount of glass broken in that year came to 62 l.

5599. What was the total amount of compensation that was paid for this damage that was done in 1865?—I cannot tell that.

5600. Do you take an active part in the elections in Limerick?—I do as a citizen and elector.

5601. What is your business?—I am a merchant and a tobacco manufacturer.

5602. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] You say that the priests exercise considerable influence, you mean in canvassing, or do they use it in their chapels at all?—I am not aware from my own knowledge that they use it in their chapels.

5603. Has that never come to your knowledge?—No, not to my own knowledge.

5604. You are a Roman Catholic, are you not?—Yes, I am.

5605. Did you take an active part in the election last autumn?—Yes.

5606. On the part of the sitting Members?—Yes, on the part of the sitting Members.

Mr. R. Raleigh. 7 May 1869.

5607. Did the Roman Catholic clergy take an active part in that election?—Yes.

5608. Sir Peter Tate was a very popular person in Limerick, was he not?—At one time he was.

5609. He was three times mayor, I think?—Yes, he was three times mayor.

5610. Did he ever himself come forward as a candidate, or was he put forward?—He wrote a letter retiring from the representation of Limerick; he was asked by some of his friends to stand, and I saw the letter in which he declined to start for the representation of the city.

5611. Then he was put forward?—But I must tell you that he did something similar to that in 1865 for the mayoralty; a great majority of the citizens have no doubt that he played the same game at the last election as he did in 1865.

5612. In 1865, was it the mayoralty that was in question?—In 1865 he was put forward as mayor.

5613. Do you mean that he first declined the mayoralty, and then accepted it?—He first declined the mayoralty when he would have got it; there is no doubt about that, without opposition; but he was put forward by some of his friends, and it was then that the hiring of the mobs commenced, for the first time, I think, since the Municipal Act was put in force in Limerick in 1841.

5614. Do you know anything about the hiring of mobs at the last Parliamentary election in 1868?—Yes, 5615. There were two mobs, were there not?—Yes, I have seen men hired in the street by the Tate and Pigott parties.

5616. Will you just state to the Committee how that was done?—Some men who were leaders came forward and took the labouring men, and put down their names, and they were paid upon an understanding, so much a day.

5617. Mr. Villiers.] It was an agreement with the man that he was to be one of the mob?—His name was put down, and it was understood that he was to be paid for forming one of the mob.

5618. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Did you see in the mob afterwards any of those people?—I did not take notice of any particular man in the mob; but the thing is publicly known in the city of Limerick as plain as the daylight.

5619. Then mobs have generally been hired on both sides, have they?—I was not aware that there was a mob hired on the popular side.

5620. I thought that you agreed with Mr. Murphy on that subject, and I understood Mr. Murphy to say that there was?—I am not aware of the fact; I know that there was a very powerful mob for the popular side.

5621. There are a number of people it appears at Limerick who will be hired on one side or the other if they are paid for it, and will fight either on one side or the other?—Yes.

5622. Are those labouring men, or what kind of men are they?—I must say that the working classes in general in Limerick are as well-conducted men as they are in any country in the world.

5623. That is not the question I am asking you; there are a certain number of ill-conducted men, and I want to know of what class those men are that are thus hired?—They are generally idlers and drunkards.

5624. Do they get both money and drink?—Yes; they get both money and drink.

6625. Have you ever seen the Roman Catholic clergy interfere to prevent the formation of those mobs?—I have.

5626. On the last occasion did they do so?—Yes; on the last occasion they did so.

5627. What steps did they take to prevent the formation of the mobs?—I heard one gentleman address his congregation on the Sunday previous to the election, and as far as he could, he impressed on them the necessity of obeying the laws.

5628. Were there many of that class that are open to those temptations of money and drink, and to form part of a mob, present in the chapel?—I cannot tell you that.

5629. Do you think it likely?—I fear not.

5630. What I meant was this, have you ever seen any interference with the mobs themselves on the part of the clergy to quiet them or to get them to disperse?—No; I do not recollect any instance.

5631. Have there not been any public denunciations on the part of the police or the clergy against taking part in such mobs?—There have.

5632. When would those have been?—Before and after the election, speaking of the last election particularly.

5633. Was it done by placard, or in what way?—Not by placard, but by exhortation.

5634. In what places where the exhortations?—I have heard one in a chapel I was in; St. Michael's, Limerick.

5635. Have you ever seen any interference on the part of the clergy with those mobs when they were in action in the streets?—No.

5636. I presume that the clergymen of the Roman Catholic Church would be respected by those mobs?—I do not think that they would have much influence with a drunken and infuriated mob.

5637. Mr. Villiers.] Did you ever see any interference by the magistrates for the same purpose, urging the mobs not to meet and not to break the law?—I have seen some, but not at the last election.

5638. Have the respectable people in Limerick ever denounced that system of organised mobs at times of election?—Undoubtedly they have.

5639. But they have never taken any steps to prevent it?—In 1865, I think that a number of citizens waited upon the mayor, calling upon him for protection.

5640. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Was not the military brought out to protect the peaceable people from the mobs on both sides?—Yes.

5641. And that does not always succeed, I am afraid?—Not always.

5642. Was there any wrecking of houses at the last election?—I think not.

5643. Was there any destruction of property in Limerick on account of the riots and the mob at the last election in 1868?—I have not seen any, but I have heard of some.

5644. What sort of destruction of property?—Windows broken.

5645. Were the monuments of the town injured?—Yes, the glass of Sir Peter Tate's clock was broken.

5646. Mr. Whitbread.] Was there much injury done to persons by the mob at the last election?—During the election there was a man killed, I believe; but whether it was through the election riot or not I cannot tell.

5647. The O'Conor Don.] Was he killed by the the mob?—He was killed in the street. I do not know whether it was by the mob or not.

5648. Mr. Whitbread.] Were there any cases of violence which happened during that election brought to trial afterwards?—There were cases of assault brought to trial.

5649. Do the mobs ever visit the electors' houses, after they have voted, to wreck them?—I never knew of any such case.

5650. The violence is used in order to obtain the promise?—Yes.

5651. Not on account of the vote having been given?—I think so.

5652. Do you think that under the system of voting by ballot, the same system of intimidation would not be used in order to obtain a promise?—I think that the same system would not be used.

Mr. R. Raleigh. 7 May 1869.

5654. The O'Conor Don.] In the elections in Limerick the popular candidate has generally been successful, has he not?—Yes, always.

5655. Do you think it likely that if the popular candidates were defeated, the mob would not wreak their vengence on all persons whom they had threatened before, and who voted contrary to their threats?—I do not think they would.

5656. At all events at present the popular candidates being successful, there was no object in those mobs going about after the election and doing injury to persons who voted against them?—No.

5657. As soon as the election was gained the point for which the mob was organised was gained?—Yes; there was no mob during the polling, and that has been the case as long as I remember in Limerick; the polling day is a very quiet day.

Mr. Herbert Thomas, called in; and Examined.

5658. Chairman.] You live at Bristol, do you not?—I do.

5659. Have you had any experience of the late Parliamentary elections?—Yes.

5660. How in your opinion have they been conducted?—They have been conducted on the one side on strictly pure and legal principles.

5662. How was that communication made from your party to the other?—Orally.

5663. Do you know the person on the other side to whom the communication was made?—I believe I do.

5664. Do you know by whom it was made?—I do.

5665. Were the overtures on your part declined?—They were declined.

5666. Was the election then conducted purely on your side?—Entirely so.

5667. Were there no roughs hired?—None.

5668. Have you seen some evidence which was given here with regard to the Bristol election?—I have seen a report in the newspapers of some evidence which was given here on Friday last by a gentleman from Bristol, with regard to the elections in 1868, and in my opinion it is quite erroneous in many respects.

5669. In what particulars is it erroneous?—It is stated in the report which I have seen, that this Major Bush should say, that if at 9 o'clock on the morning of the day of the election our party were not 750 a head, a mob would be let loose; now that is entirely untrue; we had hired no mob, we had no mob at our command; we had a sufficient number of promises many days before the election to make it on our part, even supposing we had desired to hire a mob, most natural to desire that the election day should be quite peaceable, because we knew that if we polled within a very large number of our promises we should be secure of the return of our candidate.

Mr. H. Thomas.

5670. In point of fact, was there a mob or not on the Liberal side?—There was no mob. Major Bush was speaking in those answers of the last election.

5671. My question had reference to the election in April?—Your Lordship then asked me in what respect Major Bush was erroneous. His evidence went particularly to the election of November, and this which I am now speaking of relates to November.

5672. Before we leave the April election, I understand you to say that it was conducted with perfect purity?—Yes, entirely so on the part of the Liberals, but not so on the other side.

5673. Now we come to the election of November; will you proceed with your statement?—Your Lordship has asked me, with regard to Major Bush's evidence, respecting the election of November. I have stated, with regard to the promises that we had, that it was our interest to have peace on the polling-day even supposing we had been disposed, which was not at all the case, to have hired a mob. Major Bush next stated that the mob had prevented voters from polling; that also is erroneous. Hired roughs were planted at the principal booths by the Conservative party early on the day of the election. There had been a representation made to the mayor by artizans, accompanied by gentlemen of position, asking him to assure to them that he would take measures to protect the peace of the city on the election day, because it was within their knowledge that so great a number of roughs were being hired during the canvass, and more especially upon the nomination and the election day. Not getting such an assurance as they deemed conclusive, they, the artizans, banded themselves together in large bodies and went to the principal booths, and they were in sufficiently overpowering numbers to prevent any interference with the polling on the part of the roughs, and they did not interfere themselves. Towards the middle of the day a communication was sent from the Conservative committee to the sheriff, in consequence of some rioting that there was in certain parts of the city, asking him to stop the polling. Major Bush in his evidence mentions the fact with regard to the sheriff sending round to the polling booths. The sheriff did so by his deputy; he went from booth to booth, and his report was that there was nothing to prevent the polling at the booths. The order of the sheriff, therefore was, that there was no occasion to stop the polling, and that if anyone was prevented from polling, it was simply by his own unnecessary fears. I myself know also from information from various people, that there was no interference with the polling on the day of the election. Major Bush made another statement with regard to a prominent Liberal; that he invited the people to hold the booths on the day of the election, and that Mr. Morley was present at this meeting. Now it is a fact that on one evening at a ward meeting, Mr. Morley was to be present, but before he came to this meeting, the gentleman whom Major Bush referred to had spoken; he is a very respectable man, and he is a very peaceable man, and he said words pretty much to this effect; that he recommended the voters to poll early, and to hold the booths until they had all polled; by which I am sure he only meant that the voters should be early at the polling booths, and in such numbers that the friends of the Liberal candidates should go on polling and keep up the numbers. Nothing more than that was intended. Major Bush also made a statement with regard to tea meetings as a means of treating, and therefore inducing voters to vote for the Liberal candidates. That also is erroneous. There were three large tea meetings that were got up entirely by the working men class; they got them up, and they paid for the expenses of the teas entirely amongst themselves.

Mr. H. Thomas. 7 May 1869.

5674. Did you hear nothing of those mobs which were called flying columns?—Yes, I did hear a good deal of them.

5675. What were they?—Consequent upon the brutal conduct of many of the hired roughs, and consequent upon the bitter disappointment of the populace in the city at the election of April 1868 having been carried by bribery and treating and personation, and other influences of that kind, there was a very great spirit roused on the part of the populace; and on the morning of the election, a mob, which may be called a rabble, not composed of artizans, seemed to have been excited to break some windows, and having broken some windows at a committee-room they seemed to have gone on doing so, parading some of the principal streets of the city, and breaking windows where they saw blue colours in them. That mob, I should say decidedly, was not organised by any one; it certainly was not organised by, nor had the Liberal party anything to do with it, and very much do they deprecate and regret that anything of the kind should have occurred in the city. I may say that if it had been organised in any way, the probability is that it would have attacked the houses or property of prominent opponents, which they did not do; if a house having blue colours was not in the line of march, they did not appear to know that they might be even within a few yards, and such houses were not attacked.

5676. Do you know anything of a mob which was led by an old pensioner, which was referred to in that portion of Major Bush's evidence?—Yes; I am not certain whether there were one or two mobs of that character in the city; the one that I have just described would be either the one or one of exactly the same character. No one of the Liberal party had anything to do with it.

5677. Do you know whether any brutal assaults were committed by either of those mobs?—No brutal assaults came under my notice with regard to the mob.

5678. Can you say positively that they were not hired by the Liberal party?—Most explicitly within my own knowledge.

5679. But you believe that roughs were hired upon the other side?—I know it.

5681. Were the public-houses also thrown open by the other side?—In the April election they were in very large numbers; I should say very nearly 200 of them must have been open. On the last election I cannot speak to their having been thrown open.

5682. Have public-houses been used much on both sides at the last election for committee-rooms for the purposes of treating?—They have not been used for treating by the Liberal party on either occasion; not a single house has been thrown open; some few houses have been used by them as committee-rooms, where they could not obtain a room elsewhere, though they desired to obtain rooms in other houses free from public-houses.

5683. Has bribery prevailed to any great extent?—In the April election, to a very large extent.

5684. There was a petition after the April election, I believe?—There was.

5685. Was it easy to procure sufficient evidence of acts of bribery?—Yes, it was not very difficult, and we had a very great number more cases brought to our knowledge than we could make use of before the Committee.

5686. Had you evidence sufficient, or did you have a difficulty in getting satisfactory evidence to support the other cases?—There was no difficulty at all in getting abundance of evidence of bribery; there was some difficulty in getting evidence which established agency, but the bribery was so notorious and so general that there was no difficulty in getting to a knowledge of bribery in a number of cases.

5687. Then, although you contradict a great part of Major Bush's evidence, in your opinion the practices which he described have been frequent, but they have been on the Conservative instead of on the Liberal side?—That has been the case.

5688. You think that in the Bristol elections there there have been malpractices, which ought to be put a stop to?—Decidedly; the demoralisation of the people of the city, after the April election, was something sad to witness. In many instances within my knowledge it was such for days afterwards that it had undone a great deal of the benevolent efforts of a large number of individuals and societies.

5689. Do you think there is a desire on the part of the respectable inhabitants of both parties that those practices should be put a stop to?—By the desire of the Liberal party most certainly, and by a large proportion of the artizan class. I happen to know myself that they were disgusted by having such men as accompanied the Conservative candidate brought to meetings to which the artizans were invited; and on one occasion, in the neighbourhood of my own manufactory, at a large works, where a very large number of artizans are employed, the Conservative candidate had made an appointment to meet them outside the gates of their factory, and to address them. He came attended by his bodyguard of roughs, and when the men saw those people with him they would not hear him, but they made such a noise when he or his friends attempted to speak, that in a few minutes he was obliged to leave; they would have listened to him respectfully, whether they sympathised with him or not, if he had not been attended by such characters. In another instance within my own knowledge the Conservative candidate came to another factory, and asked admission to address the men, and he was told, "You may come in, sir, but I cannot allow those people who are with you to enter my factory." Therefore a large proportion of the working men would be glad to see the hiring of roughs put down in some way; and besides that they suffer very much often from it; if they attend the meetings of the Conservatives, and if they express any dissent, such as saying "No, no," or if allusions are made to statesmen or politics, and they do not agree with them, and express it, they are set upon at once by those roughs, and pushed violently out of the room, and in some cases very brutally treated in being beaten as well. Then, at the nominations those people attending in large numbers, and being infuriated with drink as well, entirely disturb the proceedings of the Liberal party, who do not hire such men, and they give a hearing only to those people for whose side they are hired.

5690. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Do you take an active part in political matters in Bristol?—I do.

5691. Do you hold any office in connection with the Liberal party?—I do not, except voluntary offices.

5692. Chairman.] Are you a member of the committee?—I am a member of the central committee, and I also was chairman at the last two elections of the committee for the Liberal candidates of the ward in which I reside.

5693. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Were you present at the time which you have just mentioned to the Committee when the Conservative candidate came to your factory?—He did not come to my factory; he came to a factory near mine.

5694. They were not your workmen who refused to listen to him?—No, they were not.

5695. Do you remember the election when Sir Morton Peto was returned?—I do.

5696. Did you take any active part in it?—I did; I was chairman then also of the committee of the ward in which I reside.

Mr. H. Thomas.

7 May 1869.

5697. Was there no bribery at that election?—None.

5698. Do you know what it cost Sir Morton Peto?—£.5,013, I think, were the figures for the election of the two candidates.

5699. Have you any reason to believe, or do you believe, that that was the real amount?—I have no knowledge of his having made any other payments.

5700. Is it your opinion that that was the real sum spent?—I should suppose that there was something more spent.

5701. Did you ever hear any sum stated as the probable sum that was spent?—Yes, I did.

5702. How much was it?—£.13,000; and I am not sure whether I have not heard even a more fabulous sum than that.

5703. Do you attach any belief to those reports?—None at all.

5704. I should like to get at what your opinion is of the cost of that election?—I have no means of knowing.

5706. Were they paid?—I cannot say; we knew nothing more of them.

5707. It was considered that that breakfasting was illegal, I suppose; and, therefore, the central committee declined to pay them?—It was not sanctioned, and it was not desired by the central committee, and that was the reason why they would have nothing to do with the matter.

5708. I understand you to say that at the last election the central committee declined to pay for the tea parties as well as the breakfasts?—The central committee were not asked to do so, and what I said was, that the tea parties had been got up by working men, and that they had been paid for by working men.

5709. The central committee, I suppose, were never applied to by them for payment?—They were not.

not in possession of their names, but I believe two parties from London (as the story is quite current in Bristol), who were at one time, if not at present, members of the Reform League, paid those parties a day or two after the election; that, I believe, can be proved by the Bristol police;" that was Major Bush's statement; you have said, I think, that you know of no such payment having been made?—I know that the central committee neither authorised nor made at any time, before or after the election, any payment for any people who were concerned in the mobs.

5711. But you see that Major Bush has rather stated that the payment was made, as it were, sub rosâ, without the direct knowledge of the central committee?—To my knowledge, this is what happened with regard to that matter. I cannot say which day it was; whether it was the day after the election or not, it was close upon the election, and this I myself did not hear of until sometime afterwards, but a request was made for payment for a certain number of people.

5713. When was that demand made by those people?—I have told you that I considered it was the day after the election, but I cannot tell you positively what day it was; it did not come to my knowledge for some time after.

5714. Who were those people who made the demand; where did they come from?—I am told that this payment was made at a certain public-house in the parish of St. James's; I presume, therefore, that they came from there, but I cannot tell.

5715. Then you have heard that the payment was made?—I heard a rumour, which Major Bush also heard, but I cannot myself say that they were paid.

5716. Do you remember what the name of the public-house was?—I think it was the "Coach and Horses."

5717. In a place called Broadmead?—No; I think it was in the Horsefair. It is not exactly in my knowledge where it was; I was not concerned in it.

5718. You do not know where those people came from who received payment in that house?—No, I know nothing of them.

5719. Did you see many people who did not belong to Bristol in the city on the day of the election?—I cannot say, for Bristol is a large place, and there are a great many Bristol people whom I do not know.

5720. Supposing men came in from the coal mines, you would know a collier pretty well by his dress and appearance?—Yes, but I did not see any of that description.

5721. Did you hear of any colliers being in Bristol that day?—No, I did not; I heard it said beforehand that it was probable that some colliers might come, but I did not hear of their being there, and I did not see them.

5722. What are the politics of the coal proprietors who are employers of those colliers that you heard might come?—They were Liberals; but whether they did come or not I cannot say, and if they came they came as volunteers.

5723. You stated that the sheriff sent the deputy sheriff round to see if there was any interference with the voter; what time was that?—From the information which I had it was somewhere about midday.

5724. Was there no rioting or intimidation, to your knowledge, after that time?—The chief rioting after that time was on the part of the Conservative roughs in Bedminster and in Redcliff.

5725. Was there no intimidation on the part of the Liberals after the time that the sheriff went round?—There was no intimidation to voters on the part of even those who called themselves Liberals to my knowledge at any time, not even from those who were called the flying column and the red roughs. I saw them pass the booths from my committee; they went at a sort of half-trot past the place, and they just stopped before the booths and made a cheer and passed on, and I did not hear of their doing anything else, unless they were opposing the other roughs, which they were not at my booth; with regard to those people who were called red roughs or the flying column, I saw many of them passing my booth, but they did not intimidate or annoy anyone as they passed, they merely stopped for an instant at the booths and gave a cheer and ran on.

5726. Which party did they cheer for?—I was not within hearing of the words, but I have no doubt they cheered for Berkeley and Morley.

5727. In fact they were the Liberal flying column?—I presume that such must have been so from the colours they wore, but they were not organised, and they were not paid.

5728. Do not you think that those men were the men that were paid at the "Coach and Horses"?—No, I do not; because this lot were chiefly youths and boys, just of all sizes.

5729. Had they any distinguishing mark, any ticket which would give a reason why they were called red roughs?—I cannot say, I dare say they had cards about their persons, as many of them as could get them.

5730. Do you know the chairman of the Conservative Operative Association, Mr. Kearsey?—I do not know him except by sight.

5731. Do you know whether he voted at the last election?—I believe not.

5732. Yet he has taken an active part in politics in Bristol?—Yes, extremely so.

5733. What was the reason of that man not voting?—I suppose he must have been too timid, but this is not a matter within my own knowledge; it is only a matter of hearsay. If you wish to hear the account which I myself have had of it, I will give it you; I heard it from a Conservative gentleman, who I believe was working in his ward.

5734. You

5735. Still he was afraid of going, I understand you to say?—He was afraid, but he had no reason to be afraid.

5736. That surely was a matter for him to judge of, was it not?—Yes, he was a timid man.

5737. Therefore a timid person might have been prevented from voting at the Bristol election?—It seems that this man was so exceedingly timid as to have been prevented from voting; but he was so without any reason, except his own fears.

5738. Did you hear of any other cases of people who were so timid besides that man?—Not one single one.

5739. What were the expenses of the two Liberal candidates at the last election at Bristol, as returned to the returning officer?—I have not got them with me; I forget whether they were about 4,000 l. or 5,000 l.; I cannot quite remember.

5740. I suppose that those were the expenses which were agreed to, and paid by the central committee?—Yes; all the expenses of the various committees were sent in to the central committee and paid by them, and everything that they could pay was put into the expenses as truthfully and as nearly as they could get them.

5741. Do you believe that that included everything that was paid at that election?—It is always difficult to get in every particular bill; but, as far as possible, every bill was put in as truthfully into the account as it would be between two merchants.

5742. Did that include the money which was paid at the "Coach and Horses"?—That money was not paid by the party; I know nothing of that money.

5743. Whom do you think the money was paid by?—That money was not included in the bill, if it was paid.

5744. Whom do you think that money was paid by?—I cannot tell you; we had nothing to do with it; the party greatly deprecated any such mobs being in any way even supposed to be connected with our interests; we do not want them at all.

5745. Did you hear what amount was paid at the "Coach and Horses"?—I cannot say; it is a matter which I am indifferent about.

5746. Did you hear what amount was paid?—No.

5747. Mr. Leatham.] You said that the sheriff investigated the truth of the statement of the polling being interfered with, and decided that it was not the case; can you tell me whether the sheriff was a Conservative or a Liberal?—A Conservative.

5748. Mr. Brand.] I understood you to say that public-houses were thrown open at the election in April; what do you mean by thrown open?—That which I knew was that we found that there were very nearly as many as 200 public-houses at which treating was practised during the election of April 1868, breakfast or beer being given.

5749. How long did this last?—The canvass was for, I think, about three weeks, but I cannot tell how long the beer may have been given at the houses before the election.

5750. After the election in November last, were there not some prosecutions?—Yes, a large number.

5751. How many?—There were several police charges on the day after the election, which, from the absence of professional men being engaged for them, did not appear to have a party complexion. Besides these, there were 17 summary convictions before the magistrates; two of them were Liberals, and 15 were Conservatives; and at the sessions the Liberal party obtained seven convictions; the Conservatives none.

5752. Mr. Bright.] From your account, the freedom and tranquility of the elections were very much interfered with, because there were crowds of roughs, whether the mobs were organised or not organised, on both sides?—The freedom of the voters was not interfered with, because the people took very good care of themselves, and would not permit it.

5753. The town was in a state of considerable tumult, was not it?—Yes, in November it was; in April it was not, and the Conservatives then made a great boast of it, that having a great number of roughs in April all was quiet; it was quiet because we did not have the same element, and the thing went in their favour in consequence of the bribery, and the treating, and the impersonation to a very great amount, which then took place.

5754. In your opinion, is there any belief amongst (I will take your own party) the Liberal party, that Parliament could apply any remedy to this state of things?—Yes, decidedly.

5755. What is the remedy which is generally looked to by your own party?—Our town council have adopted a memorial for doing away with the public nomination.

5756. Was that agreed to by a considerable majority or unanimously?—I think it was either by a large majority, or unanimously.

5757. Is the council composed of politicians of both parties?—Yes; there are about 39 Conservatives and 25 Liberals.

5758. And notwithstanding that majority of the Conservatives in the council, they passed a resolution petitioning Parliament to abolish nominations?—Yes, I believe so.

5759. Is there any other remedy that is generally suggested?—Vote by ballot is what the friends whom I represent have very earnestly desired as one means for securing, not only a peaceable election, but for securing the power of each man giving his vote according to his convictions.

5760. Do you think that in Bristol, speaking of the constituency as individuals, there are many individuals who suffer from unfair importunity, and pressure, and some of them even from worse proceedings, at an election; for instance, workmen from employers, and shopkeepers from customers?—I am not prepared to speak as to direct coercion to any large extent on the part of large employers of labour in our city; but I observe that in a large number of instances men who are employed vote very much according to the opinions of their employers, and I have observed within my own knowledge, and also have heard from various others of my friends, that a large number of tradesmen either vote contrary to their convictions, or do not vote at all, or vote most unwillingly, from the fear of the results to their business.

Mr. H. Thomas.

5761. Your answers have had reference to the views of the Liberal party; but seeing what has taken place at Bristol in successive elections, have you any reason to think that amongst the Conservative party there is a disposition to believe that the ballot would be very useful?—Quite the contrary, I think. I have not heard, amongst my friends who hold Conservative opinions, that they desire to have the ballot.

5763. They do not express any political opinion or take a part in the political contests of the city?—They express their sympathies as being with So-and-so, but they very earnestly endeavour to abstain from giving a voice to them.

5764. Chairman.] Is not that very often merely a civil excuse which is made to the canvasser?—I think myself that they fear to vote from the influence upon their business.

5765. Sir George Grey.] Does that operate upon persons of opposing political opinions; are Conservatives as well as Liberals afraid to vote in accordance with their opinions; does the fear of loss of custom operate equally?—No, it does not; because Conservatives, amongst the buyers, are by far the most numerous; and the chief customers of tradesmen are that class of people; in the lower classes they do not exercise that influence.

5766. You are speaking, then, of the higher class of tradesmen now?—Yes.

5767. But is not there an enormous custom which depends upon the working class in Bristol?—Yes; but I do not think they exercise that influence over one another which the higher classes do.

5768. Mr. Whitbread.] As to the nomination, you consider it desirable to do away with the nomination?—Yes.

5769. Have you any definite scheme in your head for the nomination to be conducted otherwise than at present?—I would suggest that the same machinery should be adopted; I do not say it should be exactly like, but it should be of the same character as in the municipal elections; for myself, I would desire to say that I would also close the public-houses on the day before and the day of the election, but that is an expression of my own individual opinion, not that of my friends.

Tuesday, 11*th May* 1869.

MEMBERS PRESENT:

THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. ALEXANDER RUSSEL, called in; and Examined.

Mr. A. Russel. 11 May 1869.

5770. Chairman.] YOU live at Edinburgh, do you not?—Yes.

5771. Will you have the goodness to state to the Committee what is your profession?—I am editor and part proprietor of the "Scotsman."

5772. Have you had any means of forming an opinion with reference to the municipal and Parliamentary elections in Scotland?—I have had a good deal to do with them, both editorially and personally for 30 years, during nearly 25 of which I have been connected with the "Scotsman."

5773. Have you formed any opinion as to the existence or non-existence of any corrupt practices with reference to those elections?—I think that corruption is almost entirely unknown in a pecuniary form, and certainly it is not on the increase.

5774. First we will refer to the municipal elections; I believe that the qualification for a municipal vote in Scotland has never been the same as in England?—No; the Parliamentary and municipal franchise, since the Parliamentary and Municipal Reform Acts of 1832 and 1835, were identical—that is to say, our municipal constituencies were ten pounders, just as the Parliamentary constituency were, the only difference being the boundaries in some places.

5775. Has corruption in any form, to your knowledge, ever existed in the municipal elections?—I never heard of a single case even being suspected in any borough.

5776. Have contests been frequent?—Yes, very frequent and very bitter.

5777. And have they turned upon political questions?—Yes, and ecclesiastical questions, in their local aspects chiefly.

5778. Has any kind of undue influence prevailed in the municipal elections?—There used to be in Edinburgh some 25 years ago, and the same remark applies to Parliamentary elections. I remember when a list of customers of a shopkeeper would be made out and shown in reference to the election, but that is now quite unknown; it is all gone since 15 years ago, and indeed I would say that the shopkeepers are rather masters of the situation now in the towns.

5779. With reference to Parliamentary borough elections, petitions on the score of bribery have been rare, have they not?—There has been only one case of unseating on the score of corruption, about a dozen years ago. I think there have been one or two charges made this election, but they have come to nothing. I do not think that from 1832 till now there has been a single case of corruption established on petition, except that one case.

5780. Have any other petitions been presented alleging bribery?—No, I cannot remember any one, except the case of Greenock last year, which was quite disproved.

5781. Has any petition been tried under the new Act?—Many petitions have been tried under the new Act, but only one that I can remember charging corruption; that was at Greenock; but the judge threw it out. It was some very small charge about whisky; that is the only one; it was tried by one of the superior judges under the new Act.

5782. Mr. Bright.] It is the only one in Scotland, is it not?—No, there have been several petitions, but not containing charges of corruption.

5783. Chairman.] Have you any reason to suppose that the new constituencies are as pure as the old ones?—I have no reason whatever yet to suppose that they are less pure than the former ones.

5784. You have spoken of direct bribery; do you think that in the Scotch boroughs indirect corruption prevails to any extent?—It is not quite so easy to speak of that; of course, a man is afraid of losing custom or employment, but it is generally his own idea I think, rather than any threat—in the boroughs.

5785. The elections in the city of Edinburgh, I presume are those with which you have been most closely connected?—I do not know very much more about them than the others, because I am often asked about others; there are plenty of people to work them in Edinburgh without me, but I know a good deal about them; I think, although they lately have gone against the way I wished

I wished them, that they are entirely free from anything like corruption.

5786. Have they, in your opinion, usually been decided entirely by the political opinions of the voters?—Yes, in the city of Edinburgh decidedly so.

5787. They have not been influenced by corruption, or by any other external influence?—Not of late years; of course importunity, and deception and things like that, may have been brought to bear, but not corruption, certainly.

5790. I understand you to say that you would not speak so positively of the total absence of intimidation?—Not so absolutely, and as to the counties, not at all.

5791. But in the boroughs, do you think that it exists?—There is a little, but it is getting very small now. I should say that one reason of that is, that, with scarcely an exception, there have been no contests between political parties in boroughs for nearly 20 years; the Conservative party have given it up.

5792. But there have been contests, have there not?—Not for 20 years.

5793. Not between political parties, but between individuals?—Certainly, between individuals.

5795. Do you think that intimidation is on the decrease, not only in larger but also in smaller boroughs?—Yes, I think decidedly so; especially by the upper classes in the boroughs.

5796. We have heard that in some English boroughs considerable intimidation is practised by the working classes upon each other, and upon the small tradesmen; do you think that anything of that sort takes place in Scotland?—I never knew or heard of a case in boroughs; and I am speaking all along of boroughs.

5797. Have you had any experience of elections in counties?—Yes, a good deal.

5799. What have you to say as to intimidation in counties?—There is a great deal of intimidation, in the milder form of influence or inducements by favours, and a great deal also by threats.

5801. Does that arise from the fact that they have most of them leases?—All the large farmers have leases; 19 years is the ordinary term.

5802. Then they are not liable to much pressure from their landlords?—Yes, they are, they have a number of reserved questions about repairs of buildings, and things of that kind during their lease; but as the lease approaches a close, they are open to a good deal of pressure.

5803. Do you know of your personal knowledge, many cases in which a large number of tenant farmers have voted in direct opposition to the wishes of their landlords?—Yes, a great many. In East Lothian, where there is scarcely a Whig landowner, I believe the majority of the large farmers voted against the Conservative candidate last time; even in Dumfriesshire, which is prehaps the most Conservative county in Scotland as to the ownership of the acres, the majority of them voted for the Liberal candidate, although he was a stranger from London. I cannot speak so positively as to Perthshire, that is a very difficult county to get facts from, it is so varied; but I believe that the majority of the tenant farmers there also voted for the Liberal candidate.

5804. Have you any knowledge of what has taken place, or is said to have taken place, in the counties of Dumfries and Roxburgh, at the last election?—I know from the people engaged in the management of the election coming a great deal about me, and telling me everything, almost from day to day, as to what was going on.

5805. Mr. Hunt.] Were you in Dumfriesshire at the time of the election?—No, I was not in Dumfriesshire at the time of the election.

5806. Or immediately afterwards?—No.

5807. Were you in Roxburghshire at the time of the election?—I was a little in Roxburgh; I was living just on the borders of it, but I may explain that people came to my office as a matter of business about it.

5808. You were not concerned in either of those elections?—I had not a vote.

5809. You did not take any active part in canvassing?—No, I never canvass anywhere.

5810. Sir George Grey.] Did you derive your information as to what took place at the elections in either of those counties, from personal communication with persons who were voters?—Yes, and from the agents and the candidates, some of whom came constantly about me, and also a great deal of my information is a matter of publicity, and has been stated in all sorts of speeches, and published in all manner of forms, and discussed for some time.

5811. Chairman.] Is it within your knowledge that statements have been published to the effect that pressure has been exercised by the landlords on their tenants in the county of Dumfries?—Yes; both general and specific charges have been published.

5812. Have they been published in the newspapers?—Yes; over and over again.

5813. Have they been contradicted by the landlords?—In Dumfries there was, I think, a contradiction in one case by a landlord, but in the Roxburgh case there was not any contradiction.

5814. Will you mention to the Committee any statements which have either been publicly made in the newspapers, or which have come to your knowledge by personal communication with the parties concerned in any case?—I will state a case in Roxburgh, without giving the names. A man who was on the point of getting a renewal of his lease voted in a certain way at the general election, and he stated to me that the factor came to him and said that the landlord had made up his mind not to give him the lease, and that he would never give another lease on his property to any man that would vote against his (the landlord's) party; and the tenant wrote to the landlord a letter, which I saw, and it was a very polite and rather submissive letter, saying that he had never been a politician, but that in his capacity of vice-chairman, I think it was, or a committeeman of the Agricultural Club, he had taken up certain questions, such as hypothec and game, and that he could not decently vote against what he had done in that capacity; and also that three of his family, who were all very eminent farmers, had voted as their landlords wished them. But the landlord never answered the letter, and refused the lease. I might mention that this man is one of the most eminent farmers in Scotland.

5815. Are there any other cases which have come under your personal notice which you wish to state to the Committee?—I do not, at the moment, remember any particular cases. I know the system generally to be very serious as the leases approach expiry in some districts; in some it is not so.

5816. But has it been frequently and generally asserted, and without contradiction, that great influence has been used by landlords upon their tenants?—It is very universally asserted and believed, and it cannot be said to be denied.

5817. The cases which you have mentioned have been those of tenants holding a considerable amount of land, have they not?—Yes; some of the Dumfriesshire cases were small, but it is a county held in very small farms compared with Roxburghshire.

5818. Have a new class of county voters been created by the late Reform Act?—Yes, a very considerable class. We had no 40*s.* freeholders, or indeed any freeholders at all, in Scotland before; so that under the Act of 1832 you needed to be a tenant to the amount of 50 l. to have a vote, or to be an owner to the amount of 10 l., instead of 2 l., as was the case in England; but this last Act brings the ownership to 5 l., and the occupancy to 14 l. Except in the Highlands, it has not brought in many purely agricultural voters, but it has brought in villagers and people in those small towns which are not Parliamentary boroughs.

5819. Are the new county voters, in your opinion, a more or less independent class than the old ones?—One can hardly speak generally upon that point, because counties differ so very much, according to the preponderance of the agricultural element. But taking an agricultural county, say East Lothian, which is entirely agricultural, I would say that, comparing the old 10 l. feuars, who are leaseholders for life, with the new ones, the new ones are not so independent—in the agricultural counties. In the East Lothian election we were quite disappointed. You must understand that they are quite independent as to the tenure of their houses; they cannot be put out; but their occupations are so small that they need a little bit of employment from the neighbouring landlord, and a little bit of land to help them on. The ten pounders were rather the shopkeepers, and they were not so dependent, but that is only in some counties. I would say that in Perthshire, where there is an infusion of the manufacturing element, and the villagers are not so dependent on the rural population, they are a very independent and a very intelligent class too; that is the case in all counties where the villages are mixed in their elements.

5820. Do you wish to see a change adopted in the mode of voting?—Yes, I should like to see the ballot introduced.

5821. Both in the municipal and the Parliamentary elections?—I never considered the matter as to the municipal elections, but it would be difficult to make a distinction, perhaps, seeing that the constituencies are identical. I think, for one thing, there would be less canvassing, especially in the counties; it is very irritating the canvassing, especially by ladies.

5822. Mr. Bright.] Do ladies canvass in Scotland?—That new class of voters that we have just been speaking of, small people in the unrepresented towns forming politically parts of counties, were most tremendously squeezed at the last election, especially by ladies, in places like Kelso, for instance. Those people had not votes at all before, and they are a little dependent on the wealthy families in the neighbourhood, and there was tremendous pressure brought to bear upon them. I know very painful cases of people losing their customers, and so on.

5823. Can you state anything with regard to that, of your own knowledge?—I can state nothing more positively than cases like this: a lady would come to a shopkeeper, and say that if he voted so-and-so the family would withdraw their custom; and he voted as he thought right, and the bill was asked for the next day, and the custom withdrawn. There were scores of cases of that sort.

5824. You think that you are not overstating the case in saying that there were scores of cases like that?—There were hundreds of cases like that; I was talking rather of one county when I said scores of cases.

5825. Mr. Fawcett.] Was it one town?—It was one county.

5827. Chairman.] But those cases to which you refer are not mere hearsay; you know them?—Yes, and they have been discussed, and mentioned in public, over and over again.

5828. You state that you are in favour of the ballot; I presume from the evidence which you have given that it is chiefly on account of what takes place in the Scotch counties that you desire to see the change?—Yes.

5829. But for the borough elections, you do not think that any change is necessary?—I think that they would be better of it too, and I cannot see any way of making the distinction.

5830. If no more improper practices prevailed in the counties than in the boroughs, you would not think that a change was required?—I would not think that it was of much practical importance; but I do not know what may happen with the new constituencies; there is a new class that have not been well tried yet, and the practice may come of employers coercing their workmen. We have not got that yet, but we have only had one election; we can hardly say that we have had a political contest in the boroughs.

5833. Have the Scotch elections generally been free from riot?—I do not think we have ever had anything that you could call a riot in the boroughs, but we have had in some counties very serious ones. There was a Committee of the House of Commons, which sat in 1837 and 1838, about those mobs, but the inquiry was only with reference to certain counties.

5835. Were the riots got up by the one side or the other, or were they spontaneous?—We have no Conservative mob in Scotland; the riots were all on one side.

5836. But do you think that the rioters were encouraged by the leaders of either party?—No; they knew the men, and they watched them coming in by the stage coaches in those days, the men from a distance who were strangers, and they set upon them and dragged them through the river, and all manner of things.

5837. Sir George Grey.] Are you now referring to the Roxburgh county election, which was investigated by a Committee of the House of Commons?—Yes; in 1837 and 1838.

5838. Has there been any revival of those scenes since?—Yes, there has been plenty of it.

5839. Does that system go on at the present time?—Yes; there is a little tendency to it yet in those counties, but the late Reform Act has rather swamped that class of voters; for instance, in Peebles and Dunse and those places which I mentioned, there are a great number of inhabitants enfranchised, and the feeling is greatly allayed.

or places where those voters existed; the feeling was altogether different.

5841. And there was no general irritation of feeling throughout that contest in Mid-Lothian?—No, there was not.

5842. Was the tranquillity preserved through the polling day?—Yes, entirely.

5843. Have you formed any opinion on the subject of public nominations?—I do not think that there would be a balance of advantage in their abolition. We have had no serious evils arising from them in Scotland; and I may also mention, that in some counties it is the only time that we can get a sight of the candidates. There were two very important counties in Scotland contested fiercely for four months, and one of the candidates, in each case, we never saw till the hustings, and of course it was all over by that time.

5844. Mr. Bright.] How do you account for that; did not they come into the county?—They were in the county, but they would not speak, nor let anybody speak to them.

5845. Did they rely a good deal upon the influence which you have spoken of to-day?—Entirely so, or on personal importunity a little; they went about from door to door to some extent.

5846. Chairman.] Is it possible generally at a nomination in Scotland for the candidates to be heard?—Generally speaking, they are heard on both sides pretty well.

5847. The riots are not common at the nominations?—Except where those fictitious voters are a prominent element.

5848. Sir George Grey.] Did those riots take place at the nomination or on the polling day?—Generally the polling day, because those voters are never seen in the county at the nomination, or on any other occasion except the polling. They just poll and go away again to London or to Edinburgh, or wherever they live. We thought that the late Act would put an end to them, but they are putting them on very fast again, because they can do it now with a smaller expenditure of money, owing to the reduction of the qualification.

5849. Chairman.] Do you think that you would lose more in Scotland than you would gain by doing away with public nominations?—I think so; it is perhaps a little bit of sentimentality, but I do not like the idea of proceeding on the hypothesis that people cannot meet together for an important political purpose without rioting or otherwise disgracing themselves. I do not like to think of an election as something shocking or offensive to view, like an execution.

5850. They have been frequently described by English witnesses as nothing but a farce, and a very mischievous farce; that is not your view of them?—Certainly not; the speeches in Scotland are generally heard very patiently; the show of hands used to be a good deal of a farce, but it is becoming less so, of course, as the suffrage is becoming extended. It is a pretty fair index now as to the result. Perhaps I should say that one cause of the want of disturbance at the hustings in Scotland is that you cannot hire a mob in Scotland; and, as I said before, the mob is all on one side.

5851. Where are the nominations of the city of Edinburgh held?—Near the Cross, just in the centre of the city, on the High-street, the people standing on the street.

5852. Is there a great attendance?—Yes, a great attendance.

5853. And perfect tranquillity?—There was perfect tranquillity this time; I have seen a little row; we have not had a contest for 20 years till this year.

5854. Can the speeches be heard?—Perfectly, according to the strength of the man's voice; that was the case with Lord Dalkeith this time.

5855. Mr. Fawcett.] That was the election for the county of Edinburgh?—Yes.

5856. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] You have had some bad mobs lately in Scotland, have you not, not in those counties to which you refer?—Yes, in Perthshire there were some; they were not very serious, but they were ugly; and there were some in Fifeshire, too.

5857. They have a very disagreeable habit in Scotland, which is almost confined to Scotland, and the mobs there, of spitting upon a person, have they not?—Yes, a very vile habit.

5858. That is almost confined to Scotland, is it not?—I do not know; I never saw an English county election, except in Northumberland; I did not see any spitting there.

5859. Had not some of those voters who came from a distance to wear mackintoshes?—I did not know that they took any precaution. I do not think they often spit on them; they took off their clothes, I think.

5860. The O'Conor Don.] Does that take place at the nomination or at the polling?—At the polling.

5861. Mr. Hunt.] Who is it that uses this habit; is it the mob?—Just the mob.

5862. The mob is all on one side, is it?—Yes, all on one side.

5863. And the Liberals are the spitters in Scotland?—A certain section of them.

5864. You are a member of the Liberal party, are you not?—Yes.

5865. And you wish to see the mode of voting changed?—Yes.

5866. Are you aware that your side has 53 out of 60 representatives for Scotland at the present time?—Yes; 52 since we lost Dumfriesshire the other day.

5867. You are not satisfied with a mode of voting which gives you 52 out of 60 representatives?—I want to give fair play to both sides. With regard to the effect, I do not think that the ballot would make any alteration in the general result.

5868. But mob intimidation, at all events, is all on one side?—Entirely so.

5869. I suppose people do dislike this practice of spitting, do they not?—I should think so; the persons spat upon do.

5870. Are there any other influences used at the Scotch elections besides landlord influence?—I said, I think, in answer to a question, that I think that in some of the manufacturing villages within counties, the population there will exercise a great deal of influence over shopkeepers and people who may be inclined to vote on the Conservative side.

5871. Is there much influence used by ministers of religion in Scotland?—Yes, a good deal; nothing like Ireland or even England; but there is a good deal.

5872. In what way is that used?—They do not canvass the people, but they harangue a little.

5873. Do they use their pulpits at election times in favour of particular candidates?—In favour of particular political views they do. I do not think that they would name a candidate. It is very slight, and on both sides, I may mention.

Mr. A. Russel. 11 May 1869.

5874. But that is done very extensively, is it not?—It was done, perhaps, more at the last election than at any previous election. I scarcely heard of it till the last election. I must say that I think the clergy of the Established Church were very shy of doing it last time; less than before, I think. I think it is right to mention that.

5875. Were the ministers of other persuasions shy of it also?—No, I think they were a little more active this time; that arose, I think, from the question before the electors being ecclesiastical, being the Irish Church, and, of course, all the Dissenters took a lively interest in it.

5876. They were against all establishments were they not?—Most of them.

5877. Was it the case that they took a very active part at the two Dumfriesshire elections?—Yes, they took a very active part.

5878. And was it the case that the landlord pressure was put on rather more strongly than usual to counteract the unusual activity of the ministers?—I am not aware of the motives of the landlords in doing it, but they did it before when there was no such influence exercised by the ministers.

5879. Was it the case that the landlords used a good deal more influence than usual at the last election for Dumfriesshire?—There had been no contest for Dumfriesshire for 80 years, therefore I cannot speak upon that.

5880. Mr. Bright.] During the last election do you consider that landlord influence was more generally used than in former general elections in Scotland?—No, I cannot say that it was as to one class of voters. However it might have been used, it was much less successful as to the higher class of tenant farmers at this general election than ever before. As to the new class of voters in some counties it was comparatively little, but in other counties it was much more severe.

5881. Mr. Hunt.] But it was the case that ministers other than those of the Established Church were excessively active at those two elections in Dumfriesshire?—Yes, and in Perthshire. There were no Whig proprietors, nor people to speak for the comparatively small people who supported the Liberal candidates there, and they, in a manner, thrust forward their clergy to make speeches, as they were not very good at it themselves.

5882. Are you aware that a great many voters had very great difficulty, in consequence of the pressure put upon them by their ministers, in voting in the way they usually had been in the habit of doing?—I never heard of a case of that sort. I do not think that in Scotland they are much afraid of ministers in that way. I mean there is no parallel between the position, say, of a Scotch Free Church minister and of an Irish priest; he has not the same sort of influence at all.

5883. Did they not use that kind of influence very much in Dumfriesshire?—Nothing, except in speaking; I do not think that the ministers even canvassed; and at any rate they have no spiritual terrors in Scotland.

5884. I understood you to say that you thought the great intelligence and the high state of education of the Scotch people was one of the chief reasons why they were not subject to bribery, or did not give way to bribery?—I said the comparatively greater spread.

5885. Do you think, if education spread in England, that it would have the effect of raising the voters above corrupting influences?—I would infer so.

5886. It would be thought a disgrace in a Scotch constituency for a voter to take a bribe?—Yes, it would decidedly; he would be looked upon as little better than a thief if he did.

5887. The people take a very great interest in politics, do they not?—Yes, a very keen interest.

5888. They even like to hear a political argument?—Yes; they are very fond of argument.

5889. And they would like to hear an argumentative speech upon politics even from a man that they disagreed with?—Yes, I think that, on the whole, they listen very patiently.

5890. Is not that one reason why, at nominations in Scotland, the unpopular candidate is listened to?—It is one reason.

5891. They like to hear a question argued out?—Yes, that is my opinion.

5892. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Did I correctly understand you to say that you had acted as election agent in any of those counties?—No.

5893. How is it that all those different tales about different elections came to you?—They came to my office as editor of the "Scotsman."

5894. A good deal of land is held or leased from year to year in Scotland, is there not?—No, almost none, except in the case of cottars in the Highlands.

5895. Is there not some in East Lothian?—No, not an acre that I know of; I never heard of it.

5896. Did not the elections this last year turn as much upon the subject of hypothec and the game laws as upon any other general question?—In some counties. For instance, I believe that which really carried the counties where there were villages, in which they did not care a straw about hypothec, was the Irish Church; but the farmers were operated upon by the questions of hypothec and game very largely.

5897. Had there been much demand for the ballot in Scotland at former elections?—Not for some years. It is certainly reviving now again; there had been a sort of lull; the Conservatives gave up contesting the boroughs, and the Liberals gave up some of the counties; there was a sort of truce; but in the towns, the middle classes, compared with 25 years ago, are so much more prosperous, and consequently so much more independent, that it is quite a different state of matters from what it was.

5898. Is trade so good throughout the whole of Scotland?—No, but the middle trading class are relatively in a stronger position every way than they were.

5899. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] I think you said that there was no borough in Scotland where there was any regular party contest at the last election?—We have had very few for 20 years I said.

5900. There was one at Glasgow, was there not?—Yes, under the minority system there was; there was one in Montrose, but it was a sort of farce; it was started up at the last moment.

5901. What was the feeling of the electors at that contest at Glasgow?—I was not at Glasgow, but there was a very large majority against the Conservative Conservative candidate in spite of the minority vote. I think he was about 9,000 behind.

5902. Was there any rioting or any mob intimidation?—I do not think there was the least in Glasgow. I never heard of it.

5903. It went off quietly, you think?—Quite quietly. There was a contest in the Montrose burghs which went off quietly, but it was a little ridiculous; it was not a real contest.

5904. Was it a sham contest?—There was a Conservative started at the 12th hour to draw off the people who were working for the Liberals in the county of Perth, and make them work in the burghs, but the candidate never had a chance.

5905. You speak of the independence or otherwise of the new county voters; how do you define an independent voter?—A man who votes as he thinks right.

5906. A man who holds political opinions, and acts upon them?—Yes.

5907. By independent voters, do you mean to infer those who voted against their landlords?—It might not necessarily be against their landlords; I mean those who voted as they thought right. Of course, if a man happens to vote against his landlord, you may infer that he is independent because he has run a risk.

5908. But you have spoken of several counties where, as a rule, the landlords were Conservative?—Yes; Dumfriesshire and East Lothian.

5909. It may not necessarily follow that because a man voted on the same side as his landlord he was influenced by his landlord, I suppose?—No, I did not say so; I know a number of Conservative farmers, and I also know a number of farmers who were always Conservatives, and now are Conservatives, but who lately voted for the Liberals, owing to those questions of hypothec and the game laws.

5910. Did the elections turn mainly upon those two questions?—Among the purely agricultural voters, they did.

5911. Apart from those questions, there are Conservative farmers in Scotland, are there not, as well as in England?—A great many, I should say; 20 years ago I would rather have polled the owners than the farmers; the majority of the farmers were decidedly Conservative.

5912. Has the feeling changed beyond those two points that you have spoken of?—Yes; as I mentioned before, there has been a change going on for 20 years; you could hardly call it political, but they have been getting off from the landlords somehow. They care less about them; the connection is more commercial now than it was.

5913. Is that because they have become more prosperous?—I think it is partly that; and there is a little pride of class in it. They thought that, as a class, they did not hold their proper position; and they are men of capital and education generally.

5914. Mr. Fawcett.] When you speak of the influence exerted by ministers of religion in Scotland, by the Presbyterian clergy, you refer, do you not, to legitimate influence; such influence as that which is exercised by influential Members of Parliament, by a popular speech in a debate?—Entirely so.

5915. But when you speak of the influence exercised by the landlords, you refer to illegitimate influence?—I mean constraint.

5916. Therefore, the one influence cannot in the least degree be set off against the other and different kind of influence?—I would say not.

5917. Are any elections in Scotland very expensive?—Yes, there have been some very expensive ones, and some very cheap ones.

5918. What is one of the chief items in the expense; is it paid canvassing?—No, I do not think it is; conveyance in the counties is a very expensive item.

5919. Is it customary in Scotland to have paid agents?—Yes.

5920. Have you ever thought that it would be well to place some restrictions upon the employment of paid agents?—I would rather have restrictions on canvassing than on paid agents.

5921. You would be in favour of restrictions on canvassing?—If it could be stopped, but I do not know how it could be; it is a tremendous evil for both sides.

5922. It is not at all usual to spend much upon treating in Scotland, is it?—No, it is quite unusual.

5923. And there is no increase of drunkenness either on the nomination or the polling day?—Not very frequently; perhaps there may be a little, in some counties; I do not think that there is any increase of drunkenness to speak of in Scotland on the election day, except what arises from men being necessarily more or less idle that day in order to go up and vote, and they are very apt to take whisky when they would not have taken it if they had been at their ordinary employments.

5926. And those fictitious voters have no interest whatever in the county?—None, whatever; I may mention, to illustrate the case, that among the people put on in Peebles the other day, were the four Messrs. Kidstons, brothers, from Glasgow; and nobody in Peebleshire ever heard of them, but they have each of them a 5 l. share in a house.

Mr. A. Russel.

5927. They were not natives of Peebleshire?—No.

5929. What is the feeling in Scotland as to the equalisation of the county and borough franchise?—There is a pretty strong feeling in favour of it, if you introduce residence into the counties, not otherwise; when they speak of equalisation in Scotland, they include the exacting of residence in counties as in boroughs.

5930. Mr. Whitbread.] With regard to those fictitious voters, is the practice of creating them resorted to by both sides?—It was begun by one side in 1833; then in two counties, I think, or at the utmost three, the other side retaliated for about three years, and then struck off those votes, and came to Parliament and asked for a Bill preventing their creation at all. A Committee of the House of Commons sat upon the subject, and there was a sort of breakdown; but the present Lord Stanley drew a report saying that that class of voters was justly obnoxious.

5931. Then, it is only resorted to upon one side now?—Only on one side.

5932. Is that the Liberal side?—No, the Conservative side.

5933. With regard to the change in the relations between the tenant-farmers and the landlords in Scotland, which you have referred to, in the last 20 years, do you attribute that in a great measure to the fact that when a lease terminates, the farm practically goes to the highest bidder, and there is not much consideration for the former tenant?—The practice is different on different estates; for instance, on the Duke of Buccleugh's estates, which are very large, there is a valuation made independently both of himself and the tenant, and the general practice of his Grace is to offer the farm to the tenant in occupation, if he chooses to pay the rent of the valuator; it is quite different in different places; Some of the owners in East Lothian are very good about it, they always give the tenant the first chance.

5934. Still, the practice prevails very largely in Scotland, does it not, of practically letting it go to the highest bidder?—Yes, and it is rather increasing; some farmers rather like it; they say, "Why should a pet farmer get that farm at a certain rent if I have capital to take it at a higher rent?"

5935. But that has tended, has it not, to foster that feeling, which you say is merely a commercial one between landlord and tenant in Scotland at the present time?—Yes, very considerably.

5936. With regard to the Roxburghshire case to which you have alluded, was there any difference between the tenant and the landlord, upon the matter of rent for the renewal of the lease?—None whatever; the conditions were all drawn up and agreed to, and everything was carried out but the formal completion of the deed, when the election unfortunately took place.

5937. There was no other ground for the refusal to renew, either rent or anything else?—Nothing whatever, everything was settled.

5938. Then, it was a determination on the part of the landlord to have nothing to do with the tenant at any price?—Yes; and he intimated that he would never let any more farms to people who would not vote as he wished them.

5940. Sir Frederick Heygate.] I think you stated that in your opinion the ballot would lessen canvassing?—Yes.

5941. Will you explain why you think so?—Because I think that people would not waste whole days hanging upon the voters, when they could not ascertain whether their importunities had succeeded or not; that is one cause.

5942. Would not that throw the whole power of obtaining votes into the hands of the press?—That never occurred to me. I am afraid not.

5943. You state that amongst the Scotch farmers, there is a good deal of social discontent?—Yes, there has been a sort of social discontent growing up for some years; I have called it discontent, but I should rather call it dissatisfaction; formerly they were very closely allied with their landlords, somehow, in feeling, and now they are not.

5944. Is it that they object to the preservation of game?—There is a good deal of that in some districts.

5945. Is it that they object to the preservation of game for their landlords, or for the preservation of game altogether?—They object to having their crops destroyed; I may mention that I do not go with some of their views on that question at all.

5946. But are there not large districts where the farmers preserve game, and are great game preservers?—I know of such cases, but it is not a system.

5947. Do the landlords and the farmers never agree in their politics?—They do sometimes.

5949. Supposing the ballot were in existence, would a Scotchman be likely to conceal his views in his ordinary daily life?—It would not be known how how he voted; the ballot would conceal it, of course.

5950. I ask you your opinion on Scotch voters generally; supposing a voter had the protection of the ballot, would he be likely to conceal his vote; would not it be a matter of notoriety which way he had voted, although he had the ballot?—No, it would not operate upon people who really are active or prominent in political matters, but it would upon the quiet people who take no other part but voting.

5951. You think that the ballot would have the effect of deceiving very much the landlords supposing a landlord to hold the opinions which you give him credit for?—A man would say that he would think about it: that would be the way he would put it.

5952. Would not it be perfectly well known to the landlord which way the tenant was likely to vote, and would vote?—No, I do not think it would; there are a great many farmers who never say a word on politics, and are never heard of in such matters, but at the poll.

5953. Mr. Leatham.] Have you been long in favour of the ballot?—I have always been in favour of the ballot, if you assume, as I suppose you must, that you want the real opinion of the voter, uninfluenced by anything but reasoning.

5954. Sir George Grey.] Is the system of licensing public-houses the same in Scotland as in England; are licenses granted by the magistrates?—They are got from the justices, and from the borough magistrates in boroughs, with appeals.

5955. Does that system exert any influence at all upon the elections?—It is beginning to have a little influence.

5956. In what way?—For instance, in one county there was a contest at the general election, and another shortly afterwards, from an accident, and people who had been refused their licenses before got them, and voted on the side which most of the justices were on at the next election; the whole thing was sent to me, but I refused to publish it.

5957. You mean that the expectation of obtaining a license, or the apprehension of losing it, influences a man's vote?—Yes, a good deal in counties where the justices are all on one side. It is a very loose system that we have in Scotland about licensing; it is all a lottery, and it goes by favour; I do not think generally the justices mean any harm, but they are earwigged out of Court; they are canvassed just as much as if they were going to vote in political matters.

5958. Mr. Bright.] When you said that you thought the ballot would diminish canvassing, did you mean that it would diminish or prevent application to any particular man, a voter, to ascertain how he votes, or that it would diminish that worrying importunity of which you have spoken?—It would diminish importunity.

5960. A member of the Committee asked you whether it would not lead to what he called deceiving the landlord on the part of the tenant; is it your opinion that it would effect any change in the relations of landlord and tenant, in respect of political influence, or alter their habits of thought and action?—No, I do not think it would. I think any change that would be effected would be for the better. I think the landlord would give up trying to importune and constrain, or give it up to a great extent.

5961. You mean that the knowledge that the landlord could not coerce would destroy the habit of coercion?—That is what I mean.

5962. And the knowledge on the part of the tenant that he was free would establish a freedom of action on his part?—Yes; I even think he would be more inclined to vote for his landlord. I know many cases where the tenant being careless would really have voted for his landlord if he had not been so much bothered and talked about. A man gets into an awkward position in Scotland when his vote is in doubt; the landlord or factor sets upon him and everybody gets his eyes upon him, and sees if he will behave well, and he gets very uncomfortable.

THE RIGHT HON. THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. JAMES H. McGOWAN, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. H. McGowan.
1 June 1869.

5965. Chairman.] WILL you state to the Committee your profession and residence?—I am a Solicitor in Dumfries, and Chamberlain of the burgh of Dumfries.

5966. Did you act as agent for one of the candidates in the recent contest or contests?—At the general election in November I acted as chief agent for one of the candidates for the Dumfries district of burghs, and at the recent election which took place in the county, in consequence of Sir Sydney Waterlow's disqualification, I acted as Sir Sydney's principal agent for the county. Not in his first contest; I was then engaged in the burghs, and was not engaged in the county.

5967. Have you reason to suppose from what you saw that any undue pressure was exercised upon the voters in the county?—Yes, I have reason to believe that a very great amount of undue influence was used on the part of the landlords and factors.

5968. Of what nature was the pressure which was exercised?—It was of two characters. In the first place every inducement was held out to the tenants either to vote for the Conservative candidate or not to vote at all, and failing those inducements taking effect, threats were used, such as threatening the loss of a man's farm, or of some benefit or privilege that he was receiving.

5969. Of what kind were the inducements which were held out?—Facilities in contravening the lease, for instance. There are some contraventions of leases that might be allowed or that might be passed over, such as being allowed to sell a crop off the farm, and things of that description.

5971. I was asking you more especially as to your knowledge of any inducements which were held out?—With reference to that I have a case, not only involving the element of inducement, but the element of intimidation also, and I will give it without mentioning names.

5972. Before going into any special case, you say you were engaged in collecting evidence?—I was engaged in collecting evidence, with the view of petitioning against the return of Major Walker.

5973. But no petition was presented?—There was no petition presented; and the grounds why no petition was presented were chiefly these: first, the difficulty of proving agency by the candidate or his authorised agents; and, secondly, the fact that we should have had to get the evidence from the mouths of most unwilling witnesses; witnesses who would have been seriously injured by the evidence which they would give.

5974. In your opinion there was no want of evidence which would have supported a petition?—I believe there was sufficient evidence to have supported a petition, if we could have proved agency.

5975. Will you now proceed to state the case to which you have alluded?—I will proceed to state a few illustrative cases. The first is the case of a farmer, a very keen Liberal, who voted for Sir Sydney Waterlow in November, and who sent in his written pledge to vote for him again in the event of another contest. This pledge was sent in in December. The lease of this party's farm expired at Whitsunday, in the month of May. The factor on the estate, one of the largest estates estates in the country, wrote to him in February, that he had been instructed by the landlord to arrange for letting the farm, and he fixed a particular time to meet him, to see what was to be done. It is usual on that estate, that when a lease expires, the factor values the farm, and lets the tenant have a renewal of the lease at the amount of the valuation. At the meeting, however, the factor declined to tell the tenant the amount of the valuation, but took in an offer from him, explaining that if he sent in a letter pledging himself not to vote against his landlord at the next election, he would get the farm at the valuation. The tenant wrote the letter required some weeks afterwards, after consideration; but immediately after that he received a note from the factor, appointing another meeting, as he said in his letter, on a matter of business. At that meeting the factor told him that his letter was not satisfactory; that he must not only promise not to vote against his proprietor at the next election, but at every election, as long as he was tenant of the farm. With very great reluctance the tenant wrote the letter in the terms requested. He did not vote at the election in March, and within 10 days of the election he received a letter from the factor, that his offer had been accepted, and that he was to have a renewal of his lease for 15 years. I may mention that I got this evidence from the farmer's own lips; and that I have in my possession at this moment in his own handwriting copies of the two pledges that the tenant farmer wrote, and also the originals of the letters that the factor wrote appointing the meetings, &c. That is one case. I believe that that was not the only case of the kind on the same estate, but I have no direct evidence of any others. I have heard the factor's conduct justified on the ground, that a landlord is entitled to choose his tenants, and to insist upon any terms he pleases. I will give another case. It was that of a farmer who, like the other one, voted Liberal in December, and sent in his written pledge to vote again in the same way in the case of another contest. He told me that he had got a letter from his factor, asking him, as a favour, to vote for the Tory candidate; and about the same time he was told indirectly that he would not be allowed in future to sell his rye-grass by auction, as it was a contravention of his lease, unless he voted Tory, and he did vote Tory, although he had voted Liberal in November, and although he assured me at the time that his principles had not changed.

5976. How did you become aware of those facts; was it from the tenant himself?—From the tenant himself, from a call that I made upon him; of course I felt myself entitled to call upon the man, seeing that he had voted for Sir Sydney Waterlow in November, and had sent in his written pledge to vote again, whereas he had come up to vote on the opposite side.

5977. With regard to those two cases, you could have proved them if there had been a petition; but should you have had a difficulty in proving that the factor was an agent of the candidates?—We should have had some difficulty in proving that; in fact, in the last case the factor occupied an official position, which precluded him by law from interfering in an election, and consequently he could never have been assumed to have been an agent of the candidate's. I have the case of another farmer who voted Liberal in November, and sent in his written pledge in December. He told me that his landlord had pressed him very much to vote Tory, and had reminded him that he had had a favour given him on his father's death by getting the lease transferred to his name; and he told me that he saw that his landlord would be much displeased if he voted against him, and to save trouble to the family he voted for the Tory, although he was a Liberal in principle. I had that also from the man's lips. There was another case on the very same estate of a farmer, who not only voted and pledged as the others had done, but added as a postscript to his pledge "P.S. A firm supporter of Sir Sydney's." After the first election, when he voted for Sir Sydney Waterlow, his landlord passed him on the road without taking any notice of him, and showed his displeasure in several other ways. On the second canvass the landlord became very urgent, and told the man he had voted once to please himself, and he must vote this time to please him. He had been in the habit of doing little odd jobs at the big house, and he told me he concluded that it would be better for him to sacrifice his principles and vote Tory, and he did so. Another farmer, when I made my appearance on his farm, showed signs of very great trepidation. He told me that he had a wife and a large family to support, and he was in very great dread of being examined in reference to any case of intimidation. He told me that he had been intimidated; but he would not give me the particulars. I pressed him very hard, but he would not give me the particulars. He said that he had been forced to vote against his wish; that he was a strong Liberal in principle, and if called upon he would state the facts on oath. I will give another case of a series of five or six farmers on the same estate that I visited in succession, one after the other; one of the largest estates in the county. They had all voted Liberal in November, and they told me how they had been treated by the factor. He had called and told one of them that he was contravening his lease, and if he did not vote with his landlord on the second occasion he would be turned out. To another farmer he said that voting against his landlord's wish was just spitting in his face. He told all those men that they were a beggarly lot, and if he was the landlord he would sweep them off the estate, and that they were kept there purely out of charity. Another farmer was from home when the factor called, but he saw his wife, and he told her that her husband had gone determinedly against his landlord's pleasure, and when she defended him he shook his fist at her, and said that he would be turned out of the farm at the end of the lease if he did not vote right the second time. Her next neighbour saw the pantomime going on, of shaking his fist, and he got so frightened that he ran into the house and hid himself in bed to avoid the factor. That is the case of six or seven farms all lying together, and all under one proprietor; and the farmers all voted Liberal in November. They had all of them leases of 10 or 12 years to run, and they were thus in a manner independent, and they voted Liberal again in March. I think it right to say that; but I mention it because the utmost pressure was brought to bear upon them. Everything was done to frighten them, but without effect, fortunately. I have other cases on another estate. A farmer going into the polling booth had to pass the factor who was standing at the door of the booth, and the factor said, "You have offended your landlord; you are a marked man; you have behaved bloody bad." The same factor, in the case of another farmer, to whom he had promised improvements on his farm, told him, after he had voted, "You will not get yon now." The same factor pointed with his finger, and hissed at one of the tenants as he was going in to vote for the Liberal candidate. The same factor wrote to another tenant who had abstained from voting in November, that he would not be satisfied with that, and that he would be both vexed and surprised if the tenant did not vote for the Conservative candidate at the new election. Those are a few illustrative cases; and to show the system that was carried out, I may mention that the factors, and the sons of some of the larger landed proprietors, stood in the immediate neighbourhood of the polling booth on the day of the election for the purpose of, as I considered, pure intimidation, and nothing else, of the farmers, as they came to the poll.

Mr. J. H. McGowan.

5978. Do you know any case in which a tenant actually suffered on account of the vote which he gave?—Yes; I will give two cases of that kind: I have the case of a man who had been tenant of a lime kiln for 32 years; he voted Liberal in November against his landlord's wish, and the kiln was let over his head to another tenant.

5979. Had he a lease, or was he a tenant-at-will?—I cannot positively say; but I think he had no lease, but was a tenant from year to year, and had been in possession for 32 years.

5981. Have you reason to believe that at the second election the impression prevailed extensively that the tenants would not be allowed to vote as they wished?—Quite so; every exertion was made to make them vote Tory, but failing that, to induce them to stay away, and many ardent Liberals left their homes the night before and did not appear on the polling-day. As I said before, 100 of those who voted in November did not vote in March, and of those one-half at least were prevented from voting by intimidation.

5982. Were the landlords almost entirely on one side in Dumfriesshire?—Almost entirely; I do not think that there were more than three or four exceptions, in estates of any size.

5984. Was any extensive influence used by customers upon tradesmen?—There was a good deal of that; I had cases reported to me, and cases within my own knowledge of accounts that were closed on the day after the first election by factors and landlords with parties who had voted the other way or who had abstained from voting. Accounts were closed that had been in existence for years.

5985. Was there any influence used by employers of labour upon the persons employed under them?—In the county there was not, because there are no employers there to any extent; but I have one case which is some illustration of that, and that was the case of a labourer employed upon an estate who was dismissed from his employment in consequence of his voting for the Liberal candidate.

5986. Except in the case of the influence used by landlords upon tenants, probably other kinds of influence were used pretty much by both sides, were they not?—I fancy that in shops in the smaller towns influence must have been used; I think that it is quite impossible but that some influence was used, but I do not consider that it was undue influence.

5988. Do you think that the election was turned by the influence used by the landlords?—Yes, decidedly, and by nothing else.

5989. Mr. James.] You have had some experience, have you not, in the elections for the Dumfries burghs?—I have; I was the principal agent for one of the candidates in those burghs at the general election in November last.

5990. About what is the number of the constituency in those burghs?—About 2,400.

5991. And how many burghs form the group?—There are five burghs (which are practically six in number, the burgh of Maxwelltown forming part of the Parliamentary burgh of Dumfries).

5992. First, as to treating, what has been your experience as to treating at elections in those burghs?—I had been engaged in several of the previous previous elections in the burghs, and at the election of 1865, I had charge of one of the wards in the interest of the sitting Member; my instructions on that occasion were to hold ward committee meetings nightly in one or other of the small public-houses in the ward, and I believe the other ward agents had the same instructions; the business of those meetings was purely formal and soon dispatched, when drink was ordered in and freely supplied to all comers even until after the legal hour; that was practised extensively for three or four different elections in Dumfries by both parties, and it was most disgusting.

5993. In the elections previous to 1865, had that system prevailed generally?—Treating prevailed extensively in the interest of both candidates.

5994. And was it openly done?—Quite openly done.

5995. At the election of 1868 was that system continued?—My instructions from my employer in the election of 1868 were these; I was to expend no money in treating, and I was to hold no committee meetings in public-houses, but I was rather to lose the election, and from first to last I acted upon that principle.

5996. Was there treating at all carried on in the burgh on the other side?—The other candidate gave the same instructions, I believe, to his agent with reference to treating, and consequently treating did not prevail to any extent, but I am sorry to say that his committees met in public-houses, and to a great extent I blame that for losing my election.

5998. You attribute it rather to the personal feeling of the candidate than to any fear of penal or prohibitory laws?—It was not from the fear of any prohibitory law; it was purely because there was a strong feeling in the burgh among the better class that the system should be put down.

5999. Do you suggest any remedy which, in your opinion, could be found for this treating?—The remedy is that there should be no committee meetings held in public-houses in burghs; I would make that statutory, and, in fact, I would even go the length of saying that it would be a great benefit if the public-houses were closed on the days of the nomination and the polling.

6000. Would the closing of public-houses on the day of the nomination and the poll meet with approval, do you think in the constituency generally?—I believe it would generally among all the respectable classes of the community.

6001. As to bribery, I believe you have no bribery, that you know of, in Dumfries?—There is no bribery either in the burghs or in the county.

6002. In the burghs, was there any intimidation, such as you have spoken of, in the county?—There was the usual slight intimidation in the burgh of Dumfries by customers upon tradesmen, but it did not prevail to a very great extent; but in one of the burghs, the burgh of Lochmaben, there was very great intimidation used. The burgh has a very small population, 1,194, and a constituency of 159. The property in and around Lochmaben was held almost entirely by one of the candidates and his immediate relatives, and I know that one of those relatives who was the principal proprietor canvassed his tenantry very keenly, and that the farmers on the estate exercised great influence upon the shopkeepers and work-people. Many of them told me that they dared not vote for the candidate whom they preferred, because they were afraid of the laird and the farmers.

6003. What was the majority against you?—The majority in that burgh was 79 against us. We had a majority in three out of the five burghs (or, counting Maxwelltown, in four out of six), and it was Lochmaben alone that lost us the election.

6004. Were the candidates of the same politics, or different politics?—They were both Liberals, and both advanced Liberals.

6005. There was very little difference in their politics I believe?—Very little difference indeed. The question arose chiefly upon the way in which the first candidate who came into the field was brought forward.

6006. In the election for the burghs, were paid agents extensively engaged?—Very extensively.

6009. Nine out of the 12 voted for the candidate of the Provost, through whose interest they had got the license?—Yes.

6010. Had the circumstances in relation to the number of other public-houses altered at all?—Not at all, the same condition of things existed.

6011. Did the magistrates give any reason in answer to their own reasoning in April, that there were too many public-houses in the town when they granted them in November?—No, they allowed a statement from one of their brother magistrates on the bench to be passed over. He said that he was surprised to see that the magisterial office had been prostituted for political purposes; he said that on the bench and there was nothing said in reply.

Mr. J. H. McGowan.

1 June 1869.

6012. How many magistrates were on the bench at the time that the licenses were granted?—There were four magistrates on the bench.

6013. I think you said that the Provost was an agent, and the two others were active canvassers?—Yes.

6014. I believe you had had no contest in the county of Dumfries for upwards of 60 years?—No.

6015. And the representation had been in the hands of one political party?—All in the hands of the Tories.

6016. There are four landowners, are there not, who hold a large proportion of the land of the county?—There are four proprietors, who hold one-third of the county.

6017. I believe upon the estates of those landowners there are a large number of voters?—Their tenantry form a large number of voters.

6018. What class in life are the factors that you have spoken of?—They are generally small landed proprietors in the county itself; and in consequence of the large size of the estates they are very handsomely paid.

6019. Do you find that in all instances the political opinions of the factors agree with those of their landlords?—Invariably.

6020. Taking the result of what you saw at the last county election, do you believe that the constituency fairly recorded its opinion?—No; they were prevented doing so entirely by the pressure which was brought to bear upon them by the landlords and the factors.

6021. After the election, was not a petition signed to the House of Commons in favour of taking votes by ballot?—There was a petition sent up from every parish in the county in favour of taking votes by ballot, signed in some cases by two-thirds of the population of the parish, and altogether in the aggregate by about 6,000.

6022. Was that petition signed by voters who entertained different political opinions?—I saw attached to the petition the names of parties who had voted against us, and who had not voted at all.

6023. Persons who had given votes for the Conservative candidates, and also those who had abstained from voting?—Yes.

6024. Were there many voters who did abstain from voting?—As I said, at the last election, there were 144 who abstained from voting.

6025. Those were 144 who had voted in November, but upon the register were there many who abstained?—The register was in a frightful state; the nominal number on the register was 2,900, but there were 150 dead men on the register, and there were 250 duplicate and triplicate, and up to six double entries.

6026. Was such influence brought to bear that many persons abstained from voting, on account of the influence that was brought to bear upon them?—Yes; there was influence brought to bear at the first election which was continued at the second.

6027. Do I rightly understand from you that the gross number of those who voted in March 1869 was less than the number who voted in November 1868, to the extent of 145?—No, there were more voted in 1869 than there did in 1868; I have an analysis before me here, which shows that there were 144 voted in 1868 who did not vote in 1869, and there were 186 who did not vote in 1868, but who voted in 1869.

6028. Then there were 42 more voted upon the gross poll in 1869?—Yes, quite so.

6029. The chief cause of the alteration in the result was the abstaining from voting in 1869 of those who voted in 1868?—Yes.

6030. Upwards of 100 voted one way who did not vote at all in the former election?—Yes, 108 exactly.

6031. Your nominations are generally quiet, are they not; you have no rioting and no disturbance?—There is no rioting at the nominations; I have never seen any such thing.

6032. Sir George Grey.] Was there any treating at the county election?—None, that I am aware of, on either side.

6033. Mr. Villiers.] What you have been telling us here to-day is perfectly notorious in the county and burgh, is it not?—The statements which I have made to-day are perfectly notorious.

6034. Have the practices you have described met with any reprobation on the part of anybody?—They have; the reprobation which they have met with has been shown by a petition in favour of the ballot and the statements made in that petition.

6035. I suppose that the landlords and all the people who support them entirely approve of the way in which they have exercised their influence?—They justified their interference by saying that any such interference would be justified to turn out a total stranger; an intruder in the county, as they called him.

6036. They did not consider that an improper influence of property?—I can only judge of the opinion of my own party.

6037. I am only asking you whether those people suffered at all in the estimation of the county, for having so used their influence to intimidate voters at that election?—Undoubtedly they suffered in public opinion.

6038. But the people of their own class thought it was a proper exercise, or a usual exercise of influence?—I believe there was a general feeling among all the landed proprietors in the county that the county should be represented by a county man, and that every exertion should be used to send the stranger back to London.

6039. And therefore they were justified in what they did?—They considered that they were justified.

6040. And we have reason to suppose, therefore, that they would do it again?—Most distinctly they would do it again.

6041. Was there any pressure put upon the voters by their own class or by any societies?—I am not aware of any influence that they could bring to bear.

6042. Do you mean that it was the result of their own deliberate convictions and opinions in favour of one of the candidates, that led them to act so entirely against their interest as they seem to have done?—It was their political conviction; they felt very strongly upon the subject of the Irish Church. The Dissenters are a very strong body body in the county, and from the circumstance of the persecutions in days of old, in our district in particular, the feeling was very strong on the Irish Church; and those men would have supported anybody, from whatever quarter, against a person who would support the Irish Church.

6043. Then it was a matter of conscience with them to support the candidate that they supported upon this occasion?—Yes, it was a matter of conscience with them.

6044. I suppose that their leases have not expired yet, and therefore you do not know the amount of sacrifice that they have made?—We do not know.

6045. Is it generally expected that at the termination of the lease the land will be let to others?—It is generally supposed that it will be so.

6046. With regard to that case of the lime-kiln, which election did that refer to?—The first election in November 1868.

6047. Do you know of any other case in which a man might have been turned out since the election who voted against his landlord?—I gave two illustrative cases of men who were actually turned out, and who had been in possession, the one for 32 and the other for 31 years; but those who have leases cannot tell whether they will be turned out until very close upon the termination of their lease.

6048. Was there any manifestation of feeling, or any expression of opinion upon this subject, by the people, when they heard of all this influence which had been used against the voters?—The people of the towns were very indignant.

6049. But you say that the clergy used a good deal of influence on both sides?—Yes, they did, a good deal of what I believe was quite a legitimate influence on both sides.

6050. Were the clergy using influence with the landlords on the same side?—The clergy would use influence with the landlords.

6051. But you say that they exercised influence on both sides?—Yes; the Established Church clergy used influence in support of the Conservative candidate, and the Dissenting clergy used their influence in support of the other; but I say that both classes of influence I consider were perfectly legitimate; they had no power, in fact, because the Scotch people will not recognise the power of a clergyman to dictate to them.

6052. You say that they preached and prayed for the cause in churches; does not that exercise some influence over the congregation?—I have no doubt that it would to some extent, but I should say that preaching and praying is quite a legitimate influence.

6053. Do you think it is a proper topic to introduce in a church or a chapel?—No, I do not think so, personally.

6054. Did any of the clergy preach or pray against this unjust influence?—Yes, I have heard of that.

6055. Was there ever any expression of feeling in favour of the ballot before the last election?—No; there was no general feeling in favour of the ballot before, because the county had never been contested; the county was in a perfect state of apathy until the knight from London woke them up.

6056. But the town of Dumfries had been contested before, had it not?—Yes, but still even in the town of Dumfries there was not much feeling about the ballot until after the county election.

6057. And you think that this feeling in favour of the ballot has really been brought about by this extraordinary exercise of influence by the proprietors?—To a very great extent; it has been intensified at least. Of course there have been many consistent supporters of the ballot for many years, but many have been converted and original opinions have been intensified.

6058. And have you more reliance upon the ballot in future than you have upon the proprietary being induced to withhold this influence in future?—I have no confidence in the proprietary.

6059. Have you no other scheme to recommend in order to prevent this intimidation?—I think that the ballot is insufficient in itself, unless something is done to put a stop to canvassing by factors, and lawyers, and bank agents, who get a fee in consideration of the influence that they bring to bear.

6060. That would extend to canvassing altogether, would it not?—I should like to see paid canvassing entirely done away with. It was entirely done away with on our side in the burghs. I never saw it done before, but it was done in our case.

6061. Do you mean that there was no canvassing on your side?—There was no paid canvassing.

6062. And you lost the election?—And we lost the election. The candidate made a personal canvass; that is to say he called upon every voter but that was the whole extent of the canvassing.

6063. Did the candidate canvass alone?—I accompanied him to introduce him to the voters.

6064. And you acted for him as agent?—I was acting as his chief agent; I made no calls myself. I merely accompanied him in his personal calls and introduced him to each of the voters.

6065. But the other candidate had persons going about in his service as agents canvassing, had he not?—He had a large number of paid agents going about.

6066. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You were a paid agent, were you not?—I was a paid agent, but I was paid as an agent; not as a canvasser. I was not a canvasser at all.

6067. You accompanied the candidate, did you not?—I accompanied the candidate in his calls.

6068. Mr. Cross.] You were paid and you canvassed?—I did not canvass. I was paid for my superintendence of a very large constituency. There were on the other side nine paid agents in the district in which I was the sole paid agent.

6069. Mr. Villiers.] Was your client a stranger to the place?—An entire stranger; he had never been in the town before and knew nobody.

6070. It was almost necessary therefore for somebody to accompany him?—Absolutely necessary.

6071. With the ballot and doing away with canvassing, do you think that the elections would be pure?—I think that if the ballot were introduced and canvassing were done away with, we should attain to almost absolute purity.

6072. How would a stranger make himself known

Mr. J. H. McGowan.

1 June 1869.

known supposing that he had not an agent, and that there was to be no canvassing?—By calling the constituency together and addressing them publicly.

6073. They have strong political opinions there, have they not?—Yes, very strong.

6074. And they would judge of a candidate from the appearance he made there?—They would judge of a candidate by his speaking.

6075. Would you increase the penalties for treating, or for any infraction of the law at present?—Penalties are a dead letter.

6076. Treating is illegal in Scotland, is it not?—It is illegal; but we should have still continued to practise it, unless we had been ordered to the contrary.

6077. Then you agree on both sides to break the law?—On both sides it was carried on, until the last general election.

6078. Mr. Hardy.] In how many cases did you discover intimidation?—I should say there were about 40 or 50.

6079. And you say you could not prove agency in any case?—No; we could not connect it with the candidate or his authorised agent.

6080. Was the petition presented, or was your investigation preliminary to presenting the petition?—The petition was drawn up and signed, and 2,000*l.* was contributed towards the expense; and the 1,000*l.* security was also ready to be lodged; but I was sent up to London to get the best advice upon the cases, and the result of that advice was, that it was not proceeded with.

6081. Then your investigation was preliminary to the presentation of the petition?—Certainly.

6082. And I suppose that your investigation was entirely confined to one side?—Entirely.

6084. Supposing that there had been a petition for a scrutiny, if you had 50 cases you might have claimed the seat?—We were not going to apply for a scrutiny.

6085. A scrutiny always involves recriminatory evidence, does not it?—In this case Sir Sydney Waterlow would not proceed on the petition himself; the petition was to be entirely at the instance of the committee, so that it could not have involved recriminatory evidence.

6086. If any of the electors had petitioned for the seat, recriminatory evidence would have been given, would it not?—I was not aware that electors could petition for a seat.

6087. Did you not take counsel's opinion in London?—We did.

6088. And they did not recommend any petition at all?—I am not prepared to give the nature of counsel's advice to me; but I say that, after discussing everything and taking the best advice that I could get, in virtue of the power reposed in me, I resolved not to petition; but I am not prepared to describe the nature of the advice which I got.

6089. Upon your own advice you did not think that there was a case, after getting counsel's opinion?—No; neither the counsel nor I was of opinion that there was no case.

6090. But there was not a case that you thought you could succeed upon, at all events?—It was thought that it would be wrong even to risk a defeat, in the very peculiar circumstances of the county itself.

6091. You have mentioned certain cases without giving any names, but I presume that the persons who are connected with Dumfriesshire will know perfectly well what cases you have been alluding to?—I do not think they will.

6092. But either the factors or the persons to whom you have referred, the farmers, will know?—I believe the guilty men will take it to themselves, they will know the cases that have been brought up.

6093. And they will also know who has given you the information?—Yes, they will.

6094. Then, in fact, the farmers, or whoever they are, who have given you the information, are in precisely the same position as witnesses as if they had come here to give evidence upon the petition?—No, they are not.

6095. They have given you information which enables you to make those charges against the factors?—I make no charge against the factors; I am here before a public committee and requested to give my evidence upon the question of intimidation, and I give it as far as I know it.

6096. All the evidence which implicates the factors is derived, is it not, from persons who have told you certain circumstances respecting them?—Yes, from the mouths of the men themselves.

6097. And you say that the factors would know what those cases are?—I think that the factors would have a difficulty in identifying the special cases, because I believe that for one case that I discovered, there were half-a-dozen that I did not discover, and that the factors would have a difficulty in identifying any single case, and it is that which I consider justified me in giving those cases without the names, because I think there is a chance that the poor men will not suffer.

6098. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] I think you said that there were about 100 persons who voted in 1868, but not in 1869?—There were 100 exactly.

6099. How many of those were dead or had left the county?—I should say not above half-a-dozen.

6100. Then, in fact, all but half-a-dozen were still on the register, and might have voted if they had chosen to do so?—Quite so; beyond that 100 people, all Liberals, there were 44 Conservatives who voted in November, but who did not vote in March, besides the 100.

6101. You have given two particular instances of tenants who have suffered by giving their votes; with regard to the tenant of the lime-kiln who voted against his landlord and was turned out, when the lime-kiln was re-let do you know what rent was given by the new tenant; was it a higher rent than before?—I believe there was no increase of rent given; I have here a letter from the tenant who was evicted with his own signature, in which he says, "I understand my late landlord gave out that he was to get 5*l.* per annum more rent, but I consider that carries a sham in its face, because if he had got a fraction more on the lordship over my offer, there would have been some consistency in the story;" the increased offer by the old tenant on the lordship, I think, was 1½*d.* a bushel.

6102. What was the original rent of the lime-kiln?—It was a lordship of so much per bushel.

6103. What was the raising of 5 l. a year equivalent to?—That was what the landlord gave out, that he got a rise of 5 l. a year. The equivalent size on the lordship would be infinitesimal.

6104. Was there any allegation that the original tenant had not paid his rent regularly?—None whatever; he was a highly respectable man and a highly responsible man.

6105. It is usual, is it not, in Scotland, at the termination of a lease, to put up the tenancy to the highest bidder?—Very unusual.

6106. Was this limekiln let on lease, or was it a yearly tenancy?—I believe he was a yearly tenant; I have never heard a lease mentioned in connection with the case, but I see that, in his statement, he does not state positively whether he had a lease or not; at all events he had been there for 32 years.

6107. In the other case which you mentioned of the old man who had held a cottage for 31 years, had he paid the rent regularly?—Yes, regularly; he was a most respectable man.

6108. There was no allegation that he had not paid up his rent?—None whatever.

6109. Was it let at an increased rent?—I am not aware what the increased rent would be; but I believe he had the place at a smaller rent than would be got from the man who succeeded him.

6110. Did the new tenant pay a higher rent than the old one?—I believe the new tenant paid a higher rent; but the old man had received a verbal promise of a lease during his lifetime. He told me that he had asked his landlord for it three years ago, and that his landlord had shaken him by the hand, and told him, "You may remain as long as you live."

6111. You have mentioned several cases where the factors had brought pressure to bear upon the tenants. I did not quite understand whether in those cases the tenants had voted against the factors, or whether they had been persuaded to vote with them?—Some of those cases were those of tenants who voted Liberal in November and who did not vote in March; and others were cases of those who voted Liberal in November and voted Tory in March.

6112. And were there any cases of those who continued to vote Liberal in spite of the pressure?—There were. There was the case of those six or seven farmers on the one estate, whose leases had 10 or 12 years to run.

6113. Were there any cases of yearly tenants who voted Liberal notwithstanding the pressure?—No; noneof those were cases of yearly tenants.

6114. Were any of the cases which you have mentioned cases of yearly tenants?—I think not.

6115. In fact, they all had leases?—They all had leases for a shorter or a longer period.

6116. And they were only anxious as to what would happen at the termination of their leases?—Quite so.

6117. You stated, did you not, that a petition in favour of the ballot was signed by 6,000 persons?—By 5,703.

6118. How many were county electors out of that number?—I cannot say positively. I was unwell at the time, and I did not make an analysis. Had I not been unwell at the time, I would have made an analysis of those who were electors and of those who were not.

6119. Are you aware whether any of those whom you have instanced as being pressed by the landlord or factor signed that petition?—Yes; I am aware of some of them.

6120. Were they Liberals or Conservatives?—Both.

6121. You have spoken of the influence exercised by ministers of religion on both sides; are you aware of any cases where the members of Dissenting congregations were found fault with for voting for the Conservative candidate?—I am not aware of any such; of course, I must frankly say that I did not investigate any such cases; my investigation was entirely directed to the other side; but I am not aware of any, nor do I believe that any such cases existed.

6122 Were there many paid agents on the Liberal side in the county election?—There were not. There were 15 agents on the Conservative side and five on the Liberal side, there being six districts of the county, having each a polling place.

6123. Has the expenditure of the two candidates been returned?—Yes; yesterday was the last day for making the return. I cannot say the amount of the Conservative expenses, but I can give you an index from the last election. The expenses of the Conservative agent at the last election were 2,000 l., and of the Liberal, 1,300 l.

6124. Was that the return to the returning officer?—Yes.

6125. Do you believe that that included the whole expense?—I believe in both cases it included the whole; we are in the habit of returning the whole expense.

6126. Did the Liberal candidate, at the last election in March 1869, make a return of his expenditure?—I made the return before I left home, and the amount was 1,245 l.; very nearly the same as at the former election.

6127. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Did I understand you to tell the Committee that in your opinion the difference of the result of the election upon the second occasion, was occasioned entirely by the undue influence of the landlords?—The difference was entirely caused by the undue influence of the landlords.

6128. You do not attribute it to any change of sentiment on the part of any of the electors?—Not at all. I have met with some cases: some men whom I went to said to me that they had had conversation with the factors, and that their views on the Irish Church had undergone a change; but, at the same time, they made statements to me which led me to understand that that was not the real cause.

6129. Did they say in what respect their opinions upon the Irish Church were changed?—No, they could not explain that.

6130. Had not the circumstance of Maynooth made any difference in their opinions?—None whatever; it had not then come up.

6131. The contents of the Irish Church Bill were known at the time of the second election, were they not?—Yes; but Sir Sydney Waterlow had pledged himself upon Mr. Aytoun's clause, so that both candidates were in the same position in that respect.

6132. Did you investigate any of those cases of the 100 men who voted in November and did not vote in March?—I investigated the greater part of them.

6133. By whom were you employed to investigate all those cases?—I was employed by the Liberal committee.

Mr. J. H. McGowan.

1 June 1869.

6134. Did I understand you to tell the honourable Member that you are a lawyer?—Yes, I am a lawyer.

6135. Do you mean to say that you never heard that any elector might present a petition against the return?—I know as a lawyer that he may do so.

6136. Did I understand you to say that you had not heard that an elector could petition for the seat?—That is what I said.

6137. How could you investigate the whole of those 100 cases; what time was occupied by you in doing it?—I had 10 days.

6138. Do you mean to tell the Committee that you went round and investigated every single one of those 100 cases?—No; I said that I investigated the larger part of the cases of intimidation in the 100.

6139. How were you able to tell which were intimidation and which were not out of those 100?—From information that I received.

6140. Was there any feeling on the part of the county at a perfect stranger coming in?—There was a great and universal feeling among the landlord portion of the constituency against any stranger coming.

6141. Did not that apply to any of the tenants as well as to the landlords?—I do not think that that feeling affected the tenants in the least.

6142. Mr. Cross.] You say that you found out between 40 and 50 cases of intimidation, although only two cases in which loss was suffered, which were the case of the lime-kiln and the old man?—Yes.

6143. One of the honourable Members asked you this question: How many of those 40 or 50 might have been turned out at once if the landlords had chosen to do so; but you did not answer that question?—I do not think there were any.

6144. How many might have been turned out if the landlords had chosen to do so?—I do not think there were any, because the leases were in existence.

6145. Do you mean to say that in all the other cases there were leases in existence?—I think there were.

6146. But you have investigated those cases carefully for the purpose of finding out undue influence on the part of the landlords; are you prepared to say that in every other case there was a lease?—I am not prepared to say that in every other case there was a lease, but I think there was.

6147. Do you mean to say that out of the 40 or 50, those were the only two cases in which there was not a lease?—No; I am not prepared to say that.

6148. In how many cases were there leases, and in how many not?—It was not a question that I put in every case whether there was a lease or not.

6149. In how many cases do you believe there were leases, and in how many cases do you believe there were not?—I believe they were nearly all cases of leases. I believe they were universally so.

6150. Excepting those two?—Excepting two.

6151. Do you mean to tell the Committee that those two were the only cases in which there were not leases?—I cannot say that; I can only state my belief. I did not ask the question.

6152. Do you mean to tell the Committee this: that you believe, having carefully investigated these cases, that those are the only two in which there were not leases?—My investigation was not as to whether there were leases or not.

6153. Are you prepared to say to the Committee that, in your belief, those are the only two cases in which there were not leases?—It is my belief certainly.

6154. You say that a great many bank agents and solicitors had received fees for the purpose of using their influence?—Yes, distinctly.

6155. How many do you think did so?—I know that, at the beginning of the contest, there were 12 lawyers who were sent retaining fees of five guineas each, and who were afterwards paid at the rate of 60, 80, and 100 guineas each.

6156. How many bank agents?—Those lawyers are generally bank agents; the country lawyers are generally bank agents.

6157. Do you mean to say that all of those 12 are also bank agents?—I believe the majority of them are.

6158. How many of them do you believe are bank agents?—I have made out a list of eight bank agents.

6159. Then the people that you speak of as bank agents were also lawyers?—Yes.

6160. Did those who were lawyers and those who were not lawyers all get exactly the same fee?—They were all lawyers.

6161. But did they all get exactly the same fee?—Not exactly; some of them got larger fees than others.

6162. I mean the lawyers who were also bank agents; did they get a larger fee than those who were simply lawyers?—I do not think that that entered largely in the question; they all got very much the same fee.

6163. They received the fees, practically, as lawyers, and they happened to be bank agents?—Yes, certainly; I do not mean to say that they were feed as bank agents, by no means; the banks would not have allowed it.

6164. You say that they got this money and did no work?—No, I do not say that they did no work; I only say that they did no work sufficient to justify so large an expenditure, and that they were paid for their influence more than for what they did.

6165. Did you ever make any inquiry from those factors, or from the landlords themselves, about those cases that you have spoken to us about to-day?—No.

6166. Have you ever asked for any explanation of the facts?—I have not.

6167. From none?—From none.

6168. You say that there were 44 people who voted on the Conservative side in November, and who did not vote on the Conservative side in March, and who did not vote at all?—Yes, that is so.

6169. Can you account for that fact in any way?—Yes, I account for it in this way. There were just about 44 of the 100 Liberals whom I could account for as having been kept away by legitimate causes.

6170. Then you believe that those 44 were kept away by legitimate causes?—Yes, I do.

6171. You do not believe that on the part of the Liberals there was the smallest attempt at intimidation with any of those 44?—I believe there was none at all.

6172. Perhaps you do not believe that there was the smallest attempt at intimidation on the Liberal Liberal side at all?—I believe that intimidation on the Liberal side did not exist, because we had no landlord influence.

6173. I am not speaking of landlord influence, but of any other influence?—I do not know of any other influence.

6174. But you said that there was influence used by customers on the tradesmen on both sides?—I believe that there must have been.

6175. In your opinion, if I gather rightly from what you have said, you do not believe that that was undue influence?—No, it was not.

6176. Therefore a customer may use any influence he likes with his tradesmen, according to your notion?—No, I do not think so. I would not justify it. I do not pretend to justify the influence of customers on their tradesmen, because I go upon this principle, that any person who stands in such a relation to another should not use it. I am not prepared to justify it. I only say that it exists.

6177. I want to know what you meant by saying that this influence used by customers upon tradesmen was not undue influence?—I do not think it was such undue influence as was used by the landlords.

6178. You have been connected with elections in Scotland for some time, have you not?—For 12 years I have been connected with contests in the burghs.

6179. I believe that in Scotland there is very little bribery as a rule?—Very little.

6180. In fact, you told us that in Dumfries there was none either in the county or the burghs?—Literally none.

6181. Can you account for the fact in any way why we should have bribery in England in our boroughs, and why we should not have bribery in Scotland?—I think that the Scotch are more highly educated.

6182. I suppose that, although there may not be Conservatives and Liberals, yet for some reason or other party feeling runs just as high in the Scotch elections as in the English elections?—Perhaps fully as high or higher at times.

6183. You believe that the only difference between England and Scotland consists in the state of education amongst the lower class of people?—Yes, and in the higher influence of religious feeling in Scotland.

6184. Mr. Bright.] You have given the case of two persons who specially were injured by the course which they took at the election; is the result of one or two or a small number of cases considerable upon the general body of tenantry without inflicting punishment upon a large number?—There is no doubt that the effect of every case of eviction in a district is very serious upon other people in the same position in the district.

6185. Do you think that its influence would be to cause a good deal of apprehension about the time of the election, and to affect the course which others might take who may not be themselves injured?—It has that tendency.

6186. Was the question of the ballot at all discussed at either of the elections?—It was not discussed.

6187. Did Sir Sydney Waterlow in the statement which he made to the constituency declare himself in favour of the ballot at either of the elections?—He declared himself on both occasions in favour of the ballot.

6188. Was his opponent in favour of the ballot?—I think he said no; I know that he was not; but whether the question was put I cannot remember.

6189. Has the result of the election been to increase the feeling in favour of the ballot in the county?—Very materially.

6190. Have you any means of knowing whether it has obtained any support from the tenants or the voters who voted for the Tory candidate?—Yes; I believe that the tenant farmers who voted for the Tory candidate would prefer the ballot.

6191. I want to know whether the result of what has taken place at the two elections has generally influenced the opinions of the electors of both parties, with reference to the question of the ballot?—I believe it has; it has intensified the convictions of those who wished for the ballot before, and it has converted many who did not believe in it on both sides; I do not call them parties; I call them the supporters of the two candidates.

6192. Is it your opinion then that the adoption of the ballot would be felt as a great relief to the constituency generally?—An immense relief.

6193. With regard to the landed proprietors, are any of them, do you think, in favour of the ballot; I presume you have some Liberal proprietors there?—We have two large Liberal proprietors; the Member for the burghs and his brother; and I believe that the Member for the burghs has not declared for the ballot as yet.

6194. Mr. Leatham.] You mentioned, did you not, that you thought that there were six cases of intimidation that did not come to your knowledge to every one that did?—I should say there were.

6195. Did you find any difficulty in getting evidence of intimidation?—I had very great difficulty in getting evidence.

6196. Was one reason why you abandoned the petition that you felt that your witnesses would be afraid to give evidence before the judge?—Yes; and not only so, but that they would tone the thing down before the judge.

6197. Had the fear of a recriminatory case anything to do with the withdrawal of the petition?—None whatever. We considered ourselves perfectly pure.

6198. Sir George Grey.] Are there many non-resident county voters in Dumfriesshire?—I believe there are a good number.

Mr. Thomas Harris, called in; and Examined.

6199. Mr. Leatham.] Where do you reside?—I reside at Lechryd, in the county of Cardiganshire.

6200. Are you connected with any business or profession?—No.

6201. You are a gentleman of independent means, are you not?—Yes.

6202. Have you a good general knowledge of the counties of Carmarthen and Pembroke?—Yes; a general knowledge.

6203. Have

Mr. T. Harris.

1 June 1869.

6203. Have you much more than a general knowledge of the county of Cardigan?—Yes, a very intimate knowledge of it.

6204. Have you taken an active interest in the politics of that county?—Yes; I have for about 18 years.

6205. Have you bestowed much attention to the registration?—I have.

6206. But not as a paid agent in any sense?—No; I did it on my own accord.

6207. Has that brought you into frequent contact with the electors?—Naturally so.

6208. At the last election there was a contest, was there not, in Cardiganshire?—Yes, there was.

6209. Are the great bulk of the people in that county Nonconformists?—Yes; 80 per cent. are at least.

6210. Are most of the Nonconformists Liberals?—Nearly all.

6211. Is the population an intelligent one?—Very.

6212. And are the great majority of the landowners Conservatives?—Nearly all Conservatives.

6213. Was there much coercion used at the last election by the landowners?—Very much indeed.

6214. In what way was it applied?—In every possible way that we can imagine; the shopkeepers having their custom withdrawn, officers removed from offices, and notices to quit to tenants, and congregations even turned out of the rooms in which they had been worshipping.

6215. Are you in a position to give any examples?—Yes.

6216. Will you first give examples, not of tenants receiving notices to quit, but other cases of coercion?—In some cases tradesmen have lost their customers.

6217. Has that been to any considerable extent?—To a very great extent. It is understood that Conservatives have coalesced together to withdraw their custom from every Liberal voter.

6218. And have those threats been carried into effect?—They have.

6219. Have any persons who had offices been dispossessed of them?—Yes; and they have had their salaries reduced.

6220. What kind of offices?—Assistant overseers, for instance.

6221. And you attribute that entirely to political causes?—Yes, altogether.

6222. Have any Dissenting congregations been turned out of the room in which they used to worship?—Yes, in two cases.

6223. Now will you turn your attention to notices to quit, which you say were sent to tenants; how many of those notices were served in the county of Cardigan?—It is understood that about 200 have been served.

6224. Have you had any special means of knowing that those notices have been served?—Yes; I have visited several parts of the county.

6225. Have you seen any of the notices?—Yes, I have seen many of them.

6226. Did not you make it your special business to ascertain those facts?—I did.

6227. You went all over the county, did you not, in order to make yourself personally conversant with the facts?—I went over nearly the whole of the county.

6228. Have those notices been served by nearly all the Conservative landlords?—By very nearly all.

6229. Is it generally supposed that they have acted in concert?—Yes, it is believed so.

6230. Were the notices served before the election or afterwards?—Afterwards; on the rent-day, the 25th of March; the election having taken place in November.

6231. How many of those notices were to tenant farmers?—I have found out about 30 or 35.

6232. Did those men all vote for the Liberal candidate?—They did, or they remained neutral.

6234. Mr. Bright.] Had he received any letter in the interval from the tenant in answer to the first?—No.

6236. Did the man vote?—Yes, against his landlord's wish, and he had notice to quit afterwards.

6237. Have you got the notice to quit with you?—Yes, I have a copy of it.

6238. Will you read it?—"To Mr. So-and-so. I hereby give you notice to quit and deliver up to me on the twenty-ninth day of September next, or whenever after your current year shall end, the possession of the messuage, farm, land, and premises, with the appurtenances, which you hold under me as tenant thereof, and which are partly situate in the parish of So-and-so, in the county of Cardigan, and partly in the parish of So-and-so in the same county."

6239. What is the date of that notice?—That is dated the 20th day of March 1869.

6239*. Was there any communication between the landlord and his tenant except those which you have read?—None whatever.

6240. How long had that man and his family been on that farm?—Nineteen years.

6241. Mr. Bright.] Did he hold the farm from year to year?—He did.

6243. Mr. Leatham.] Can you give the Committee another instance?—I have here a letter from the agent agent of a landlord to one of the tenants. It is dated Friday, without any date: "Sir, I am given to understand that you and Mr. [ ] has been soliciting votes for Mr. [ ] among the [ ] tenants," (naming the estate); what business have you to interfere with the tenants on the [ ] estate, and I trust you won't do so again, but mind your own business; if not, I will mind you before the 24th of next March. I am now desired to tell you from Mr. [ ]" (the landlord), "that he expects you to vote at the coming election for his cousin Mr. [ ], and if you refuse to do so you will have to leave, and all others that refuse to vote according to Mr. [ ] wish.—Sir, yours truly," &c.

6244. Did the man vote?—Yes, he voted against his landlord, and he received notice to quit.

6245. Have you got the notice?—No, I have not got the notice with me, but I have seen it.

6246. Had that man been long on the property?—Yes, he had been there six years.

6247. Mr. Cross.] When you talk about the landlord, was this a gentleman with a large property or was he a small holder of land?—The last was the agent of a very large estate.

6248. But the first was a clergyman with a small glebe?—He had two farms, and both the tenants voted against him and received notice to quit.

6249. Mr. Bright.] When you say that the tenants voted against him, was that in the case of the clergyman or the landlord?—Against the clergymen who happened to be the landlord in the first case.

6250. And they both received notice to quit?—Yes, they both received notice to quit.

6251. Mr. Leatham.] Was the notice in the second case sent by the same person who wrote the letter that you have read?—Yes.

6252. Do you know of any more cases?—Yes, others have had conversations with their landlords, and I have had one of them as an instance attested by the tenant. The landlord asked him this: "Will you give your vote to Mr. Vaughan?" The tenant answers, "I do not intend voting for anyone; I intend being neuter. I am a quiet man." Then the landlord replies, "Then if you want to be a quiet man all your life, so far as I am concerned, give me your vote?" The tenant answers, "I cannot, sir." Then the landlord says, "Then you prefer Mr. Evan Richards to me?" meaning the Liberal candidate. The tenant answers, "You don't state the case fairly; it is not you and Mr. Richards, but Mr. Vaughan and Mr. Richards." The landlord says, "Is it not I that have given you your vote?" The tenant replies, "Yes, sir; but if you did not, may be I might have had it from some one else." The landlord says, "Well, you will not give me your vote?" The tenant says, "I cannot, sir." The landlord says, "Then John, you will have no vote again as my tenant." Then it is attested as follows: "I testify that the above is a correct statement of the conversation which took place between Mr. So-and-so and myself concerning my vote." Then follows the tenant's name.

6253. Mr. Leatham.] Did that man receive a notice?—Yes.

6254. Mr. Bright.] Did he remain neuter?—No, he voted against his landlord's wishes.

6255. He had told the landlord that he intended to remain neutral, and then he voted against his?—Yes, he came out at last and voted.

6256. Mr. Leatham.] Have you any more cases?—Yes, a great many.

6257. Do you know any cases of people who had been a long time on the property?—In one case the family had been 400 years on the estate, and that man has received a notice; and in another case they have been 200 years on the estate.

6258. Chairman.] Was it in those cases distinctly explained to the tenant that the notice to quit was in consequence of the vote which he had given?—Yes; and in the case of the tenant whose family had been on the estate 200 years, he applied to the agent for a farm after receiving the notice to quit, and the agent said, "No, inasmuch as you did not think it your duty to vote with your landlord, you must go to your friends for a farm."

6259. Mr. Leatham.] Do you remember any case where a man received notice to quit who had spent a large sum of money in improving the farm?—Yes, I have known several instances where they have laid out from 300*l.* to 400*l.* in improving the farms, and they have had no means of recovering it.

6260. The farms are not large, are they, in Wales?—Very small; the majority are about from 40 to 50 acres, I should say.

6261. Sir George Grey.] Have they no leases as a rule?—No leases as a rule.

6262. Mr. Leatham.] Is there anything like tenant right in Wales?—Nothing; it is very much wanted there.

6263. Sir George Grey.] Are there very frequent changes of tenants irrespective of elections?—No; in the county there has been no election for many years.

6264. But do the tenants often change their farms; that is to say, do the landlords frequently give notice to their tenants without reference to the elections?—No, except in cases where they had good reasons for so doing, but, as a rule, they prefer to keep the old tenants on.

6265. Mr. Leatham.] Are those merely illustrations of what takes place in that county?—Yes; I have many more which I might give.

6266. Are there any particular cases which you would like to mention?—I can give an instance where a man went to the expense of building all the farm buildings upon the farm, not excepting even the dwelling-house; the old dwelling-house he has as a lumber room now; and he has also had notice to quit, though he built it all at his own expense.

6267. In none of those instances, I suppose, is there any doubt as to the reason why the tenant received notice?—Not the least doubt; it is a matter of notoriety.

6268. Mr. Bright.] Are those cases which you have given us under two landlords?—No, they are under several. The case of 400 years that I mentioned, is under one landlord, and the 200 years is under another, and the clergyman is another case, and the person who built the dwellings is another case also.

6269. Mr. Leatham.] Are there any other cases of special importance which you remember?—Yes; there is the tenant of another landlord who laid out even last year for manure for one field 30*l.* and embanked a river, and he has had notice to quit, although he and his father had been on the estate for 30 years. Another case is that of another landlord, where the farm was forced, as we may say, upon the tenant to accept it at

Mr. T. Harris.
1 June 1869.

10*l.* a-year, but through his own improvements it is now worth 40*l.* a-year, which he has now to pay for it. At first it was only 10*l.* a-year, when he was induced to take it, and he has received notice to quit.

6270. Altogether are there 30 of those cases of tenant-farmers receiving notice to quit for political reasons?—Yes, fully 30.

6271. Mr. Bright.] With regard to those 30 cases, have you inquired into them all?—Yes, I know them personally.

6272. Have you either seen the notices, or have you had the exact statements from the tenants themselves?—Yes; in most cases I have seen the notices.

6273. Mr. Cross.] Have you ever spoken to the landlord or the agent in any of those cases, and asked for any explanation?—No.

6274. You have never attempted to do so?—Never.

6275. Mr. Leatham.] In fact, it is so notorious, is it not, in the neighbourhood, that you did not think that worth while?—It is understood that such is the case, and even tenants that have received notices are not allowed to see their landlords on the subject.

6276. Do you know any cases of cottagers that have received notice?—Yes, I have known cottagers receive notices, because some relatives of theirs supported the Liberal cause.

6277. Mr. Bright.] Have you had a contest before in Cardiganshire?—Yes, we had a contest in 1865; but that was between two Liberals; and in 1859 between two Conservatives.

6278. And was there after those elections any general notice like this?—No, the party was split up.

6279. Mr. Leatham.] Do you know of any tenants who voted for the Conservatives, and who received notices to quit?—Yes; because the landlord told them that he was troubled with them at the last election, because they would not vote as he wished them without being very much troubled.

6280. Was he a Liberal landlord?—No, a Tory; they were Liberals that voted Tory.

6281. He assigned that as a reason for giving them notice?—Yes; in fact, one of them wept before him when he brought him on to the poll to record his vote.

6282. Are nearly all the farmers in Wales tenants-at-will?—Nearly all.

6283. Have they any means of receiving compensation for improvements?—None whatever, as a rule; there may be exceptions. I have here a specimen of an agreement, which gives the tenant the benefit of improvements done during the last 12 months of his tenancy.

6284. It has been stated before this Committee that Dissenting ministers took a very active share in canvassing at the last election; was that so?—They did.

6285. Do you think that they used any undue influence?—No, I am not aware that they could do so.

6286. Mr. Bright.] They exercised no influence of property, I presume?—None whatever; they were much in the same circumstances as the other electors.

6287. Mr. Leatham.] Was there not a special reason why they should not use undue influence?—Yes; in the first place there was no necessity for undue influence, because they were all on the one side; in the second place, of course, they are themselves dependent upon their churches for their support; and in the next place, there is not a church in which, in some cases, the most influential members were not themselves obliged to vote against their own wishes.

6288. Mr. Cross.] Do you mean that a minister could not use undue influence?—I do not know that he has any power.

6289. Mr. Bright.] Did I understand you, in the last answer but one, to say that many influential members of the Dissenting churches were forced to vote contrary to their convictions by the fear of what might happen to them?—Yes; they were respectable tenant farmers.

6290. Mr. Leatham.] By influential members you mean persons who have influence in the congregation or in canvassing the borough?—Yes; or owing to their position as tenant farmers.

6291. It has been stated before this Committee that members of Dissenting churches have been expelled from their membership on account of their votes; is there any truth whatever in that?—No truth whatever; it cannot be done; the discipline does not rest with the minister, but with the church.

6292. Are there many estates in the county which have changed hands from Liberal owners to Conservative owners?—Several.

6293. Has that produced any change in the votes of the tenants?—It has completely changed the politics of the tenants.

6294. You mentioned an instance of a clergyman of the Established Church taking an active part in the election; was it customary, as a rule, for clergymen of the Established Church to take an active part at the last election?—Yes, a very active part.

6295. Did they canvass?—Yes, they did all that they could.

6296. Did they refer to political subjects in the pulpit?—I cannot say; I never attended their churches.

6297. Mr. Brand.] Can you say how many notices to quit are generally given in ordinary years in the county of Cardigan?—No, I cannot with any accuracy; they may average from 20 to 30 perhaps.

6298. Can you say how many have been given since the last general election?—I have found out about 100 myself, but it is understood that there have been about 200 given.

6299. The information which you have given to the Committee applies specially to the county of Cardigan, does it not?—Yes.

6300. Can you give us any information with regard to other parts of Wales?—Yes, in the county of Carmarthen the same system has been carried on.

6301. Can you mention any particular cases?—I have made inquiries myself as to voters in Carmarthenshire, bordering upon Cardiganshire.

6302. Have any tenants-at-will or tenants with leases had notice to quit?—Yes, tenants-at-will have.

6303. Can you specify any particular cases without naming the parties?—Yes; I have here a letter written by a landlord in reply to a requisition sent him by his tenants to be allowed liberty to vote as they thought proper, and it is dated the 20th November 1868.

6304. Mr. Bright.] Was that the date of the requisition of the tenants or the date of the answer?—That was the date of the answer.

6305. Do you know how many persons signed the requisition?—There were seven tenants, six of whom signed the memorial, and one happened to be absent at the time.

6306. And all tenants of one landlord, I presume?—Yes, all of one landlord.

6307. Mr. Leatham.] Will you read the reply of the landlord?—It runs thus: "I received a memorial yesterday by post with the names of my tenants in Carmarthenshire attached to it; yours being the first on the list I shall address my reply to you, and request you will make known its contents to those hereafter named; I cannot allow it to pass without remarking upon it, and first of all, I must express my surprise at your making any difficulty in complying with my request, conveyed by Mr. ——, who was authorized by me to ask you to vote with me for Messrs. So-and-So; as I am better acquainted with you, from seeing more of you, than I am with my other tenants, and from all you have professed for me, I feel surprised you should not have set a better example. Many, if not all my tenants, have lived with me for many years, and upon terms of confidence and good-will, and the continuance of such good understanding ought to be the aim, as long as the connection between landlords and tenants continues. The severance of such good feeling, I fear, is the object of teachers who mislead them. As I said before, it is not desirable that a breach of confidence should take place where none existed before. I rarely, if ever, asked you, or either of you, to do anything for me, and as circumstances, from time of life, may prevent my ever asking you again a similar request, and, as you well know my wishes, I certainly expect you will vote with me for those gentlemen. I am, your well-wisher, ——."

6308. Mr. Brand.] What followed upon that?—They all voted but one man with the landlord, and that man voted against him, and he has received notice to quit.

6309. Have you any further information to give the Committee with regard to the county of Carmarthen?—Yes; I have a printed list which has been got up showing the way in which every man voted during the last election.

6310. Before going to that, have you any other cases of undue influence on the part of landlords?—Yes; I know a tenant who has received notice to quit; he is the tenant of one of the largest landowners in the county of Carmarthen, and the agent told him that he had to quit his farm because he had voted at the last election.

6311. Have you that from the tenant himself?—Yes, from the tenant himself.

6312. Are there any other cases of notices being given within your own knowledge?—Yes, to my own knowledge; I have a list of half-a-dozen who have been served with notice by the same landlord, and in another instance a list of 15 persons served by another landlord.

6313. Mr. Villiers.] They do not refer to the vote, do they, in the notice?—No; it would not amount to a notice, I believe, if they did.

6314. Mr. Brand.] To the best of your belief were those notices so served in consequence of the votes given by the parties?—There is no question about it; it is well understood. In the case of one of the landlords he actually discharged a man without notice, a workman on the estate, because of the way in which he voted.

6315. Will you explain about that printed list which you mentioned just now?—It is a list published, I believe, by the Conservative agent, showing which way every man voted in the county of Carmarthen during the last election.

6316. Is there anything special in that list?—Only that it is issued by the Conservative agent, who is also the clerk of the peace.

6317. Does that show the whole of the poll?—No, that is only one district; they are printed separately, one for each district.

6318. Mr. Bright.] Has it been usual before to publish the mode in which every elector voted?—No, never.

6319. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do you never publish a register of the poll?—Not showing how the men voted.

6320. Sir George Grey.] Are the farms generally small farms in Cardiganshire?—Yes, they are very small throughout Wales generally.

6321. Under 50 l. a-year?—Yes, the major part are under 50 l. a year.

6322. Were those tenants that you have spoken of upon whom this influence was exercised placed upon the register for the first time last year?—A great many of them were.

6323. They never exercised the franchise before?—No.

6324. Are they a more dependent class, and more subject to the influence which you have spoken of, than the larger class of farmers who were on the register before?—No; they are about as liable to the same influence as those above them, and those above them just the same as themselves.

6325. Are the larger farmers also without leases?—Yes, the larger farmers are also without lease.

6326. Are there no leases in Cardiganshire?—No, not as a rule.

6327. Mr. Bright.] Did you take any part in the election for the county of Cardigan?—I did.

6328. But not as a paid agent?—No.

6329. Are you a lawyer by profession?—No, I am merely an independent person, and I took an independent course at the election.

6330. Mr. Leatham.] Are you a guardian of the poor?—Yes, I am guardian for my parish.

6331. Mr. Bright.] Was the subject of the ballot discussed at the election at all?—No; at the last election the question was chiefly the Irish Church; but the ballot is strongly asked for in Wales generally.

6332. Is it not the fact that in your county the great bulk of the voters on the county list who are tenant occupiers of land are Dissenters in regard to church matters?—Yes; I may safely say four-fifths of them.

6333. On the other hand, are the landowners principally Churchmen?—They are Churchmen.

6334. With regard to this question of the Irish Church, were there particular reasons why the tenants found it difficult to vote with their landlords?—Yes, very; for of course, as Dissenters, they strongly object to any connection between Church and State.

6335. Can you tell at all what proportion of those Nonconformist tenants voted for the Conservative candidate; some of them did, I presume?—Yes, the major part of them.

6336. What was the result of the election; which way did the election go?—It turned in favour of the Liberals.

6337. How could it go in favour of the Liberals if the majority of the tenantry voted for the Conservatives?—We are fortunate enough in that county to have a very large number of freeholders and leaseholders of cottages.

Mr. T. Harris.

1 June 1869.

6338. And they were more independent than the tenantry?—Yes, very much more; I have here a list of the number that voted in each district.

6339. Have you heard amongst the tenants who voted for the Conservative candidate any desire expressed in favour of the ballot?—Yes; it is the general wish there.

6340. And it would be felt to be a great relief throughout by the tenantry of the county if they could vote free from any influence from their landlord or his agent?—The greatest relief that could be given them, provided that it is accompanied by a clause abolishing canvassing.

6341. If they had the ballot, even with the present freedom of canvassing, would it be a relief?—There can be no question about it. I am positive that in that county not 500 Conservative votes could be recorded if they had their own will.

6342. What is the number of electors now?—On the last list there were 5,123

6343. And how many did the Conservative candidate poll?—1,918.

6344. Do you feel confident, from your knowledge of the county, that outof the 5,000 the Conservatives at the last election could not have polled more than 500 if you had the ballot?—I am positive of it.

6345. You think, then, that the system of open voting in that county tends to the suppression of the actual opinion of the constituency?—It does; there is no question about it.

6346. Would you say the same with regard to Carmarthenshire?—Exactly the same.

6347. Do you know the feeling minutely of any other county in Wales?—No; I have only a general knowledge of Carmarthenshire and Pembrokeshire; I am an elector of the county of Pembroke as well.

6348. How many counties do you vote for?—Two; Cardiganshire and Pembrokeshire.

6349. Sir George Grey.] Why do you wish to connect the abolition of canvassing with the ballot to make it effectual?—For this reason: a great portion of the pressure brought to bear upon the voters under the present system is to keep them at home and not to allow them to come to the polling booth.

6350. Do you think that if the canvassing went on notwithstanding the ballot, the voters would be required to promise to vote for particular candidates?—Yes; and I have no doubt they would vote against their promise.

6351. Then that would make the promise of no use?—No; they would believe that to act a lie would be more sinful than to tell a lie.

6352. Then, that would render canvassing very valueless, would it not?—Quite so.

6353. Mr. Bright.] Do you not think that the landowners and their agents, and all persons of property and influence would probably feel that if the tenants really could vote freely, it would not be their interest or their duty to endeavour to extort such a promise from them?—They ought to feel so.

6354. Is it your opinion that the adoption of the ballot would, of itself, tend very much to relieve the tenantry from that oppressive system of canvassing?—I have no doubt of it; they would never attempt canvassing.

6355. Mr. Villiers.] Is it not very usual in Wales for a tenant to vote for his landlord?—Yes, because they are compelled to.

6356. But, generally speaking, is there not a sort of attachment to the landlord which prompts them to vote for him?—No; they are as attached to their landlords as any tenants can be in ordinary things; but upon political questions they have strong convictions of their own, and it is with very great reluctance indeed that they go with their landlords.

6357. You have produced a document purporting to be a memorial on the part of some tenants to their landlord, to be allowed to vote as they liked; he refused to release them; but how did they vote actually?—They all voted with him, except one.

6358. Mr. Bright.] There were seven tenants and six voted?—Yes; the seven did not send the document, it was only six; one happened to be from home at the time.

6359. Did the six who had asked their landlord to be allowed to vote contrary to his opinion, when he would not give them that permission, vote with him?—Yes, except one; and the one that was absent voted with the landlord.

6360. Mr. Villiers.] You referred, did you not, to another case, where the landlord had changed, and the tenants had changed their opinions with the landlord?—Yes; they are obliged to vote with their landlord.

6361. So that it is very usual throughout Wales for tenants to vote with their landlord now?—It is the rule that the landlords bring down their tenants with them to the poll in carts, and everything else, just as if they were to drive a herd of sheep or anything else, and that extends to both parties; to the old Whig families as well. It is the practice of the proprietors. It is the rule of the landlords there to reckon how many tenants they have, and to promise their support.

6362. Did you ever hear that complained of by the tenants as a hardship?—Yes, a very great hardship; they even shed tears when they are brought down in that way.

6363. Mr. Bright.] Have you seen them shed tears?—Yes, I have seen it myself.

6364. Mr. Villiers.] You tell us that they are tenants-at-will, and that some of them, or their families, have been holding on for three or four centuries; do you suppose that upon all occasions they have voted with their landlords?—We have been very stagnant in politics in Wales; it is only within the last few years that we have come to feel a little more interest in the subject.

6365. Would you say that it is as usual for the tenants to be turned out if they do not vote with the landlord, as it is usual for the tenant to vote with the landlord?—In the adjoining counties the system has been carried on for many years.

6366. But is it usual for a man to be turned out if he ever does exercise his own opinion freely?—It is usual; there may be exceptions; I know three or four cases in Cardiganshire of Non-Conservative landlords who have not served their tenants with notices.

6367. And those are persons who have had their tenants voting against them?—Yes.

6368. Is it considered a hardship that they do not get leases, or that they can be turned out so easily after making improvements?—Yes, they consider it a very great hardship, and they wish very much that some kind of tenant right should be established.

6369. Is that a subject which has been much canvassed in Wales?—It has been much felt by the tenant-farmers.

6370. In this case the feeling became more intense, tense, did it not, because it was a religious matter which was at issue?—Just so.

6371. Had you ever known such an exercise of influence before?—No, not to the same extent.

6372. And you have no doubt that it would be repeated again, supposing there were to be another Church question raised?—I believe that this system has been adopted in order to strike terror into the people more than to actually eject them.

6373. But their feeling about the Irish Church was from their dislike to the connection of Church and State?—Yes.

6374. And upon any such question as that, they would claim to be independent again?—Most likely.

6375. And most probably they would share the same fate as now?—Yes; and, even if the question of the ballot were raised, they would be equally vehement in their feelings.

6376. I judge from what you say, that the proprietors are against the ballot?—Yes.

6377. Would their influence be weakened by it?—Yes.

6378. You do not think that there is any inherent attachment to the proprietor that would induce men to vote for him if you had the ballot?—Not at all; they would do everything as tenants to oblige their landlords, provided they are not called upon to sacrifice their principles. As an instance of that, I have a letter written by one of the tenants to his landlord, just after receiving notice to quit; in which he says, that he had always been ready to serve his landlord on all occasions, and that he had to sacrifice a great deal in order to carry out his landlord's wishes in things connected with the farm.

6379. Is it the case, generally speaking, not alluding to politics, that there is a good feeling between tenant and landlord?—Yes, a very good feeling.

6380. Do you believe that a landlord would turn out a tenant who had improved the estate, simply because he objected to pay a higher rent?—Some have been guilty of that, but as a rule they would not do it.

6381. Generally speaking, they and their families remain a long time in occupation of the same land?—Yes, they do.

6382. But they claim to be independent in their political opinions?—Yes.

6383. And at present you cannot make any suggestion for securing this independence except by giving them vote by ballot?—Nothing whatever.

6384. Mr. Hardy.] Cardiganshire has not had many contests, has it?—There have been several.

6385. Lately have they been?—Yes; we had a contest in 1865 and a contest in 1859.

6386. But has it had a Liberal representative for a long time?—Since 1865.

6387. But not before that?—No, not before that.

6388. Are there many Liberal proprietors in Cardiganshire?—Very few.

6389. I suppose their tenants do vote pretty much with them?—Yes, as a rule they do; the number of notices that have been served represent the number of those who either voted against their landlords or remained neutral.

6390. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Did you take much time to discover those cases which you have referred to?—Yes; I was engaged about it nearly a fortnight, but of course I was not constantly on.

6391. You have bestowed a good deal of consideration on the subject?—Yes, I have.

6392. Did you ever ask any of those tenants if they had any other reasons for receiving notice?—No; in many instances they told me that they were given to understand by the landlord or the agent that it was on account of their votes.

6393. You believe that those notices were solely given on account of political motives?—Unquestionably.

6394. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Was it the state of education in Cardiganshire; do they speak English?—Yes, the education is pretty good as a whole; they can make themselves understood in English.

6395. But as a general rule they speak Welsh?—Yes.

6396. Their farms are in a very primitive state, are they not; nearly all mountain?—Yes, it is nearly all mountain.

6397. There is no arable farming, is there, in Cardiganshire?—Not very much.

6398. Are any of those landlords making improvements in their estates and trying to get a better class of tenants?—Not at all.

6399. Then you think that those evictions are caused by the landlords merely for the purpose of avenging themselves on the voters?—Yes, to strike terror into them.

6400. And not with a view of improving their property?—Not a bit.

6401. Mr. Cross.] Do you think that the ballot would put a stop to all this?—I believe the result would be such as to render a contest there altogether out of the question.

6402. How do you think that the ballot would put a stop to intimidation?—There would be a certain number of course of Conservative votes given, but it would be very difficult to make out who gave them.

6403. Did I rightly understand you to say that if a man says that he is going to vote for one candidate he still would rather tell a lie than vote against his conscience after all?—Yes.

6404. Supposing that a landlord asked his tenant after the election how he voted would he tell him a lie then?—I have no doubt that he would do so in order to keep his farm.

6405. I am afraid that the state of morality is not very high in the Principality?—The state of morality is this, that they prefer doing what is right.

6406. At all events you think that a man would tell a lie and say he voted for one candidate when he had voted for another?—My belief is this, that the result would be such as would make it altogether out of the question for any landlord to make any inquiry about it.

6407. Mr. Edward Egerton.] At the last election, as you say, a religious question was at issue; but do they take an interest in general politics in Wales, apart from religion?—Politics now are studied pretty well in the country.

6408. Do you think that a tenant would be likely to follow the opinions of his landlord on general questions of politics?—No, I think not.

6409. Do you believe that he would think as much for himself upon other subjects as upon religious questions?—Yes.

Mr. George William Latham, called in; and Examined.

Mr. G. W. Latham.

2 June 1869.

6410. Chairman.] You live at Bradwall Hall, in Cheshire, do you not?—Yes.

6411. Are you a magistrate?—Yes, I am a magistrate for the county.

6412. In what division?—In Mid Cheshire.

6413. Did you take any part in the last election?—I was chairman of Mr. Warren's central committee.

6415. In the hands of which party is the land mainly?—With the exception of one large estate, and two or three moderate sized ones, and one large estate which is neutral, every acre, I think, of the land in Mid-Cheshire was in the hands of the Conservative party at the last election.

6416. Did you ascertain, in the course of your canvass, what were the political opinions of those dissenting farmers?—They almost all of them to a man signed a requisition to Mr. Warren to stand. On the very large estates they did not; but on the small estates, and on the non-resident estates, the tenant farmers signed a requisition to Mr. Warren.

6417. Did you find that the dissenting farmers in general voted for the Liberal candidates?—The dissenting farmers, to a large extent, voted for the Conservative candidates.

6418. And many even of those who had signed the requisition?—Yes; I went a few days after the election through the canvass-books, and the poll-books, and I found that nearly 400 men who were pledged to vote for the Liberal side had voted for the Conservative side, and every one of those men was a tenant on an estate. In the towns we polled more than our pledges.

6419. Do you believe that this arises from direct orders or threats on the part of the landlords?—Not the least. I do not believe that a Conservative landlord dares to brave public opinion and to turn off his tenant; but he allows his agent to go to the tenant, and he allows him to say how much it would please the landlord, if the tenant voted in a certain way, and gives hints that if the tenant does not vote as his landlord wishes, all sorts of petty indulgences, in the shape of small repairs, additional gates, and perhaps a little time to pay his rent, will be withdrawn, and the landlord, except in very few instances, has not the straightforwardness to say, "You may vote as you please." He stands by and lets the agent hint all those things.

6421. Do you know any instances where the contrary result followed the refusal of the landlord to make any such declaration?—There was an instance of an estate near me, the Wheelock estate. I had a correspondence with Mr. Ackers on the subject, and therefore I do not see that there is the least harm in mentioning his name. The tenants of his estate had every one signed the requisition to Mr. Warren; it is an estate, I think, of 12 or 14 tenants. They happened nearly every one of them to be cousins of the others; they all attend the same Nonconformist place of worship; they had all signed the requisition, and they had all pledged themselves to vote on the canvass some time before the election. I heard that the sub-agent of Mr. Ackers sent to those tenants to ask them to vote for the Conservative party, and I wrote to Mr. Ackers, saying that I was quite certain, from my knowledge of him, that he would not wish to influence his tenants, and I asked him to let the tenants know that he did not wish to influence them against their convictions. He wrote back, saying that he had seen the sub-agent, and he utterly denied having had any communication of that sort with the tenants. I went over myself and saw the tenants, and they all gave me an account of the conversation, and what the sub-agent had said to them, namely, that it was Mr. Ackers's wish that they should vote, and that those who did not vote for the Conservatives would be turned off their farms. I reported that conversation to Mr. Ackers, and I asked him, as a servant of his had used his name, as he told me, against his wishes, and made the tenants believe that it was Mr. Ackers's wish that they should vote for the Conservative party, that he would under those peculiar circumstances of the case, let the tenants know that they might vote as they liked. To that letter I got no answer, and every one of those tenants voted for the Conservative candidates, they having both signed the requisition and promised to vote for Mr. Warren.

6422. Do you know of any case in which the question question was asked whether the tenants might vote as they pleased?—It was on that same estate. The rent dinner happened a short time after this correspondence, and a few days before the election the head agent came down, and one of the tenants put the question to the head agent, "Supposing we were to vote, what would happen?" And he said, "That is a question which I have no authority to answer."

6423. In any cases did the land agents or persons immediately connected with them act as agents of either political side?—I know one case in which a father and his two sons were all employed in the estate office; the two sons acted as paid canvassers, the father was a member of the central committee, and every tenant of that estate, I need hardly say, voted for the Conservative party with the exception of one or two men.

6424. Did the landlords there generally decline to give any assurance to their tenants that they might vote as they pleased?—Universally, I think, with the exception of Mr. Lloyd and Lord De Tabley, who, immediately his son stood, issued a circular begging his tenants to vote as they pleased.

6425. Are you aware whether there was any reason ever given for declining to issue such a circular?—Mr. William Brooks has large estates near Manchester, at Altrincham, Carrington, Partington, Sale, and several other townships, which he had bought, I think, from Lord Stamford. I heard that his tenants refused to give any pledge or to vote for us, having most of them signed a requisition to Mr. Warren, but they refused on the canvass to vote until he had issued a circular. I therefore wrote to Mr. Brooks and asked him to issue such a circular, and he said that he should just as soon think of turning a tenant off for voting against his landlord's principles, as he should expect the tenant to leave because Mr. Brooks' politics were different from his. However, Mr. Brooks did nominate on the hustings Mr. Cornwall Legh, I think, and the result was, that, with perhaps one or two exceptions (I will not be sure of every tenant), a very large number voted for the Conservative candidates.

6426. Mr. Bright.] Even of those who had signed the requisition to Mr. Warren?—Yes.

6427. Chairman.] In your opinion, was such a case as that the result of a dread of the consequences or of attachment to the landlord?—There could hardly be much attachment between a person who has bought an estate only two or three years ago and the tenants. It is a sort of fear that the tenant has; the Cheshire farmer is not a rich man, and he is always wanting repairs done; and it is an idea that, except he does just what the landlord pleases, his landlord will not please him in return.

6428. Sir George Grey.] Have they leases?—Very exceptionally indeed.

6429. Chairman.] Has any case come under your notice in which coercion in a more gross form was practised?—I have known this case. A tenant who himself had saved a certain sum of money bought a farm; it is not only his own vote, but he is in the capacity of being the landlord of a small farm himself; some one came to him and hinted to him that except his vote and the vote of his tenant was given to the Conservative party, he should lose his farm. The man had saved money and he was firm. He said, "I have signed a requisition to Mr. Warren, and, as far as I am concerned, I shall vote for Mr. Warren." This man's mother, being a widow, holds a farm under another Conservative landlord, and two or three days before the election it was intimated to him that except he voted, and except he influenced his tenant to vote, for the Conservative party, his mother would lose her farm too. He said, "I cannot have the old woman turned out at her time of life," and he voted for the Conservatives.

6430. Mr. Bright.] Do you know enough of that case, from having seen this tenant, or seen the old woman, to be able to state that you positively believe that that is a true case?—I can say that that is a perfectly true case. I do not at all say that the landlord was the man who threatened, but it was threatened by some one who represented he had authority, and the tenant believed it.

6431. Chairman.] Have you ever known a case where it is made a matter of bargain between the landlord and the tenant as to how he votes?—I have had a very amusing account of a long bargain between a landlord and a tenant, in which the result was that the tenant was allowed to split his vote, but it took two or three interviews before they could agree upon it. The tenant was a hard-headed Scotchman who had been imported into Cheshire, and he thought that he had a right to vote as he liked; the landlord thought that he had a right to influence his vote, and they ultimately came to the conclusion that he should give one vote to the Conservative party and one to the Liberal party.

6432. Mr. Bright.] Have you known any cases in which widows have been obliged to give up their farms in order that the successors might be persons who could vote?—No, I have not; I do not think that at the last election that would have had any weight at all, because there would not have been time to get them on the register; but I may say that that will be the case, as I know, not only on the Conservative side but on the Liberal side, because in everything that I have said about coercion I quite believe that if there had been as much land in the hands of Liberal landlords as in the hands of Conservatives there would have been equal coercion. I do not believe it is a question of politics, I believe that it is a question of the possession of land. The moment a man gets an estate he thinks that the votes on that estate belong to him.

6433. Mr. Edward Egerton.] I do not understand you to come here to-day to make charges on the one side or the other?—Not the least; I believe it is an evil of having property that a man considers that he not only owns this property himself, but that he owns the souls of his tenants, and I confess to a certain extent that personally I have that feeling, I should be even afraid I should be very indignant if my tenant voted against my wishes.

6434. Chairman.] Is it your opinion that the agents did not take any means to contradict the impression that the tenant was bound to vote according to the landlord's wishes?—Certainly not; the great object of the agent was to keep up that impression.

6435. Do you know of any case where an estate was in Chancery, or belonged to a minor?—Yes; and that is rather a good illustration of what I say, that it is the small indulgences that induced the men to vote. There is an estate in

Mr. G. W. Latham.

1 June 1869.

Cheshire of which one of the trustees is brother of a gentleman who was very well known at one time to members of this House, Mr. Coppock, the electioneering agent; the one trustee, Mr. Henry Coppock, of Stockport, resides some 20 miles from the estate, and the other trustee is a gentleman living close to it. The tenants all met together, and Mr. Coppock addressed them, and he assured them that no tenant should suffer for voting according to his conscience. I may say that every one of the tenants had signed the requisition to Mr. Warren, and Mr Henry Coppock having given that assurance went away. The managing trustee, as I said before, is a gentleman who lives close to the estate, and when the polling came on every one of the tenants, notwithstanding they had signed the requisition to Mr. Warren, voted for the Conservatives, with one exception, and he was neutral, and that was after a direct assurance that they should not be disturbed in their farms.

6436. Mr. Bright.] Was the other trustee of Conservative politics?—Yes, the other trustee was a Conservative.

6437. Chairman.] Probably those tenants may not have felt absolutely certain that they would not be ejected?—They were perfectly certain that they would not be ejected, because I heard Mr. Coppock give them the assurance.

6438. But it was rather from the hope of receiving favours or from fear, was it not, that they voted as they did?—It is the hope of receiving favours; it is a sort of bargain, "I will do what pleases you if you will do what pleases me."

6439. I think you said that after the election you made an analysis of the canvass book?—Yes, I went through the poll books.

6440. How many voters pledged to Mr. Warren did you find unfaithful?—Very nearly 400; above 350.

6441. Mr. Edward Egerton.] What was the majority?—The majority, I think, was between 500 and 600; I do not think it quite reached 600.

6442. Chairman.] Between 400 or 500 had not voted or had turned round?—Very nearly 400 had turned round after being pledged to us; not who had signed the requisition (for one knows that a great many people sign requisitions very carelessly indeed) but men who had absolutely on the canvass promised us their votes.

6443. Mr. Bright.] Were there any neutral who had also promised?—Not very many.

6444. Chairman.] Then had most of them actually turned round?—Yes, most of them actually turned round.

6445. What were the majority of them?—They were farmers on the large estates.

6446. Mr. Bright.] Was the canvass such as to lead you to expect that you would win?—Yes.

6447. And if your pledges had been carried out, what would have been the result of the election?—If our pledges had been carried out we should have been in a majority of about 180, or something of that sort.

6448. Chairman.] Did you find that in other cases except in those large estates, your canvass had been correct?—In the towns we polled more than our promises, all through.

6449. How was the canvassing conducted?—We had paid agents in the Altrincham and Bowdon district, but with that exception all the rest of the canvass was done by amateurs, and done honestly, I believe. A man was not paid by results; that system was not carried out, and I believe that they tried to give us the truest account that they could.

6450. You do not think that they put down on their books the names of voters unless they had actually ascertained that they intended to vote for you?—I cannot see any reason why they should at all.

6451. Do you think that the small tenant farmers, or tenant farmers in general, care much about politics in Cheshire?—I do not think they care the least about politics as a rule. I am sorry to say that the small Cheshire farmer is worse educated, most probably, than his labourer; he has been too big a man to go to the national school, where his labourer has been, and he cares very little about politics, and he hardly reads a word of political or polemical controversy, and therefore his interest in politics is not like that of the Scotch or the Welsh; he has no very strong feeling one way or the other, and he is quite willing to vote as his landlord wishes him to do.

6452. But in this case, owing to the fact of many of them being Dissenters, they had some wish on the subject?—Yes, they had some wish on the Church question. Perhaps even stronger wishes on the question of local taxation and the game laws.

6453. In your opinion, even in this absence of interest in politics, is it an evil that the landlord influence, which you have referred to, should be used?—It is an evil in this way, I think: A man goes to market, and he gets laughed at and chaffed by his neighbours, and they say, "What, are you a Tory? You were a Whig, and now you are a Tory because your landlord made you vote that way;" and in order to assert his freedom he becomes a more unreasoning politician, and therefore a more difficult man to deal with than he would have been if he had been a free man. The landlord makes him vote as he wishes, upon which he immediately takes up a strong line of his own, and becomes a bitter politician. He has not been educated to it, and he becomes an unreasoning politician.

6454. I think you have already mentioned that you have no reason to believe that those practices are confined to the one side or the other?—No; I am sorry to say that I know one or two cases of small estates on the Liberal side in which there was a certain attempt at coercion. The moment I heard of it I did what I could to stop it; but, as I said before, I believe that the moment a man possesses land, he thinks that the votes on the estates are his own.

6455. Did you find that there was much influence of any other description brought to bear?—There was a great deal of influence of customers on tradesmen, and a certain amount of preaching to congregations; but I do not know whether it had much influence.

6456. Mr. Edward Egerton.] There was not much preaching in favour of the Conservatives, was there?—If you wish for an instance I can tell you that the Archdeacon of Chester preached a sermon the day before the poll, in which he said that the poll-books would all be opened on the Day of Judgment.

6457. Mr. Bright.] That was reported, was it not?—It was reported; influence was also brought to bear in this way; it happened to be about Christmas time; there was great influence used throughout throughout the poor villages in Cheshire in respect of clothing clubs; the clergymen had got a good deal of money which the poor people had saved during the year to lay out in Christmas clothing clubs, and it happened that just before the election that money had to be laid out, and it was only laid out in Conservative shops.

6458. Chairman.] Do not customers, whichever side they take, as a rule, exert what influence they have upon the tradesmen that they employ?—I think they might have done, but it is very hard to say where a customer's influence begins and where it should end; but the flagrant cases which came before me were cases in which money had been subscribed, 20 l. or 30 l. or 40 l., for the purposes of clothing clubs, in which it had all to be laid out in a bulk. I know a case in which a neighbour of mine who had got, I think, 70 l. subscribed by different people of different politics of his parish, came over to a shop, and he gave the order for the Christmas clothing things; he went out of the shop and asked the question, and found that the shopkeeper was not of the right way of thinking, upon which he came back to the shop and revoked the order, and took it to the next door where the shopkeeper happened to be his own way of thinking; and that was carried out by clergymen and clergymen's wives all through the county.

6459. Is it not the case that every kind of influence that can be brought to bear upon the voters is brought to bear?—Yes, every kind.

6460. Are not inquiries made as to who has influence over So-and-so?—If a man refused to pledge his vote, the first thing one always did, and I did it myself in canvassing, was to try to find somebody who had influence over him; and I am afraid that we were not very particular as to whether it was a right influence or a wrong influence.

6461. What is the remedy which in your opinion should be applied to this state of things?—The ballot is the only possible remedy that I can see. Of course you may diminish the expense of elections in other ways, but the only remedy for coercion can be the ballot.

6463. Do you think that the extension of the franchise has brought about a greater necessity for the ballot?—I think so. I think that supposing you did not give the ballot as far as regards the 12 l. tenants, it might merely amount to giving the landlord a dual, or treble, or 20 times vote. That class of tenant will always vote with his landlord.

6464. Have you taken any part in former elections in Cheshire?—We have not had an election, I think, for 27 years in one division, and for 25 years in the other; there has never been one since I have been in the county.

6465. You have been acquainted, have you not, with the old voters and with the new voters?—Yes.

6466. Should you say that the new voters are a more dependent class than the old ones?—Hardly so. Of course there are some farms in Cheshire in which the tenants are pretty independent, men paying a rent of 500 l. or 600 l. a year; but, as a rule, in our part of Mid-Cheshire the farms do not go above 250 l. or 300 l.

6467. Are there a considerable number of freeholders?—Yes, there are a considerable number of freeholders, and they are quite independent.

6468. So that the great addition which has been recently made, has chiefly been an addition of voters of the dependent class?—Yes; and an important addition to the landlord influence in the county.

6469. Mr. Bright.] You said, did you not, that with regard to the town voters you polled all your canvass?—We polled more than we had on our canvass books.

6470. With regard to the freeholders, how did you succeed?—The freeholders were principally town voters. Now and then you find two or three odd freeholders in a township, but as a rule the township all belongs to one man.

6471. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] You had a great many 12 l. tenants in those boroughs, had you not?—Yes; a great many in the municipal borough of Congleton, and a certain number in Sandbach, Middlewich, and Northwich, and a very great number in Altrincham and Bowden which, as I said before, is simply a suburb of the rich Manchester manufacturers' houses, rented at from 700 l. and downwards.

6472. Mr. Bright.] Including all those, you polled your canvass?—Yes; including all those we polled our canvass.

6473. Who was Mr. Egerton, who was one of the Conservative candidates? — Son of Lord Egerton, of Tatton.

6474. I think you said that Mr. Warren's father issued a circular requesting his tenants to exercise their freedom of election?—He did.

6475. Did any of them vote for the Conservative candidate?—Three or four did.

6476. Is Mr. Egerton's father a proprietor in the division?—A very large proprietor.

6477. Did he issue any such circular?—He did not.

6478. Did any of Lord Egerton's tenants vote for the Liberal candidate?—I do not think that any tenant of Lord Egerton's, that is to say, any agricultural tenant, voted for the Liberal candidate, except once, and he was at the time under notice to quit.

6479. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You had full permission to canvass his tenants, had you not?—I never asked any landlord's permission to canvass his tenants.

6480. Did you ever hear of any landlord stopping a canvasser?—Yes, I did. A landlord in Cheshire told one of our canvassers that he was to keep off his manor; but that was not Lord Egerton.

6481. Chairman.] Have you any other suggestions to make with reference to elections?—I should like to do away with nominations; they are simple noise and folly. I should like to stop the opening of public-houses on the day of the poll; poll; that simply is an excuse for eating and drinking; and I should like to say that all meetings during the canvass should be held at places not public-houses. I am quite certain that a great deal of harm is done, and a great deal of expense is incurred by those meetings at public-houses.

Mr. G. W. Latham.

1 June 1869.

6482. At small places in country districts can any other buildings be found of suitable size?—Wherever there is a centre of population there is a school, I think.

6483. But it would not always be given to either candidate, would it?—No; but I think that a school is a public place, and as long as a candidate does not talk blasphemy or indecency there could be no harm in a candidate explaining his political views in a school-room; a school-room is a place of education.

6484. As to the conveyance of voters, what opinion have you formed upon that subject?—I think, with regard to the conveyance of voters, with the exception of men living out of the district, who might be brought to the nearest railway station, I should do away with it entirely; it is simply a cause of expense to the candidates. Almost every farmer has got a conveyance of his own. My belief is this, that every legal item of expense that you allow you open the flood gates wider to let out illegal expenses; and if you could contract what expenses are legal within one or two items, such as printing, agents' fees, and advertising, you would almost stop a vast amount of illegal expenditure of money.

6485. Would not it be necessary, if you did away with the conveyance of voters, to increase the number of polling places?—That might be so.

6486. The distances are still considerable, are they not?—Yes; but I presume the Committee are aware that in almost all counties, certainly in Mid Cheshire, we have increased the number of polling places largely since the last Act was passed. I do not think there is, at the present time, any polling place to which voters would have to go more than five miles to give his vote.

6487. But that distance would be beyond reach of an infirm or a sick man, would it not?—If a man is infirm and he wants to vote, he has always a neighbour who has got some vehicle to lend him. I myself know, from experience, the enormous cost of vehicles, and I found it perfectly unnecessary to the Liberal side the last time.

6488. Do you think you could stop paid canvassing?—I hope so. I do not think it is wanted. We had two paid canvassers last time for the Altrincham district, and I do not think they did us the least good; they were rather an encumbrance; they felt themselves bound to show that they had done a certain amount of work, and we found that we never could trust them.

6489. Were the expenses of the contest heavy?—It cost us under 3,500 l. for one candidate; I do not know whether you call that heavy or light.

6490. Mr. Bright.] What did it cost the other side?—On the other side the two candidates coalesced, and they published 7,000 l.; I have no evidence as to what more it cost them.

6491. Was it exactly 7,000 l.?—I know it was 7,000 l. or 7,200 l., whereas it cost us 3,500 l.; our published expenses were 3,100 l., and there was about 400 l. more that did not go through the agent's hands but was spent by local committees; I believe 3,500 l. covered every farthing that we spent.

6493. In no other part of the constituency did you find any desire to receive a bribe?—In no other part.

6494. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Who got up this requisition to Mr. Warren?—I am afraid I had as much hand in it as anybody.

6495. I know you will answer me frankly; was there any gentleman connected with the county, any landed proprietor, whose name was on that requisition?—Would you be kind enough to define what you mean by gentlemen of the county; whether you mean men of so many descents or men who had got land there?

6496. Gentlemen connected with land in the county?—Yes, there were.

6499. You accompanied Mr. Warren upon every occasion, did you not?—On most occasions.

6500. There was a very active canvass for both candidates, I think?—Very active, I believe.

6501. And they addressed meetings?—Yes.

6502. In the towns the Conservative candidates did not meet with very good receptions, sometimes?—I believe the people in the towns were very strong Liberals.

6503. There was a good deal of tumult at some meetings, was there not; at Congleton, for instance?—I was not there myself, but I believe there was a row at a Conservative meeting.

6504. You say that you polled more than your pledges in the towns; do you think that that had anything to do with it; was there a feeling of fear on the part of the voters in towns which prevented them from fulfilling their promises to the Conservative candidates?—I think not; I was most of the day in the town of Sandbach, where there

there were more riots than anywhere else, and I stood by the hustings until the polling was practically over, and I am quite certain there was not a single voter prevented from going up to vote.

6506. What were those roughs brought in for?—They were brought in ostensibly to protect the voters.

6507. Had there been no riot previously?—Not the least; they were brought in as soon as the poll opened.

6508. Did you see that yourself?—I saw them come in; there had been no row at all before.

6509. Chairman.] Had there not been a row at Conservative meetings?—They had had a very noisy Liberal meeting, and a very noisy Conservative meeting, but there had been no violence; nothing to justify any fear of that sort.

6510. Mr. Edward Egerton.] Do you mean to state positively that there had been no violence before these roughs were brought in?—I say they were brought in between 9 and 10 o'clock on the morning of the election.

6511. And that everything had been quiet when they were brought in?—Everything was perfectly quiet when they came in.

6512. When was this meeting at which there had been violence before?—I think it was in September when there had been noise, not violence.

6513. And nothing beyond noise?—Nothing beyond noise; the Conservatives made a noise at the Liberal meeting, and the Liberals made a noise at the Conservative meeting.

6514. Which is generally done at most meetings, I believe?—Yes.

6515. Have you heard of any instance of any tenant suffering on account of giving his vote for the Liberal party in Cheshire?—No, certainly not; I do not believe, as I said before, that a landlord dares face public opinion and give notice to his tenant on that account.

6516. Has there been any ill feeling left?—No; I think all ill feeling has died away.

6517. Was there any treating, that you are aware of, in any of those towns on the day of the election?—There was a good deal of eating and drinking, I know, on our side. Our orders were that nobody but committee-men should have refreshments, but the result was that every man came in and ate and drank. A committee-man brought him in, and I believe it was just the same on the other side.

6518. Was there much drunkenness?—I saw no drunkenness. I was at three or four polling places in the day and I saw no drunkenness.

6519. You have had some experience in this election, and you are a lawyer, I think?—I was at the Bar.

6520. Have you any suggestion to make to the Committee as to greater stringency in the law relative to treating?—I think that the best way to prevent treating is to shut up the public-houses on the day of the election; that would be the only way.

6521. Do you think it would be possible to hold election committee-rooms at places that were not public-houses?—I should think it most possible; wherever there is a population there is a school; and if we could enact that the use of the school-room should be given to all bonâ fide candidates to address the electors, the whole thing might be easily carried out.

6522. Have you any suggestions to make to the Committee beyond the ballot with a view to securing greater purity in the county elections?—No, I think not.

6523. Mr. Dalglish.] You stated, I think, in your evidence, that the labourers of the tenant farmers were sometimes better educated than their masters?—I think that is the case.

6524. Therefore would not it be an advantage that the educated labourers should have a vote as well as the uneducated farmers?—I am most anxious that that should be so; I think that the labourers feel it very much; they see that a man living in a town who is a much worse educated man than themselves, has a vote for the borough, and they feel very much the exclusion from the franchise.

6525. Then you would be in favour of the extension of the same franchise to the counties as now exists in boroughs?—Yes, if we had the protection of the ballot, not without.

6526. Mr. Edward Egerton.] You stated that the farmers in Cheshire are principally Dissenters?—Yes; of course I can only speak from my own observation, which is pretty large; and I should say that there is hardly any tenant farmer in Cheshire who does not attend chapel occasionally; and most of them, or a great many of them are proprietors or trustees of chapels.

6527. There has been no difficulty in getting church rates, has there, in Cheshire?—I think it would have been perfectly impossible to get a voluntary church rate, if the landlords had not had the power of influencing their tenant's votes, and had not done so.

6528. Has there been any case in which a church rate has been refused, to your knowledge?—Yes, in Middlewich it has been refused.

6529. I mean in the county districts?—Middlewich, though it is a town, comprises an enormous amount of county district. I do not know enough about church rates to tell you of any cases, but I certainly understand that, practically speaking, church rates have ceased in Cheshire.

6530. Do you mean under the new law?—No, they had ceased before. Of course in a township or parish where the property belonged to one proprietor, they may have gone on.

6531. Sir George Grey.] Are the people Wesleyans?—They are Wesleyans, and there are a great many of the sect that Dr. Warren founded, the Free Methodist Church.

6532. Mr. James.] I think the broken promises that you spoke of were not broken promises of those who signed the requisition, but broken promises upon the canvass?—Quite so. I did not at all count the requisition, because I can quite understand a man merely signing a requisition in order to have an opportunity of hearing a candidate speak, and really seeing what his value is. I merely compared the result of the canvass canvass with the result of the election. I do not think it is at all fair to compare the returns of a requisition with the returns of an election.

Mr. G. W. Latham.

1 June 1869.

6533. You said that, in your opinion, you would prohibit the conveyance to the poll of voters in counties as well as in boroughs; to what extent would you carry the effect of that prohibition; would you make it a matter that should void the seat, or simply a penalty under the Corrupt Practices Act?—I should think that a penalty would be quite sufficient.

6535. Sir George Grey.] I suppose with this political ignorance and indifference which prevails generally among the tenant farmers in Cheshire, there is no great desire for the ballot?—I think that there is this desire for the ballot: It is not legal evidence; but a friend of mine, in whom I have great confidence, and I am quite certain he would tell me what is perfectly true, told me that during the polling at Altrincham a good many voters, before they polled for Messrs. Legh and Egerton, said, "We hope we shall have the ballot next time, and we hope you will win."

6536. Were those town voters?—No; Altrincham is not a town; it is a congeries of large houses, and of small agricultural tenants round them.

6537. Did I rightly understand you to say that now, owing to the ignorance of politics, and the indifference of the tenant farmers, they vote as a matter of course with their landlords?—Yes.

6538. What influence do you suppose would guide their votes provided the ballot was in force?—I think that the landlord would have a certain influence still, and I am not prepared to say that he should not have a certain influence; but I think that in the case where the chapel and the landlord were opposed, a man would exercise his discretion; at present he exercises no discretion at all; I think he would let thought in a little bit, whereas at the present time he does not even think about it; he knows it is no use.

6540. And it is rather safer to know nothing when they must vote as they are told?—Yes.

THE RIGHT HON. THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

The Rev. MICHAEL DANIEL JONES, called in; and Examined.

Rev. M. D. Jones. 4 June 1869.

6541. Mr. Leatham.] YOU are an Independent Minister, are you not?—I am.

6542. And Principal of the Independent College of Bala, in Merionethshire?—I am.

6543. Have you lived long there?—Yes, I have spent almost the whole of my life there.

6544. Have you any special means of knowing the political opinions of the great bulk of the inhabitants?—Yes, I am constantly in personal communication with them.

6545. Do you take an interest in the elections?—I do.

6546. And an active part?—Yes.

6547. Have you been a member of committees?—I have been a member of committees, and attended meetings at the county elections.

6548. You took part, did you not, in the three elections of 1859, 1865, and 1868?—Yes.

6549. Is most of the land in Merionethshire in a few hands?—It is; there are two principal estates there.

6550. Do you know the number of tenants upon those large estates?—Upon one, about 160; and upon the other about 150, more or less; I am not quite sure.

6551. With regard to the 150 tenants, is that estate near Bala?—Yes; both of them are not far from Bala.

6552. Do you know all those men personally?—On one estate I know them personally, every man.

6553. Is that the estate with the 150 tenants?—Yes.

6554. Do you know whether they are Dissenters or Churchmen?—Almost all Dissenters.

6555. What is the proportion?—Nine-tenths perhaps, or more, are Dissenters.

6556. And are the Dissenters almost universally Liberals in Wales?—They are.

6557. In 1859 had those 150 men votes?—Not all of them.

6558. How many had?—I cannot say exactly upon one estate; upon the other I can.

6559. How did those tenants on the estate which you are speaking of vote?—Upon the lesser of the two large estates with a Tory landlord, they voted on the Conservative side with the exception of 14.

6560. Are those large farms or small farms?—They are of different sizes; some large, and some small.

6561. Do they run from 40 to 60 and 100 acres?—They do.

6562. Are they held on leases?—No; they are all tenants-at-will.

6563. As to the 14 men who did not vote for the Conservatives, can you tell me how they voted?—Nine of them were neutral, and five voted for the Liberal candidate.

6564. What happened after the election to the five who voted for the Liberal candidate in 1859?—They were all ejected.

6565. When were the notices given?—On the following notice day.

6566. That was September, was it not?—Yes.

6567. The men were turned out?—Yes.

6568. There were nine who were neutral; did anything happen to them?—Their rents were raised.

6569. In every instance?—Yes, in every instance.

6570. Were any other tenants turned out at the same time?—None.

6571. Were the rents of any other tenants raised at the same time?—None.

6572. Have you the names of all those parties by you?—Yes, I have them, and I can give the particulars.

6573. Were those persons told why they were turned out in any case?—Some of them were told by the agent.

6574. What were they told?—That it was on account of their votes that they were turned out.

6575. Did any of them receive any other reason why they were turned out?—None.

6576. Now, turning your attention to the following election of 1865, how did the nine who were neutral at the previous election vote?—They voted all on the Tory side.

6577. Had any of them their rents lowered after that?—Yes.

6578. Now, as to the other large estate which you spoke of, upon which there were 160 tenants, are those men nearly all Dissenters?—Yes.

6579. And Liberals?—Yes.

6580. In 1859, how many men of those had votes?—Thirty-five.

Rev. M. D. Jones. 4 June 1869.

6581. Do you remember how they voted?—Eleven voted on the Tory side, and the rest were either neutral, or some of them voted on the Liberal side.

6582. Were those almost all leading men in chapels in their neighbourhood? — There were seven who received notice to quit, and these were nearly all leading men in the chapels.

6583. And those seven all received notice to quit; were they turned out?—They were.

6584. At the next election in 1865, how did the tenants vote on that estate?—They all voted for the Tory candidate, except one.

6585. In fact, they decided the election?—Yes, the coercion on those two estates decided the election in favour of the Tory candidate.

6586. Can you speak from your own knowledge that as a rule the tenants in the agricultural districts in that neighbourhood are forced to vote with their landlords, whatever may be their political convictions?—Yes.

6587. Was there an election last year?—There was.

6588. There was no contest, I believe?—There was a contest, but no polling; the Tory candidate retired just before the polling.

6589. How do the farmers in that county regard an election?—They regard it with dread.

6590. Do they wish to have no vote?—They do.

6591. Was there a meeting held of Independents in this county recently?—There was about a year or two ago at Trawsvynydd, a meeting of ministers and deacons.

6592. Did they pass a resolution?—Yes, in the committee they passed a resolution to the effect that a petition was to be sent to Parliament requesting them either to take the vote from the farmers or to give them the protection of the ballot.

6593. When was that petition sent?—I do not know whether it was sent; it was passed to be sent.

6594. What was the date of the meeting?—About a year ago. I cannot remember the exact date.

6595. Do you know any instances of Dissenting congregations being turned out of their chapels in consequence of the way in which the leading members had voted?—I know an instance in which a congregation, or rather two leading men in a congregation, had notice to quit, and I know another case in which the chapel was sold.

6596. It has been stated to this committee that Dissenting ministers have taken a very active part in the election and have exercised a kind of spiritual terrorism over their flocks; is that true?—That is an impossibility.

6597. You mean that it is an impossibility on account of the peculiar relations existing between an Independent minister and his flock?—Certainly.

6598. They have no control of that kind, have they?—No; the congregation have more control over them.

6599. You have heard of no spiritual censure?—None whatever.

6600. Sir George Grey.] You say, do you not, that at the last election there was no contest?—There was a contest, but no polling.

6601. There were two candidates proposed, but the Tory candidate retired?—Yes.

6602. Notwithstanding this coercion which you say was exercised in the two previous elections, the Tory candidate had no chance this time?—No.

6603. How do you account for that?—In one part of the county there are quarries, and that is why the Liberals are the masters of Merioneth, through the quarrymen.

6604. What was the difference between the last election and the previous elections which secured the return unopposed of the Liberal candidate this time, when there had been a severe contest on the two previous occasions, and the Tory candidate had been returned at both of them?—The register was well attended to, and there was an increase of buildings, for the most part in the neighbourhood of the quarries.

6605. Even without the ballot the vote of the county, according to what you supposed to be its opinion, was freely represented at the last election; was that the case?—It is represented now, no doubt.

6606. Then the last return, according to your opinion, was in accordance with the general view of the constituency?—Yes.

6607. And that without the ballot?—Yes, and that without the ballot.

6608. Mr. Villiers.] Did I rightly understand you that there was a petition presented about a year ago, or drawn up for the purpose, praying that the franchise should be taken away unless they could vote freely?—Yes.

6609. Was that after the Reform Act had passed extending the franchise?—I do not remember the exact time.

6610. It was before the general election, I presume?—Yes.

6611. And subsequently to the last previous election?—Yes.

6612. And you think it was about a year ago?—I think it was about a year ago.

6613. Has the franchise been much extended, owing to the Reform Act, in that county?—A little; not a great deal.

6614. Have the additional voters generally gone on the Liberal side?—That depends upon who the landlord is. If they are independent voters, they generally go upon the Liberal side; and if they are under landlords who are Conservatives, they generally go with the Conservative landlord.

6615. You say that there was no contest, although the politics of the candidate were different from those that had been elected before; was it from any apprehension that the new voters would be Liberal, that the Conservative candidate did not go to the poll?—The Conservative understood that he could not carry the day.

6616. Why did he suppose that he could not carry the day; was that owing to a change of opinion, or to the increased number of voters?—To the increased number of voters, and there was also a very strong conviction upon the Irish question.

6617. But there was no disposition to abstain from coercing the voters if they had gone to a poll?—None.

6618. But looking round and seeing who the voters were, and seeing how decided their opinions were, they did not go to the poll?—They did not go to the poll.

6619. What sort of coercion was used on the Liberal side?—I heard of no coercion at all being used on the Liberal side.

6620. Who are those voters in the quarries; are are they persons that work under the persons who have leased the quarries?—They are workmen in the quarries, and they have got votes in consequence of the houses that they own.

6621. But are those who have got the quarries Liberal or Conservative?—There is a mixture; at Festiniog some of them are Liberals and some otherwise.

6622. Would not the men vote for those who employ them?—The men in the quarries are independent; much more independent than the farmers.

6623. But they are not independent of their employment, are they; they depend upon that for their livelihood?—Of course they depend upon their employment.

6624. But you do not think that any influence was used over them to induce them to vote as they would not have done?—There was an attempt, I believe, but they showed great independence.

6625. Are those people generally educated?—Their religious education is more complete than their secular education.

6626. And they regarded this as a religious question?—The Irish question they did.

6627. Was there any influence used in chapels; was there any preaching for one candidate more than another?—I never heard a word.

6628. Does it exercise much influence over the judgment of the voters if the subject is taken up in a chapel; the ministers have influence over them, have they not?—The ministers have influence, of course.

6629. And they would have it if there was the vote by ballot, would they not?—Yes, in the formation of opinion.

6630. Were the landlords generally against the Liberal side?—They were.

6631. What is the number of the constituency at Bala?—I cannot say exactly what it is now. In 1859 it was about 1,000, I believe, in the county of Merioneth. There are no boroughs in the county of Merioneth.

6632. Is it a county belonging to a few proprietors?—Mostly.

6633. Do you think that there are 1,000 voters now?—Upwards of that.

6634. Do you know what number of voters there were in 1859?—I do not remember exactly the number of voters.

6635. Has this subject of the ballot been discussed at all in Bala and in the county?—It has.

6636. And is there a desire to have the ballot?—Yes.

6637. Mr. Hunt.] Of what denomination is your chapel?—Of the Independent denomination.

6638. You spoke of the case of a chapel that was taken away from the congregation on account of the voters of some of the leading members of the congregation, where was that?—That was in Montgomeryshire.

6639. Had that chapel been used for political purposes during the election?—I never heard of it.

6640. Have you heard of any dissenting chapels in Wales being used for political meetings during the election?—Yes.

6641. In your own neighbourhood?—Yes.

6642. Was your own chapel so used?—No.

6643. What chapels were so used in your neighbourhood?—There was one at Llanuwchlyn in Merionethshire.

6644. Was that a single instance within your knowledge?—No.

6645. Was it very common?—Yes.

6646. Do you know of any in Carmarthenshire that were so used?—Yes.

6647. And in Cardiganshire?—Yes.

6648. Generally throughout Wales was it the case that chapels were used for political meetings?—Yes, and literary meetings as well.

6649. You do not know whether in this case, in Montgomeryshire, where the congregation lost their chapel, the chapel had been so used?—I believe it had not.

6652. Do you know the tenure upon which the congregation held this chapel?—Yes.

6653. What was it?—It was built upon land belonging to a certain landlord, and so much rent per year was paid for it. The congregation built the chapel.

6654. For the purpose of worship?—Yes, for the purpose of worship.

6655. Do you approve of places of religious worship being used for political meetings?—Yes, when other places cannot be found.

6656. You think that if other places cannot be found, it is a legitimate purpose to put a place of religious worship to?—Yes.

6657. Have you attended political meetings in chapels?—Yes.

6658. And spoken to resolutions there?—Yes.

6659. And do you think that a right purpose to put such a building to?—Yes.

6660. Do you know the proportion of occupying tenants on the register in Merionethshire to the freeholders?—No, I do not.

6661. Do you know anything like the proportion?—I do not.

6662. Are those two large properties which you have spoken of owned by persons of the same political opinions?—Yes.

6663. Do you know in what proportion the voters from the quarry were to the rest of the electors?—I do not.

6664. Not knowing that, how can you say that the quarrymen turned the election?—Because the increase on the register was in that particular quarter on the Liberal side.

6665. Do you know what the balance was before?—I only know from the report of the different committees.

6666. What was the report previously of the balance of electoral power?—The Conservative side had about 30 majority in 1859, and in 1865 it was about the same mark, or a little less.

6667. And how was the majority turned into a minority by the votes of the quarrymen?—They did not vote in the last election; there was no polling.

6668. But you say that there was no polling because the addition to the electoral roll, on account of the increase amongst the quarry men gave the preponderance to the other side; is that what you maintain?—Yes.

Rev. M. D. Jones.

4 June 1869.

6669. How much increase was there by reason of the addition of these quarrymen?—I do not remember the exact number, but I know there was an increase.

6670. About how many?—I believe there were 200 votes upon the roll.

6671. And all Liberals?—Yes, all Liberals; almost to a man.

6672. Do you know how many were put on the roll elsewhere?—No, I do not remember exactly.

6673. About how many should you say?—I do not remember.

6674. If you do not know the number how can you say that the addition of the quarrymen to the roll turned the election?—I say so in quoting the authority of our agent, Mr. Pugh, a solicitor from Dolgelly.

6675. You tell us that, but you cannot give us the numbers?—No; I know it is the impression through the county that that is the case.

6676. And you believe that that is the reason why the Conservative candidate did not go to the poll?—No doubt about it.

6677. Mr. Villiers.] Are the quarrymen freeholders?—No, they are leaseholders.

6678. Mr. Hunt.] With regard to those cases of evictions on account of their votes, have you gone into each case yourself?—Yes.

6679. With the tenants?—Yes.

6680. Every one?—Yes, every one.

6681. Have you any explanation from the owner of the property or his agent as to the evictions?—No, but the thing was brought before him in a certain public meeting, and he did not deny it.

6682. Where was that meeting?—It was on the hustings in Denbigh, and it was twice brought forward.

6683. But we are talking about Merionethshire?—But the thing was brought forward in a public meeting in Denbighshire, and on the hustings it was twice brought on.

6684. Did the person attacked speak?—He did.

6685. And he did not deny it?—He did not.

6686. Are all the great properties in Merionethshire owned by persons of one side in politics?—Yes.

6687. Are you acquainted with other parts of Wales?—Yes.

6688. What is done by persons on the other side of politics with regard to their tenants?—I have heard of no coercion, none whatever.

6689. The coercion is all on one side?—Yes, all on one side, as far as I know.

6690. Is there any intimidation in Wales?—I am not prepared to mention any particular cases, although I believe there are.

6691. Are there any intimidating mobs in Wales?—I am not acquainted with any.

6692. You have not heard of any?—I have read about them in the papers.

6693. Do you know anything about Carnarvonshire?—Yes.

6694. Did you hear anything about any intimidation by mobs in Carnarvonshire?—No.

6695. You never heard of any?—I heard of some row in some part of Carnarvonshire during the late election, but I have heard of no intimidation.

6696. Did those quarrymen lean together at the time of the election?—I am not aware of that.

6697. What has been your own practice with regard to addressing your congregation; have you made allusions in your sermons to political subjects?—No, never.

6698. Do you know that it is the case that other ministers have done so?—No, I do not know it.

6699. Are you prepared to say that it has not been done?—I am not prepared to say so, but as far as I know, it has not been done. My acquaintance with Wales is very great, and if it had been done I should have heard of it, I fancy.

6700. Have you heard of a meeting at Llanwenarth?—No, I have not.

6701. Were any prayer meetings held in chapels in your neighbourhood at the time of the election?—Not in connection with the election, but at the time, and every other time, we have prayer meetings every week.

6702. Were there any prayers offered for the success of particular candidates?—I never heard of it, either by the Conservatives or by the Liberals.

6703. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] With regard to those quarrymen that you have spoken of, were they all Liberals?—The Welsh generally are Liberals, but the quarrymen are not more Liberal than the farmers.

6704. But you count upon their votes as a great aid to the Liberal cause in your county?—Yes, they are more independent.

6705. Then, do you hold the opinion that the whole constituency would be Liberal were it not for the landlord influence?—Yes.

6706. Upon what ground is that; do you think that the quarrymen are better educated than the farmers, or not?—Not on that account, but they cannot be intimidated in the same way as the farmers.

6707. How do those quarrymen form their political opinions?—In the same way as the farmers.

6708. How do the farmers form their political opinions?—By means of public meetings, and reading the papers; in the same way as everyone else does.

6709. Who are generally the speakers at those public meetings which you say they attend?—Different men; laymen and preachers, and different individuals.

6710. And do Dissenting ministers take a very active part at those public meetings?—Some of them do, others do not.

6711. Do the landlords take an active part at those public meetings?—Occasionally they do.

6712. I suppose those public meetings are pretty invariably held on the Liberal side, are they not?—Yes, and some of them are on the Tory side, as well; I have heard of some landlords stumping in the last election.

6713. But only at election times?—Only at election times.

6714. The speakers at those meetings on the Liberal side are better educated, I suppose, than the persons whom they address?—It is the case everywhere in England, as well as in Wales; generally, the teacher is more intelligent than those who are taught.

6715. They teach the people who attend those meetings their particular views, of course?—Yes.

6716. Do the Liberal party hold more meetings than the Conservatives?—Yes, they do.

6717. You

6717. You would, therefore, I suppose, allow that the Liberal opinions of the electors would be in a great degree owing to the teaching of those persons who speak at political meetings?—Yes; but the Conservatives have failed to establish a Welsh paper in Wales at all; they have attempted to raise a Welsh paper, but they could not do it.

6718. I am speaking not of papers, but of meetings; you would allow that that is the case, would you not?—Yes.

6719. You do not object, do you, to any fair discussion?—No, of course not.

6720. You would not object to a landlord attending a political meeting and endeavouring to influence his tenants by the expression of his opinion?—No; I should be very glad to see him.

6721. Do you mean positively to say that the landlords have done more than that in your county?—Yes.

6722. As to the evictions which you have spoken of, were they entirely on account of political differences?—Some of the tenants were told so distinctly.

6723. By their landlords or by their agents?—By their agents, or by their agent rather.

6724. Do you know any cases in which the landlord told them so?—I do not.

6725. I suppose there have been cases where some of the members of Dissenting congregations have voted in a different way from the majority of the congregation?—Yes; that is the case in all congregations.

6726. Have you ever heard any remarks being made upon that?—Remarks, of course, I have heard; but there was no expulsion, or any attempt at coercion in any way.

6727. Do the persons still continue to attend the chapels to which they belong?—They do; and they hold the offices which they formerly held.

6728. Have you never heard of any instance to the contrary?—Not one; and I am pretty sure that there is not one in Wales.

6729. Mr. Raikes.] I think you said that all the large proprietors in Merionethshire were of the Conservative way of thinking?—Yes.

6730. Do you know the Coss-y-gedol proprietor?—Yes; but we do not consider it a leading estate.

6731. It was the old property of the Mostyn family, was it not?—Yes, formerly.

6732. Are you aware that one of the owners of the Castel-dendrach is a Liberal?—I do not know him; we have not known him as a prominent man amongst us, if he is a Liberal.

6733. I believe that the sitting Member has a considerable estate in Merioneth, has he not?—Not very great; he has a good deal of land in Merioneth.

6734. He is a Liberal, is he not?—Yes.

6735. I believe that the Nannar estate is in Liberal hands, is it not?—Yes; it was once the leading estate; but now it is divided.

6736. The Rhiwlas property is also in the hands of a Liberal, is it not?—I prefer not to speak of individuals.

6737. However, those are four properties of importance in Merionethshire that I have mentioned, which, at the present time, are not in Conservative hands?—Yes.

6739. I am not speaking of parish business; I am asking you whether you think it would be a proper thing to employ a church for a political meeting, at which political speeches should be made?—The law forbids it.

6740. I am asking you whether you consider it would be a proper thing?—Morally, if I were a churchman, I should not object to it if there was no other room.

6741. Are your views upon the subject the general views of the Dissenting ministers in Merionethshire?—Yes, but we differ a little.

6742. But, as a rule, most of them consider a chapel a proper place for a political meeting, and you think that they would not object to a church being used for a political meeting?—They would not object, but we prefer another room always, when we can get it.

6743. Have you heard anything of the report of a minister in the adjoining county of Denbigh, who said in the course of a sermon that it would be a proper thing to crucify the Conservative candidate, and make his head a football?—I heard of a raw student saying something silly on a certain occasion.

6744. It was in the course of a sermon, I believe?—No, it was not.

6745. It was in an address in a chapel?—It was in an address, I believe, delivered by this raw student, not a minister.

6746. But some one preparing for the ministry?—Yes. But he explained afterwards that he did not mean literally to crucify him, but to crucify him politically.

6747. Have you heard of an advertisement that appeared in a paper at the time of the election warning members of Dissenting congregations, that if they voted for Conservative candidates they would suffer some loss of their religious privileges in consequence?—I never heard of that.

6748. And you never saw it?—I never saw it.

6749. I think you said, just now, that the people in your part of Wales are more religiously educated than generally educated?—I mean more religiously than secularly educated.

6750. And their religious education embraces the politics of one side?—Certain questions, such as the support of religion by voluntary contribution.

6751. That is part of the religious education?—Yes.

6752. As they are not persons usually of very large general education, how would you propose to carry out any system of secret voting, if it was established there?—I should coerce the secrecy.

6753. What would be your machinery, because you are aware, I presume, that it is a difficult thing to carry out secret voting?—I have heard of a system in Australia which is working very well; I am not prepared to propose any particular plan.

6754. You have only a general idea about secret voting; you have not given much attention to the detail?—No, I have not.

6755. Are you not aware that it might be difficult to make it practicable with illiterate people?—I have seen the system worked in America, and I did not see any difficulty.

Rev. M. D. Jones.

4 June 1869.

6756. But the people are very fairly educated there, are they not?—Yes.

6757. Are the majority of the people in Merionethshire able to read and write, do you think?—I do not know about the majority; there is a great improvement compared with what the state of things used to be.

6758. Did you see the account of the ballot that was tried at Manchester the other day?—No, I did not.

6759. Are you aware that it is a frequent system in trying elections by the ballot to give the voter a card, on which he strikes out certain names?—Yes, I know that.

6760. There would be some considerable difficulty, would there not, in case the voters, generally speaking, could not read or write in carrying that out?—They can read generally, but they cannot write. Those who cannot read are exceptions in Merionethshire; they almost all can read. They are taught that in the Sunday school, but not to write.

6761. The O'Conor Don.] As to those chapels that you speak of in which political meetings were held, I understand that they are not devoted exclusively to religious purposes, but that meetings of other descriptions were held there?—Literary meetings occasionally.

6762. And with the full knowledge of the proprietors on whose estates they are?—Yes.

6763. And they have never objected to those secular meetings being held?—I never heard of any objection.

6764. Therefore, when they gave the chapels to those congregations they did not give them for exclusively religious purposes?—I never understood that.

6765. Were the chapels built by the congregations?—Yes.

6766. But the sites, I presume, were given for the purpose by the proprietors?—Yes.

6767. Are the chapels generally held as tenancies from year to year?—No. Some are so; some sites are sold out and out.

6768. In whom does the site of the chapels vest?—Trustees, generally.

6769. In those cases in which the chapels have been taken away from the congregations, in whom was the site vested as tenants?—There was no site vested at all, only tenants-at-will paying so much a year.

6770. But who was the tenant; was it the minister?—In the one chapel in Montgomeryshire the two deacons were the tenants, and they received notice to quit; in the other I was the tenant of my own chapel, and I paid the rent; at least a person paid it on my behalf.

6771. Mr. Staveley Hill.] In the case of the Montgomeryshire chapel, was it held under a deed of covenant?—No, no covenant at all.

6772. Was the land merely let for building purposes?—Yes.

6773. And do I understand that the people remained there simply as tenants-at-will, and had no deed of any sort?—None.

6774. No understood covenant even?—I do not understand that there was any understood covenant.

6775. In your own chapel have you no deed under which you built your chapel?—Then we had not. When the chapel was sold we had no deed; now we have a deed because we have purchased it.

6776. But when the land was let for you to build upon, you had no deed?—It was built upon a common then.

6777. To whom did that common belong?—To the Crown.

6778. And then the Crown sold you the land, did it?—To the landlord contiguous, and we paid, on account of our encroachment on him for the sake of letting the chapel alone, 2*s.* a year rent, and he had the right of pulling it down.

6779. Can you say distinctly whether or not, with regard to the instance which you have given of the chapel in Montgomeryshire, it was revoked on account of a political meeting having been held there?—That can be inferred.

6780. I am not asking you about what can be inferred, but can you say whether or not it was revoked in consequence of a political meeting being held there?—They received notices to quit immediately after the election.

6781. Can you say whether or not the gift was revoked in consequence of a political meeting having been held there?—I have not the saying of the landlord for it.

6782. Can you say, aye or no, was it revoked in consequence of a political meeting having been held there?—I believe that it was not.

6783. What is the reason for your belief?—It was done after the election of 1862.

6784. Was it simply because it was after the election that you believe it was on that account?—It was immediately after the election, and on account of it.

6785. Was that the only reason?—All the land about there had been sold, which belonged to the land, except that particular spot.

6786. Is that your reason?—Other individuals in the county also received notices to quit for voting.

6787. Is that your reason?—All combined.

6788. Those three reasons combined are your reason for believing that it was revoked on account of a political meeting having been held there?—Yes.

6789. You say that those quarrymen have what you call a religious education, but not much else?—Yes.

6790. Where do they get that religious education?—In the Sabbath schools.

6791. Are those schools held in chapels?—Yes.

6792. In the places where those political meetings are held?—Yes.

6793. What day of the week do you hold your religious meetings besides Sunday?—Any other day.

6794. On the same days that you might hold a political meeting, or a literary meeting?—Any day when it is convenient.

6795. So that it may so happen that you would hold a religious meeting on the same day as you would be holding a political meeting in the chapel?—It may happen.

6796. No doubt it does happen, and you take the opportunity of the people coming to the one?—It might happen.

6797. You would take the opportunity of people coming for the religious meeting to hold on that day also a political meeting?—That might happen. I do not know of an instance in which it has happened; but it might happen.

6798. Mr. Leatham.] The Independents, I believe, do not regard their chapels as sacred edifices; they are not consecrated?—They are not consecrated.

6799. They

Rev. M. D. Jones.

4 June 1869.

6799. They do not consider it necessary to remove the hat except during the time of divine worship?—No; but still we attach associations to the chapel, and we always prefer another room in which to hold public political meetings.

6800. In fact, in many places there is no large room convenient for purposes of this kind except the chapel?—There is not.

6801. In Wales, at the last election, was not it generally considered that the question before the public had more or less of a religious bearing?—It was.

6802. You were asked a question or two about the disturbances in Carnarvonshire; were they not generally attributed to intimidation by landlords and other parties?—I heard that, but I do not know much about it; I read of it in the paper, that is all.

6803. Mr. Hunt.] Should you have any objection to an agricultural meeting being held in your chapel?—If there were another room I should prefer it.

6804. But you would make no objection yourself to an agricultural society holding its meeting in your chapel if they had no other place?—If it were to serve the community I should not.

6805. Sir George Grey.] Where are the meetings for parochial purposes held in those parishes in Wales?—In the churches.

6806. Chairman.] Who has the control of the chapel generally; is it the minister?—The minister and the deacons generally; but with the Independents and the Baptists the majority of the church generally rule.

6807. But when a candidate applies for the use of a chapel for a political meeting, to whom does he make the application?—To the minister and deacons.

6808. And they can grant it?—Yes, generally they can grant it.

6809. Have you ever known any case in which the use of a chapel has been applied for by a Conservative candidate?—I never knew of a case in which there was such an application.

6810. Mr. Hunt.] Do you know a Liberal paper called the "Star of Gwent"?—No, that is in South Wales, far from me; I know the paper, but I do not take it in.

6811. Mr. Raikes.] With regard to the parish meetings which you say are held in churches, I presume you mean that they are held in vestries?—Yes.

6812. And not in the part of the church appropriated for Divine worship?—Yes, in that, too; I have been in one.

6813. Can you give the name of any place?—Llanuwchlyn, my native parish.

6814. You attended a parish meeting there in the body of the church, did you?—Yes, and in Llanycil as well.

6815. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Did you ever read any articles in the "Star of Gwent," or hear any article read on the subject of the action of the Baptist connection in Wales in the time of the elections?—I did not; that is in South Wales, some distance from me.

6816. Still it is a paper which circulates largely in Wales?—In the works in South Wales, not in North Wales.

Mr. James Spaight, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Spaight.

6817. Mr. Hunt.] You have had considerable experience in Parliamentary elections in the city of Limerick, have you not?—I have.

6818. That experience dates from 30 years ago, does it not, or even more?—Yes, it does.

6819. You are a magistrate, are you not?—Yes, a magistrate and a merchant.

6820. Did you contest the city of Limerick in 1837?—No.

6821. But are you well acquainted with the circumstances of the election of 1837?—Yes, I was engaged in it.

6822. Was Mr. Monsell one of the candidates?—Mr. Monsell was the Conservative candidate at that election in 1837.

6823. Do you know that he himself was very violently assaulted at that election?—Yes, I know that he had a very narrow escape of his life.

6824. Was it the case that one of his supporters was thrown out of the gallery?—Yes, I recollect seeing him thrown out of the gallery of the court-house into the body of the court, and very much injured.

6825. Had you anything to do with the election in 1852?—Yes, I was interested in the election, and also occupied very much throughout the day as a magistrate, mounted in charge of the cavalry.

6826. Was there any violence at that election?—There was dreadful violence throughout the whole of that afternoon.

6827. Was that by a mob?—By various mobs; in fact the lives of Mr. Russell's supporters at that election were in the greatest possible danger throughout the whole of that afternoon, and subsequently to the election the houses of many of his supporters were thoroughly wrecked.

6828. Were you engaged in the election of 1858?—I was.

6829. As a supporter of one of the present sitting members?—First as a supporter of Major Gavin, and afterwards as a candidate against Mr. Ball; Major Gavin and Mr. Ball were both Liberals, and the contest was between them.

6830. Was one candidate supported by the priests, and the other not?—The priests were divided, but Major Gavin being personally acquainted and a great favourite with most of the local gentry, I think the majority of them supported him.

6831. And you support him though you are a Conservative?—I did.

6832. He was unseated on petition, was he not?—Yes.

6833. And then you were a candidate?—He was unseated for bribery and I became a candidate.

6834. Were you elected?—I was; there was a great deal of disturbance and the usual scenes going on up to the evening before the nomination, and on that evening Mr. Ball retired, and I was nominated the next day.

6835. Then, did you stand again in 1859?—I did.

6836. And you were defeated, were you not?—Yes, I was defeated.

6837. At that election do you consider that your defeat was owing at all to intimidation and violence?—I consider that it was owing entirely to intimidation and violence, and I petitioned on these grounds.

Mr. J. Spaight.
4 June 1869.

6838. What was the result of the petition?—The result of the petition was, as well as I recollect, that the committee admitted a great amount of intimidation and violence to have existed, but that I had failed sufficiently to bring it home to the sitting Member or his agents, and both parties were left to pay their own costs.

6839. Mr. Bright.] Who were the sitting Members then?—Major Gavin and Mr. Russell.

6840. Mr. Hunt.] Did you contest the city again in 1865?—I did.

6841. Was there the same system of violence and intimidation?—Exactly the same system was carried on, and I believe owing to that system I was again defeated, but I thought it useless to petition upon the same grounds.

6842. How was that intimidation got up?—That intimidation was got up mainly by the introduction of the religious element into the contest by the inflammatory harangues of priests and others, and by the consequent excitement of mobs.

6845. And do you think that they encourage the mobs to use intimidation?—I believe they do.

6846. Do you think that they make use of their places of worship at all to influence the electors?—I have, of course, no personal knowledge, and I know and believe that they invariably make use of the collection of their congregations on the Sundays, particularly if a Sunday should intervene between the nomination and the polling to address their congregations upon that day, and also to receive the candidates and let them address them at their chapels. I believe not inside their chapels, but in their chapel yards.

6847. Is it an object with them always to get the election day fixed so that Sunday should intervene between the nomination and the poll?—They consider it of vital importance.

6848. Mr. Bright.] Does the returning officer generally make that arrangement in boroughs in Ireland, or is it confined only to Limerick?—When the returning officer is on the same side as the priesthood, they generally influence him to make those arrangements; if it should be in the opposite way, the sheriff knowing the very great use that is made of the Sunday for that purpose generally appoints it in the week days, as it was at the last election.

6849. Had they the nomination on the Saturday, and the polling on the Monday, in the cases that you speak of?—Yes.

6850. Mr. Hunt.] Mr. Murphy gave evidence before the Committee on the subject of the Limerick elections, and he was asked with reference to whether bribery was prevalent at those elections, and he says, as a rule, they scarcely know what bribery means; have you anything to say on that subject?—I am rather surprised to hear of Mr. Murphy having said so, because Mr. Murphy was the conducting agent of Mr. Ball, the petitioner, when Major Gavin was unseated for bribery.

6851. Mr. Murphy told us that the Conservatives supported the Fenian candidate at the last election for Limerick; was that the case?—No.

6852. Did any of them support him?—I have heard that some Conservatives, a very small number, did vote for Mr. Pigott, but the Conservatives as a body did not vote for Mr. Pigott.

6853. Whom did they vote for principally?—Many of the Conservatives voted for Sir Peter Tait, and very many of them on personal grounds voted for Major Gavin, who is very popular with them, though he differs on political principles.

6854. Sir Peter Tait had no connection, had he, with Fenianism?—None, whatever.

6855. But Mr. Pigott was supposed, was he not, to be a Fenian?—Mr. Pigott never appeared in Limerick; his name was put forward, but he never appeared.

6856. Sir George Grey.] Was not there a joint committee conducting the election of Sir Peter Tait and Mr. Pigott?—I do not know.

6857. Mr. Hunt.] You deny that the Conservatives, as a body, supported Mr. Pigott?—I do, most emphatically; I did not support him myself.

6858. Mr. Bright.] Did not Mr. Pigott's supporters vote for Sir Peter Tait on that occasion?—Several persons supported Mr. Pigott and Sir Peter Tait, but I think Mr. Pigott's voters altogether, were only about 180, in a constituency of 2,000.

6859. Then the coalition was only partial?—There was no coalition, as I believe.

6860. Mr. Hunt.] Was Sir Peter Tait considered a Conservative in Limerick?—There was really no information upon the point; Sir Peter Tait had not committed himself to a policy, which the Conservatives objected to; whereas the others had, and upon that ground the Conservatives preferred him.

6861. But Sir Peter Tait was not recognised as a Conservative candidate, he was not put forward by the Conservative party?—No, not at all.

6862. In fact, I believe that you were the candidate preferred by the Conservative party yourself?—Yes, I was the representative of the Conservative party; I believe, in case they considered that there was any chance for a Conservative candidate.

6863. We had some evidence from Mr. Murphy as to how far intimidation took place at the election in Limerick; what have you to say about that; was there any mob intimidation on the polling day at the last election?—Yes, there was.

6864. What time did it commence?—During the whole of the morning the town was perfectly quiet, up to about one o'clock, and during the whole of that time Sir Peter Tait continued to head the poll; about one o'clock a very remarkable change evidently took place, and there was a good deal of excitement; the cars which were going about in the conveyance of voters generally had the name of the candidates who employed ployed them pasted on the back, and I myself saw several of Tait's cars driven off the streets, and the drivers intimidated and pelted, and the placards torn off the cars, and a general system of intimidation going on, in order to have its effect upon humble people, and upon timid people, as to recording their votes.

6865. Sir George Grey.] Had you any statement made of the state of the poll at one o'clock?—Yes.

6866. What was it?—Sir Peter Tait continued in a majority up to that time.

6867. Mr. Bright.] Was it a small majority?—Yes, it was a small majority.

6868. Mr. Hunt.] Do you attribute Sir Peter Tait's opponents getting ahead at that time to the intimidation which took place?—In a great degree.

6869. It was stated by Mr. Murphy that from the rural districts round Limerick, and within the borough, the electors came up in batches, attended by their landlord and his agent; was that the case?—Not at the last election, because the landlords did not generally interfere, but at previous elections they did come up in that way of necessity.

6870. Do you believe that the electors come up in that way to protect themselves from violence?—The agent and the landlord generally accompany them with a large body of military and police, in order to protect them from violence on their way, either from the railway or from wherever they arrive to the polling places, and also escort them back in the same way.

6871. But for that you think they would have been interfered with by the mob?—No question about it.

6872. Do you think that it is entirely the result of the system of the mob intimidation that prevailed?—Yes, entirely.

6874. Is it the case at some of those elections that private houses and shops have been wrecked during the election?—Certainly; the houses of acknowledged known Conservatives and Protestants; the system is to wreck the house of some prominent supporter of the opposing party in each particular district, in order to establish a kind of reign of terror throughout the whole of that district, and show what would be the result to others following his example. My own house, in the principal street in Limerick during election times, is obliged to be barricaded altogether in front. I am obliged to close the shutters in front of my house, and the ladies of my family are obliged to live entirely in the back of the house; and even in the bed-rooms one of them has been struck by a stone thrown from the street in the hope of striking somebody so high up in the third floor. It is also right for me perhaps to name others. I could name a great many others; but the house of a man named Pardy, who was a recognised Conservative voter at one of my elections, was wrecked in the same way; and various others that I could name, if it were necessary.

Mr. J. Spaight.
4 June 1869.

6875. Sir George Grey.] Does this take place on the day of the polling?—It takes place every day during the election excitement.

6876. Do you mean from the time that the writ issues to the time the election is over?—No; I generally date the commencement of that kind of desperate excitement and intimidation from the time that the priests throw themselves actively into the contest, and inflame and excite the people by very strong appeals on religious grounds.

6877. Mr. Hunt.] Do you think it is the religious element that excites the people?—I do; I think that under any circumstances there would be excitement possibly, but the introduction of the religious element also is productive of the greatest possible mischief and danger, and violence of every kind.

6878. Was it the case that in 1865 there was an Orange placard posted in the city of Limerick?—There was.

6879. Was that done by your friends or by the other side?—It was done by the other side on purpose to make use of that feeling which I have just alluded to, and to inflame religious hatred and discord.

6880. How do you know that that was done by the other side?—Because it is notorious; it is patent now, and has been acknowledged to be a very clever trick. This was an Orange placard announcing the most ultra-Orange principles, and saying everything which was likely to irritate and offend the Roman Catholics. It never emanated from me, for I never had such feelings; and it was held up in the court-house by a very active and prominent supporter of the Liberal candidates, knowing perfectly well at the time where it came from.

6881. Do you think that if the system of secret voting were introduced, the priests would have any means of ascertaining how each of their congregation voted?—I believe that amongst the educated and independent Roman Catholics no priest will perhaps venture to inquire, but I believe at the same time that amongst the humbler class of voters there would be no secret from the priest.

6882. Do you think that there would be secresy from the landlord?—I do.

6883. Is it the case that the landlords exercise any influence in contests for the city of Limerick?—They do.

6884. Do you think that the tenants would be able to preserve secresy from their landlords and not from the priest?—I do.

Mr. J. Spaight.

4 June 1869.

tend to do away with this unfortunate state of things which exists at contests in Limerick is, if it could be arranged in any way, that no clergy of any persuasion should be allowed actively or openly to interfere as canvassers or agents or speech-makers at elections. I believe that that would take away the most dangerous element of intimidation.

6886. Do the priests confine themselves to the moral or spiritual influences which they can use, or do they sometimes apply themselves to other means of influencing the electors? — Unfortunately, the priests have been proved to have been active, not only in the organisation of mobs, but in the distribution of whiskey.

6887. Have you any evidence to show that? —I have evidence to show that, if it is necessary. There is one thing which I would beg to say to the Chairman, that I have no desire or wish to bring forward the name of any individual priest. It is the system that I object to, and, with the permission of the Committee, I would rather not bring forward the name of any particular priest.

6888. But have you in your possession orders for drink signed by Roman Catholic priests to be distributed to electors at the election?—I have; and I believe that it would be in accordance with the wishes of the respectable Roman Catholics themselves, if the priests were prevented from holding the position that they generally do in elections. These are the kind of documents that are used (producing some documents), and if the Chairman will allow me to read them without the names I would prefer it. The date of the year is not in this document; it is July the 13th; it applies to the year 1865, and the circumstances to which this refers are these: "St. Munchin's, Thursday P.M. I, on behalf of Messrs. Gavin and Russell, authorise Mr. [ ] of Thomondgate to give drink to the amount of 5 l." That is signed with the name, and afterwards "C.C.", which means Catholic curate.

6889. Have you another of the same kind?—Yes, I have another in the same handwriting. "Give So-and-so an order for 5 l," and then follows the name of the same clergyman. Then there is a memorandum from the person who supplied this drink, giving the particulars of orders to the amount of 15 l. for St. Munchin's parish, Thomondgate, Limerick.

6890. Was it drink that was supplied, or refreshment?—It merely says, election week, first order 5 l.; second order 5 l.; third order 5 l.

6891. Sir George Grey.] Who was it supplied to; was it to be given to a particular person?—Yes.

6892. Then it was to be distributed by him?—Yes; the system upon which it is done is this, that certain persons have authority to give orders in this way, and they select persons in their own immediate neighbourhood, each of whom will collect the idle, and the people who are waiting about at election times generally to get hold of those things, and he will bring them in a body to the public-house, and he will give them as much drink as they are capable of holding; and they will come out in a body, and they will flourish their sticks, and they will go in a most excited way along the streets, shouting out the name of the candidate who has given them the drink, and that going on in every district in the city, sometimes produces the most frightful state of excitement and confusion.

6893. Mr. Hunt.] Is it the case that mobs have been hired at any of the elections for Limerick?—It is invariably the case.

6894. Is it the case that the priests are concerned in paying the mobs?—It is very well known that they are, in organising and in paying them, too.

6895. When you presented the petition that you have spoken of, was it proved in that case that the money for hiring the mobs had been paid by some of the Roman Catholic clergy?—I believe it was.

6896. At the last election, did the Roman Catholic bishop take any active part in the election?—Yes; he took a very active part in going about, particularly in the latter part of the day; his carriage was continually moving about the streets, and he went to the different polling places in the course of the day; I do not know whether he went to all of them.

6897. Mr. Murphy said that the polling-day was generally very quiet, and that people know that if there is any obstruction on the polling day it may invalidate the election; you deny, do you not, that the town was quiet?—My experience is directly the contrary; the intimidation on the polling-day is what I have always dreaded most.

6898. It has been the practice to bring in some country voters the night before, has it not?—Yes.

6900. Mr. Bright.] Where were they kept during the night?—In private houses, and various places.

6901. What number of voters were so brought in, do you think, during the night?—I would say that I have known 100 voters to be brought in in that way, and disposed of in different places.

6902. Mr. Hunt.] Are those voters that are brought in in that way voters who are likely to vote against the priest's candidate?—Yes, and it is also practised on the other side.

6903. Sir George Grey.] Are they Roman Catholics that are brought in in this way?—The majority of those voters are.

6904. And they all vote with their Protestant landlord, do they?—Those farmers who are so brought in generally do; or they very often give one vote to their landlord and one to the priest.

6905. Mr. Bright.] I think you said that the same thing was practised on the other side?—Yes, it has frequently been the practice on the other side that parties of men, should go out also in the night before the election to people that they believed would vote against them, and take them out of their beds, and bring them in and keep them prisoners until they have polled; I have known that to occur.

6906. Mr. Hunt.] Do you think that if you had had the ballot, this system of intimidation would be put an end to?—I do not.

6907. Why do you think not?—Because I have no faith in its being kept a secret on one side, and that the intimidation would be used in order to make them promise, in the first instance, and afterwards to shew them what they could expect if it was found out that they had voted in any way contrary to the wishes of the mob.

6908. Do you think that the voters there are sufficiently intelligent to understand the system of ballot voting?—I do not; that is another great objection.

6909. Can they mostly write?—The younger voters of the present generation generally can, but the elderly people cannot.

6910. Supposing that they voted by putting a ball into the ballot box, they could be sufficiently intelligent to understand that, could they not?—I have known it to be productive of so much confusion, even at gentlemen's clubs, that the club which I belonged to in Limerick, in which I am on the committee, were obliged to alter the system in consequence of the continual mistakes.

6911. Do they vote openly now?—No, they vote now by written papers.

6912. You mean that so many mistakes were made when they voted by ball?—Yes.

6913. Mr. James.] Are the mobs which you have spoken of employed entirely by one side?—If the contest has been Conservative and Liberal, the mob has been invariably on one side, because the Conservatives would have no chance of opposing a mob against the unanimous feeling of the priests.

6914. Was not it an allegation on the trial of the petition that the mob was employed on the one side, because it had been employed by the other; was not that the ground of the Committee's decision that it was bonâ fide employment?—I do not recollect; I do not think that that was the ground. It is absolutely necessary to employ mobs on both sides for the canvassing, but at that time the heat has not reached so great a pitch as it does at a subsequent stage of the election, but generally the mob which is guided by the priests is so powerful, when the excitement becomes great and intense, that the other mob is obliged to disappear.

6915. Why is it necessary to employ mobs on both sides for the canvassing?—Because when the candidates go out they are followed by large mobs, and the candidates who are opposed generally to the policy of the priesthood, would be subject to very great insult, and possibly to injury, if they did not surround themselves by a certain number of paid supporters.

6916. Then, for that purpose both sides do employ mobs?—Yes, they do invairably.

6917. The O'Connor Don.] With respect to the case of hiring mobs, you stated that as a rule mobs are hired previous to the day of election by both sides?—Yes, such has been my experience.

6918. With respect to the last contest which took place in Limerick, was there a contest expected for any long time before the election?—There were a great many rumours; but there was nothing fixed until a very short time before. I think it was the Sunday before the election there was a public meeting held, and at that meeting on the Sunday before the election, I think, was the first real intimation of an actual contest.

6919. And what was the first evidence of the hiring of a mob at the last election?—The first evidence of the hiring of a mob at the last election was, I think, proved on the petition that several gentlemen who belonged to the committee of Messrs. Russell and Gavin, stated that they would be afraid to go out to canvass unless the conducting agent hired a mob to protect them.

Mr. J. Spaight. 4 June 1869.

6920. Then, the evidence is, that the first mob that was hired at the last election was hired on the Liberal side?—I do not believe that they were hired.

6921. But is it, or is it not the fact, that persons, the supporters of Messrs. Tait and Pigott, went about from Monday morning before there was any other mob in the town with a very large mob frightening and intimidating people?—There was a very large canvassing party went out, and they were followed by a very large crowd.

6922. A very large crowd, many of whom were under the influence of drink?—No; I saw them, and they were not.

6923. You would not call, first of all, the canvassing party that went out a mob?—I would call it a mob; but I believe they were not an organised and paid mob.

6924. I believe you stated that Sir Peter Tait issued no address?—I did not state that; but I believe it to be the fact.

6925. Was not there an address issued in his name?—I really cannot say.

6926. Have you not heard that an address was issued by George Francis Train?—I saw it.

6927. It was in Sir Peter Tait's interest apparently?—Yes.

6928. So that Sir Peter Tait did not come forward as the regular Conservative candidate, but as the nominee of George Francis Train?—Sir Peter Tait, I think, was brought forward by many of those who supported him as embodying what they believed to be true Liberal principles; he never stated exactly his political creed.

6929. He never issued any address stating his political creed; but there was an address issued in his name by this gentleman?—I saw an address by Mr. Train; but nobody attached an importance to Mr. Train's placards.

6930. I understood you to say that the Conservative party did not support Mr. Pigott?—Certainly not.

6931. You yourself did not vote for him?—I did not.

6932. Your brother, I believe, is an elector for Limerick?—Yes.

6933. Do you know how he voted?—I believe he voted for Tait and Pigott.

6934. Did any other influential Conservtives vote for Mr. Pigott besides your brother?—I believe they were the exception to the rule.

6935. I presume your brother is an influential Conservative in Limerick?—He is not resident in Limerick now.

6936. But he is the brother of the man who is the chosen Conservative candidate?—Yes, he is.

6937. Do not you think that his voting for Mr. Pigott made it appear that the Conservative party were in unison with Mr. Pigott?—It was perfectly well known that the Conservative party, as a party, would not support Mr. Pigott.

6938. But, at all events, the brother of the man who had been the Conservative Member did vote for Mr. Pigott?—It so happened, unfortunately, I think.

6939. That was publicly known by what I might

Mr. J. Spaight.

4 June 1869.

might call the Fenian sympathisers in Limerick?—I do not know that it was publicly known; it was known.

6940. Do you think that any use of that was made in order to induce persons who supported Mr. Pigott to support Sir Peter Tait?—I never heard of it; in fact it was rather a surprise.

6941. You say that the town was perfectly quiet on the day of the polling up to one o'clock?—Yes.

6942. But it was not perfectly quiet on the previous days I believe?—No, indeed; quite the contrary.

6943. There were two rival mobs on previous days, were there not?—Yes, there were two mobs on previous days. I believe it was on the day of nomination that Hill was killed in the street.

6944. What day was the nomination?—My memory is not good enough to tell. I think it was on the Monday.

6945. And the polling on the Wednesday?—I am not quite certain.

6946. I think I am correct in saying that the nomination was on the Tuesday, and the polling on the Thursday?—It may be so.

6947. So we have it then stated that, first of all, the body that went out canvassing was on the Monday, and that body was accompanying the supporters of Sir Peter Tait and Mr. Pigott?—Yes.

6948. Was there any mob in support of Mr. Russell and Major Gavin upon the day of the nomination?—I really cannot answer that.

6949. Are you not aware that the allegation made before the judge in trying the petition, with respect to this mob, on the side of the Liberals, was that the Liberal candidates were afraid to go out to canvass in consequence of the town being in the possession of a mob in the interests of Messrs. Tait and Pigott?—It was so stated on the petition.

6950. Do I understand you to say that you agree with Mr. Murphy, that at nearly all the elections in Limerick there has been a great deal of this mob violence?—There has.

6951. And you attribute the intimidation, you say, to a great extent, to the harangues of the priests?—Yes.

6952. You refer to the influence of the priests over the voters as being two-fold; first over the voter himself, and secondly over the non-elector, or mobsmen to frighten the voter?—Yes.

6953. Do you not think that if the ballot were established it would at least get rid of the second influence of the priests over the voter through the mob and non-electors?—I think it would modify it; I do not think it would get rid of it.

6954. Is not that the sort of thing which is at present complained of, the interference with voters by non-voters, and the influence of the priests?—Yes.

6955. You think that the ballot would modify that?—I do.

6956. You state, do you not, that although the ballot would be a protection to the voter against the landlord, it would be no protection against the priest?—Not to the same extent; I said that with regard to the humbler classes.

6957. Upon what grounds do you state that?—Upon the grounds of the extraordinary influence I know the priests to possess upon that class of the people.

6958. You think that the priest can influence the minds of those people?—Yes.

6959. And persuade them to vote for a certain man as the right course to adopt?—I think that they could persuade them to anything.

6960. Therefore they would persuade them that a certain candidate was the right candidate, and the man would vote for him; is not that so?—They would persuade them that a certain candidate was the right candidate, according to their views, and that would very much influence them to that view.

6961. They would influence the minds of the voters, and make them believe that a certain course of policy was the right one?—Yes, certainly.

6962. Do not you think it right that a voter should vote in accordance with his conviction?—Yes, in accordance with his own convictions.

6963. As I understand you, those would be the convictions of the voter after the priest had spoken to him; he would believe it to be the right course?—Possibly.

6965. If the ballot were established, there would be no risk of this violence through the non-electors, because the non-electors would not know how this man would vote, and being a Catholic, and being supposed to be Liberal, it would be supposed that he had voted Liberal, would it not?—It would.

6966. Therefore, if he voted the other way the non-electors would not interfere with him, because they would not know it?—I believe they would find it out.

6967. How would they find it out?—Through the priesthood.

6968. Do you think that if a man voted against the advice of the priest, he would afterwards come and tell the priest that he had so voted?—I think it would come to the knowledge of the priest.

6969. How could it come to the knowledge of the priest if it were a bonâ fide ballot, except the man told him?—Of course the man should tell it.

6970. And do you think that he would tell it?—I do; I believe he would not refuse.

6971. Although he would refuse to vote in accordance with the priest's advice, you believe that he would not refuse to tell him afterwards, knowing that the consequence of it would be that he might be personally injured; that is your inference?—That is so to a great degreee. Of course it is not so as a general rule, but to a great degree I believe it would be so.

6972. You believe that a man who would act contrary to the advice given him by his clergyman would afterwards, knowing that the result of his telling him would be his personal injury, would go to the clergyman and tell him?—I do not believe that they would go the clergyman, but I believe that the clergyman, if the result was different to what he anticipated, would endeavour to find out, and he would find out any instances in which those promises were not kept.

6973. He could not find out, except through the voter himself?—Yes; he might through his family, or those to whom the voter had communicated it.

6974. Do you think that a voter, having voted in that way, and who would subject himself, if known, known, to violence, would divulge it?—I think he would divulge it, perhaps, under the influence of drink, or in an unguarded moment; and those people cannot of course have that reticence that educated people have, and it would be sure to come out.

6975. Do you think that advantage would be taken of divulgence under such circumstances to punish the man?—Yes.

6976. And you think that that would be done to a very great extent?—Yes.

6977. You stated, did you not, that you did not think that the Limerick voters were intelligent enough to understand the action of the ballot?—I stated that, as regards the humbler class of voters, I thought it would be very difficult to devise any system of secret voting which would not be full of mistakes and difficulties, so far as they were concerned, that is as far as I can form an opinion.

6978. Do not you think that the people in that part of Ireland are as intelligent a class as in any other community?—Yes, I do.

6979. The ballot has been found to work satisfactorily, has it not, in other countries amongst the humbler classes?—I have stated a case in which it was found not to work satisfactorily.

6980. You refer now, do you not, to the Limerick Club?—Yes.

6981. Do you say that the people in the Club of Limerick are not able to understand the ballot?—The people in the club in Limerick, I believe to be as intelligent as in other clubs; but so many difficulties have arisen in consequence of mistakes with the black and white balls, that the committee of the club have determined to change the system, and they have changed the system.

6982. Might there not be a system of ballot which would not require those black and white balls?—If there could be a system in which there could be no mistake, then that objection would not exist; I know of none.

6983. Then your objection upon this ground is to adopting exactly the same system as was carried on in the club of Limerick, and our clubs generally?—Either to that, or having written names for the voters which they cannot read.

6984. Is there a great proportion of the voters in Limerick who cannot read or write?—There are some, I should say not a very large proportion, and they are confined chiefly to the elderly voters who have not had the advantages of the recent improvements in education and schools.

6985. You stated, I think, that it was proved in 1865 that the priests had paid for organised mobs; I suppose that that appears in evidence in some public document?—I do not quite like to say that without qnalifying it. My recollection will not go that length; but I know that the priests were engaged in the hiring and in the paying of the mobs; to my own knowledge.

6986. Are you aware that almost every contested election in Limerick has been followed by a petition?—No.

6987. There was a petition after the last election, was there not?—Yes.

6988. There was a petition after the election of 1858?—Yes.

6989. There was a petition by Major Gavin after you were returned?—There was a petition in 1859.

6990. And there was a petition against Major Gavin at the preceding election?—No; the preceding election was my election, and there was no petition then.

6991. It was the one preceding, the same year when Major Gavin was returned and unseated?—Yes.

6992. Was it proved in any of those cases that the priests had paid for organising mobs, because you stated that your belief was that it was proved in 1865 that the priests had paid for organising mobs?—The reason why I came to that conclusion was, because I knew it to be the fact, and I supposed naturally that it would be brought forward on the petition, but I cannot state it from absolute recollection of the particulars.

6993. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Is there any general desire for the ballot, as far as you know, in Limerick?—I believe there is amongst the Liberal party; they wish for it; but certainly not amongst those whose opinions I represent.

6994. On what ground do you say they wish for it?—I think chiefly for the purpose of getting rid of those frightful scenes of violence and intimidation at the nominations and during the whole period of the election.

6995. If nominations were abolished, probably there would not be that reason for the ballot?—I hope most sincerely that nominations will be abolished, because they are most frightful scenes.

6996. Do the clergy generally take an active part at Limerick in the elections?—None but the clergy that I have already described; that is to say, the parish or secular clergy of the Roman Catholics.

6997. You say that the Roman Catholic clergy do take an active part?—Yes, that portion of the Roman Catholic clergy that I have described. There is a large proportion of the Roman Catholic clergy that take no active part in it, such as the Redemptorists, the Augustinians, and the Franciscans.

6998. Did you ever know of the clergy of any other denomination taking an active part?—No, not beyond recording their votes.

6999. When you say not beyond recording your votes, what do you mean by taking an active part; do they canvass?—What I mean by that is, throwing themselves into the election by going out in bodies to canvass, by making speeches both in the streets and at their own chapels, and otherwise throwing themselves into the contest as agents generally. At the late elections, for the purpose of allowing them a place in the booths, they have been appointed by different conducting agents as personation agents; we read it in a different way, we imagine them to be appointed as intimidation agents, because their presence in the booth has a very great moral effect upon their poorer parishioners as they come in to record their votes.

7000. Do they stand upon the hustings and see the votes recorded?—They stand in the committee-rooms, and as agents they are to be seen in every movement connected with the election prominently.

7001. Does that excite the displeasure of the voters?—A very large class of the respectable and independent Roman Catholics have often expressed to me how shocked they were to see their clergy in such a position.

7002. Do you consider that that has great influence upon the mode in which the franchise is given?—Very great influence indeed.

7003. Have you ever known any instances of the

Mr. J. Spaight.
4 June 1869.

the effect of the displeasure of the priest?—I cannot say that I know particular instances, but I know that there is a very general impression that it is the threat of that personal displeasure that influences the poorer class of voters.

7004. In what way has that displeasure been shown; do you know any instances of its being shown?—I do not like to give any evidence of what I may have heard, and which I cannot substantiate, and therefore I would rather not mention any instance.

7005. But you consider that it is a notorious fact that it is so?—Yes.

7006. And you do not think that the ballot would cure that evil?—I do not; not fully.

7007. Are politics, in Limerick, always connected with religion?—Unfortunately they are almost always; politics were not connected with religion in the case of Messrs. Ball and Gavin, because they were both Roman Catholics, and both Liberals.

7008. But, as a rule, religious subjects always come into consideration, do they?—Yes, generally; in my own contest against Mr. Ball I was supported by a very large and influential class of priests, although known to be a Conservative, and by Mr. Ball being known to be a Liberal and a Roman Catholic.

7009. Are those voters that you are speaking of principally, and in fact, nearly all resident in the town of Limerick?—I think nearly one-third of the voters, perhaps not quite one-third, reside in the rural districts, which are very extensive, and which are comprised within the Parliamentary limits.

7010. Are they people with agricultural holdings, and people over whom the landlords would be supposed to have influence?—Yes.

7011. But in the town it is not so?—No; the landlords have no influence in the town, and they exercise none.

7012. In those cases where the landlords have no influence, or are supposed not to have any, which way do the tenants generally vote?—The majority of the poorer class in the town generally vote with the priests and the Liberal party.

7013. In fact, would you say that they have no politics of their own?—I would not say that.

7014. You say that they do exactly as the priests tell them?—I believe that the humbler classes are influenced to a very great degree by the priests, and by the intimidation that they would be subject to if they went in opposition to them.

7015. Assuming the ballot to exist, do you think that the priest would ask the question of the voter afterwards how he voted?—As I have stated before, I believe that the priests cannot be kept in ignorance of how the humbler members of their flocks voted.

7016. Therefore you are no advocate for the ballot at all in fact?—No.

7017. Mr. Leatham.] You stated, did you not, that in the club at Limerick the ballot had been abolished?—Yes.

7018. Do the members vote by written papers?—Yes.

7019. Do they sign those papers?—No.

7020. Then it is not known how each man votes?—No.

7021. You do not call that voting by ballot, do you?—It is a mode of balloting.

7022. At any rate this mode of voting by ballot enables you to get over the difficulties which belong to the other system?—Yes.

7023. You do not think that this mode of voting is applicable to voting for candidates at a Parliamentary election?—I think it would be an improvement upon the present system, but it is subject to a great many difficulties.

7024. You do not object, then, to votes being taken by this kind of ballot at the Parliamentary election?—No.

7025. Are you not aware that that is the kind of ballot which is practised in Australia?—I am not.

7026. Mr. Brand.] You were a candidate for Limerick in 1859, and again in 1865, were you not?—Yes.

7027. And I understand you to say that you lost your election on both occasions through the intimidation by mobs?—I believe so.

7028. Did you petition against the return in 1859?—Yes.

7029. What was the result of that petition?—The Committee told each side to pay their own costs, and they declared, although they acknowledged the existence of intimidation and violence to a certain extent, that I failed to bring it sufficiently home to the candidates or their agents for them to unseat them.

7030. In fact the sitting Members were seated?—They were.

7031. Did you petition in 1865?—No.

7032. Why not?—Because I considered the question of violence and intimidation to a certain degree legalised by the former decision of the Committee of the House; and I thought it useless to go with the same complaint again to the same tribunal.

7033. Was there any petition in 1868, last year?—Yes.

7034. What was the result of that petition?—The result of the petition was that the Members were seated.

7035. Sir George Grey.] Did the judge give his reasons for that decision?—He did, very fully.

7036. Did he admit the truth of the great disturbance and intimidation, or did he think that in that proof you had failed?—I really cannot say; I did not hear him give his judgment, and I never read it.

7037. Are the great majority of the population of the Parliamentary borough of Limerick Roman Catholics?—They are.

7038. What proportion of Protestants is there in the constituency?—I am unable to give an exact answer to that question, but I fancy that there are somewhere about 600 to 800 Protestant electors.

7039. Out of what constituency?—Two thousand, I think.

7040. I suppose that no clergy but the Roman Catholic clergy would be likely to have much influence, even if they wished to exercise it upon the lower class of the constituents?—Certainly not.

7041. You have not told us what steps were taken by the authorities in Limerick to put an end to those disturbances and to this violence, which produces so much intimidation?—The only step that I know to be taken by the authorities was what was proved upon the petition by some of the magistrates, that they suggested the hiring of a mob.

7042. To whom did they make the suggestion?—It was at one of their own committee-rooms.

7043. Then

7043. Then they were not sitting at that time as magistrates, but as members of the committee?—No, as members of the committee merely.

7045. Have the police and the military under the direction of the stipendiary magistrates taken any steps to protect the voters from the intimidation which you have spoken of generally at elections?—In the case of my election in 1859 the police, under the direction of the stipendiary magistrates, fired upon the mob and killed two of them, and wounded several in protecting the house of a person who had voted for me from being wrecked.

7048. Do you know what was the number of the police in Limerick at the last election?—I cannot say.

7049. You are a magistrate yourself, are you not?—Yes.

7050. What is the ordinary police force in the borough of Limerick?—I should say somewhere about 100, but I am not quite certain.

7051. Were any brought in from the surrounding country?—They are always drawn in in great numbers from the surrounding country.

7052. In addition to a large number of police, what number of military were there in the town at the last election?—I think the only addition to the military at the last election was a squadron of cavalry.

7053. I am not speaking of addition; but what was the number of the military actually in the town at the time of the election?—There is generally a regiment of infantry, a squadron of cavalry, and a battery of artillery; that is the usual garrison of the town.

7054. To which was added another squadron of cavalry?—Yes.

7055. And with all that military force, and with the ordinary police force, and an extra police force brought in, in large numbers, no effectual protection could be afforded to the voters?—No. My house, on Sunday evening, in 1865, was wrecked in the presence of a squadron of lancers; and absolutely the stones came over their lances.

7056. Was there a magistrate present upon that occasion?—There was.

7057. The soldiers merely looked on and saw those proceedings?—They could do nothing else; cavalry cannot go on flagged footways. The police charged upon that occasion to disperse the mob, and one man was killed.

7058. But do the cavalry patrol the streets when those disturbances are going on?—They do; but the disturbers take very good care to do their work when the cavalry are a good distance away from them.

7059. Mr. Leatham.] Will you explain the meaning of the word "wrecked"?—The meaning of the word "wrecked" is, that not a whole pane of glass is left, and that every room in the house is filled with stones of all dimensions, and the furniture and everything broken; in fact, as long as they can see anything to throw at.

7060. Did the mob go into the house?—No, except in some cases. In the case of Mr. Russell's election, in 1852, they did go into the houses, and threw the furniture out of the windows, and took the property of the trader, consisting of whiskey, and porter, and groceries, and spilt them into the street; and in the case of an apothecary, whose house I saw wrecked for voting for Mr. Russell, they took out all his physic and threw it into the Shannon. Mr. Russell was at that time a Conservative, but he has changed sides since.

7061. Mr. Hunt.] When your house was wrecked upon that occasion in the presence of the military, and in the presence of a magistrate, had the Riot Act been read?—I do not think it was read.

7062. Did anyone call upon the magistrate to read the Riot Act?—I do not think that the Riot Act was read; but the police charged with fixed swords, and one unfortunate man, who, I believe, was no rioter at all, an elderly man, who was unable to get out of their way, at the corner of the street, was run through and killed.

7063. Mr. Bright.] You stated, did you not, that on some occasions the priests are in the booths when the polling is going on?—On all occasions latterly.

7064. Are all the landowners and the agents, and gentlemen taking a great interest in the election also there?—No one has a right to be there except those to whom the law gives a professional status there; and in order to give the priests a status, they are appointed agents.

7065. Who appoints the agents?—I believe the conducting agent does it, and he returns them to the sheriff.

7066. But has the Mayor of Limerick no power over it; is he not the returning officer?—No; the sheriff, not the mayor, is the returning officer.

7067. Do any of the landowners from the neighbouring country (that is to say, the liberties as you call them), with their agents, also attend the

Mr. J. Spaight.

4 June 1869.

the polling booths?—I believe not in the capacity of agents.

7068. I am not asking that; but did you never see any of the neighbouring landowners or their agents in the polling booths whilst the polling was going on?—Yes, certainly to vote.

7069. And staying there?—No.

7070. Never?—I believe they would not be allowed.

7071. The O'Conor Don.] Do you believe that there is anyone allowed in the polling booth except voters and men actually going up to vote?—And those who are agents, who are necessary to carry on the business of voting.

7072. But no one but regular agents and voters actually going to vote are allowed in the polling booth?—I believe such is the rule; I mean inside the polling booth.

7073. Mr. Hunt.] Persons appointed on each side to look after their interests, and those only are allowed who are nominated on each side, and who enter with the permission of the returning officer?—Certainly.

7074. Mr. Bright.] Did any landowners or their agents sit in the polling booth as officials in the same way that the priests did on the other side?—Not to my knowledge.

7076. If the priest element could be taken away from Limerick, then the ballot might be a desirable system to try?—If they could be taken away from active proceedings in elections, I believe it would be a great means of making them a more orderly and correct representation of the feelings of the people.

7077. You suppose that the priest has a mode of getting out the most secret actions of their parishioners or their congregations which other persons have not?—I do.

7078. And that is the reason that you think with regard to the case of the priests, the ballot would not be an effectual screen to the voter?—Not with the humble voters.

7079. If it were a screen to the voter from the priest, possibly you would think that a great recommendation in favour of the ballot?—Yes.

7080. Sir George Grey.] With regard to those voters that you said were brought up from the country districts to vote in a body, if they were left entirely to the free exercise of their own will, how do you suppose they would vote; would it be in accordance with the will of the landlord?—I believe if they were left entirely to their own will, and if they had not made up their minds to go with the popular party, they would stay very far away from the contest altogether, and would not vote at all.

7081. Then they do not come of their own free will, but they are brought up by the landlord under an escort to vote; is that the case?—It so happens when they promised the candidates that unless the landlords or their agents, or some person in authority, meet them, and escort them through the town with a sufficient amount of military and police to protect them, they could not reach the polling booth at all.

7082. I want to know whether you think that that protection is given to them to prevent their being intimidated, or whether it is in order to prevent their voting contrary to the wishes of their landlord?—Clearly to prevent them being intimidated on their passage from the railway terminus, or wherever they arrive in the town, where the mobs have established a reign of terror.

7083. You think that if they were left entirely to their own free will, they will vote just the same?—Yes, if they could safely.

7084. But they would rather stay away altogether?—Yes, rather than risk a collision with the mob.

7085. But it is not from any fear of the priests that they would stay away; you said that they were Roman Catholics, and you said that the priest has great influence over the lower class of Roman Catholic voters; but still those being Roman Catholic voters, they still vote in most cases with their landlord, which is against the influence of the priests; do you mean that if they were left to their own free will, they would abstain from voting, in order not to offend the priest?—Yes, I think they would rather abstain from voting than offend the priest.

7086. Is it not the case that those means are taken by the landlord to secure their vote against what would be their inclination, or what they believe to be their interest if they were left to themselves?—Their inclination and their interest, I believe, would be to oblige and go with their landlords; the great majority of them care very little between the two political parties.

7087. Mr. Bright.] Is it within your knowledge that the landlords and their agents exercise a very strong pressure upon their tenantry at all the elections for Limerick?—In many cases, certainly they express their wish that their tenants should support certain candidates.

7088. But if in any case the landlord's influence is what we should call undue and illegitimate, it is your opinion that the ballot would be a security to the tenant against that, though it is not against the priest?—Yes.

7089. On the whole, your system of election at Limerick can hardly be called an advantage to the city, I should suppose?—The elections in the city of Limerick just now are a most mischievous farce, because they really are not elections; the candidates are nominated not by the electors, and it is impossible to get anything like a fair expression of opinion by the votes of the electors under the present system.

7090. You spoke against the system of nomination; do people attend the nomination in great numbers?—The mob do in great numbers, not the voters.

7091. And generally speaking, is the oratory of the candidates listened to with attention?—At the recent election at Limerick there was not a word heard on either side, and on the last of my elections there was no word heard on either side till all my friends were bodily kicked out of the court-house.

7092. Then a dissolution of Parliament is the announcement of an occurrence something like a civil war in the city of Limerick?—It is impossible to conceive anything more dreadful than the scenes at contested elections in Limerick. At the nomination-day, which I have alluded to, my friends got a gallery to themselves in order to keep from anything like personal conflict. Unable to reach them in any other way, they commenced throwing missiles first from one side, and then then from another, until the scene in the court-house was the most dreadful that it was possible to conceive; stones, bottles, and broken furniture of the court-house were as thick as hail flying from the Liberal party below to the other party in the gallery, and returned with interest, and the whole scene was the most frightful. I was dragged off the hustings myself, and my life was, I believe, saved by the exertions of the conducting agent of Mr. Gavin, the late Mr. O'Donnel, who dragged away two men who were trampling me on the floor of the court-house, and helped me up again on the hustings.

7093. Have you any opinion as to the propriety of closing drinking houses on the day of the election?—It would be the greatest possible advantage.

7095. The O'Conor Don.] Is that distributed on both sides, or only on one side?—It is distributed on all sides.

7096. With regard to those persons in the polling booths, you stated that many Roman Catholic clergyman in Limerick are appointed as agents in order that they may be within the polling booth itself?—Yes; that they may have a right to be within there at all times.

7097. Is that carried to any great extent?—To this extent, that almost in every booth there is one.

7098. Where are those polling booths put up?—They are put up at the option of the sheriff in any locality; there are eight wards in the city, and there must be a polling booth in each ward; the sheriff has the option of appointing where a polling booth shall be placed, but it must be within the ward.

7099. Is the polling booth a room in itself, or is it merely a division of a room?—It is generally a small room.

7100. Opening on the public highway, or into other rooms?—Opening on the public highway.

7101. You stated, did you, that landlords or their agents would not be allowed into this polling room or booth, except they were agents?—I stated that I believe that such is the rule; that anyone could call upon the sheriff to put out a person who was not authorised to act officially for either of the candidates.

7102. Have you ever seen them standing at the door of those polling booths?—I have not.

7103. Mr. Bright.] In speaking of the sheriff, is the city of Limerick a county?—Yes.

7104. And so the sheriff takes the command, and not the mayor?—Yes; it is a county of a city.

7105. The O'Conor Don.] Is there a separate sheriff for the city of Limerick?—Yes, there is.

7106. Sir George Grey.] Does this excitement subside rapidly after the election is over; do parties live on good terms with each other in the interval between one election and the other?—They do after a certain time. There is a great deal of bitterness, and a great deal of bad feeling exists for a certain time, but it generally subsides until it is evoked again by another contest.

7107. Is there any exclusive dealing between the different parties?—No; happily there is none that I have heard of.

7108. You say that there was a petition against the last election, and that was heard in the city of Limerick itself, was it not?—Yes.

7109. Was there any intimidation exercised towards witnesses coming to give evidence in support of that petition?—Yes, a complaint was made to the judge of one of them being assaulted, and I have heard a principal witness say that he dared not go there at all; he dared not show his face there.

7110. Was there anything like the same kind of intimidation which you described as exercised at the time of the election; were there any mobs?—No, there was no danger of such intimidation.

7111. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Who is the returning officer of the city of Limerick; is it the sheriff of the city or of the county?—It is the sheriff of the county of the city.

7112. Mr. Brand.] Did the priests receive any pay for their services in the polling booths?—I cannot say, but I believe not.

7113. Chairman.] Mr. Murphy stated, in answer to a question from me, that, as regards voters in rural districts, it was a perfect struggle between the landlord and the priest as to which should get the vote; do you agree with that?—Yes.

7114. Do you think that the voter votes according to his own inclinations?—I think if his own inclinations were consulted, he would not trouble himself to vote at all in most cases.

7115. When he does give his vote he gives it either because his landlord wishes it, or because his priest wishes it?—Generally, in many cases.

7116. The O'Conor Don.] You, I think, say that you do not believe that, as a rule, rural voters have strong political opinions of their own, or any political opinion of their own?—I believe they have, to a certain extent, but not as between the two parties that are generally opposing. I believe that their feelings now are of a different kind altogether; what they call national feelings.

7117. Chairman.] When there is any religious question under discussion do you think it probable that a large Roman Catholic majority would vote for a Protestant candidate rather than for a Catholic candidate, if they could vote quite freely?—I believe that religious feeling has a very great effect upon them in directing their votes.

7118. Sir Peter Tait polled a considerable minority, did he not?—He did, I think, within 70 or 80 of the lowest successful candidate.

7119. Do you not think that that minority, so far as it was composed of Roman Catholic votes, must have been considerably owing to the influence of landlords?—Sir Peter Tait occupied a very peculiar position. I believe that a very great many Roman Catholics voted for Sir Peter Tait, under the impression that he would vote in religious matters in accordance with their views, and their opponents were under the other impression; he never gave any signification himself of how he would vote.

7120. You stated that on the day of the polling there was a great deal of rioting and violence about one o'clock; do you think that that had an influence influence on the election?—Yes, I am sure it had.

Mr. J. Spaight.

4 June 1869.

7121. Do you know any voters who were actually prevented from polling by the violence which prevailed?—I know of a voter who was one of a party who had come from the rural district, and after he had voted, and was in a house taking some refreshment, the mob rushed into the house and beat him to that extent, that I thought his life was endangered, and I know that that had a very great effect amongst all who were aware of it, in deterring others from coming under the same treatment; that man's name was Coffey.

7122. Could you, if it were necessary, name individuals who, to your own knowledge, were prevented from polling?—No.

7123. Could not the voters be better brought up to the poll by military protection?—I have seen a large force of military and police totally unable to bring up voters to the poll.

7124. Were they unable on the last occasion?—On the last occasion I did not see the military employed at all.

7125. Still you believe that voters were actually prevented from polling by fear?—Yes.

7126. You think that if you had the ballot, the priests would still know how a great number of their parishioners voted?—Yes.

7127. And what use do you think they would make of that knowledge?—I cannot pretend to say what use they would make of it, but I think that it would come to their knowledge, and that that would certainly have a very great influence upon the voters, and would subject them perhaps to odium, and possibly to violence and intimidation.

7128. Do you think that they would denounce them to their congregation?—I would be sorry to go so far as that, but I believe that it would become known, and that they would become sufferers.

7129. Do you think that the priests would then publish the knowledge that they had obtained?—I do not say publish; I say that I think it would become known, and that they would suffer in some degree from such knowledge.

7130. If the priest obtains the knowledge, and it becomes known, the priest must publish it, must he not?—I think there is a distinction between publishing it and stating it. I do not know that he would state it publicly.

7131. But he would tell somebody else, you think?—It would be divulged and become known.

7132. And it would be divulged by the priest?—Of course.

7133. Did you take much part in the last election?—No.

7134. Were you in Limerick whilst it was going on?—I was in Limerick, but I took no part in it beyond voting.

7135. You stated, I think, that you did not know whether Sir Peter Tait and Mr. Pigott had a joint committee?—I do not know whether they had or not.

7136. Were you not aware of everything that went on on the Conservative side?—Nothing went on on the Conservative side.

7137. You do not recognise Sir Peter Tait as the Conservative candidate?—No.

7138. You are not aware whether they had a joint committee or not?—No; there are gentlemen here who will be able to give the Committee full information upon that point.

MR. JOHN ELLARD, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Ellard.

7139. Mr. Hunt.] You are a Solicitor residing in Limerick?—Yes.

7140. And you are the town clerk, are you not?—Yes.

7141. Have you known all about the municipal and Parliamentary elections, in Limerick, for some time?—Yes.

7142. You have heard Mr. Spaight's evidence as to the intimidation that is used by the mob at the time of election in Limerick; do you agree with his evidence in the main?—Yes; the mobs exercise considerable influence.

7143. Do you agree with his evidence upon the subject of intimidation?—There were some parts of his evidence which I could not catch well.

7144. Did you hear him describe the way in which his own house was attacked?—I did, and I saw it; I was present that evening; his residence is near to mine.

7145. Did violence and intimidation take place at the Parliamentary elections, previous to 1865?—Yes; I recollect Mr. Russell's election in 1852, and the violence was very great.

7146. Was there a petition in the case of the last election?—There was.

7147. Did Sir Peter Tait petition?—No, not Sir Peter Tait; I think six or seven of the electors petitioned against the sitting Members.

7148. Was evidence given of violence in that petition?—The charges were bribery and treating; they did not go into violence.

7149. Sir George Grey.] Did not they charge intimidation in the petition?—No; as well as I recollect, there was no intimidation charged.

7150. Mr. Hunt.] But bribery and treating were charged, and the petition was unsuccessful, was it not?—Yes, unsuccessful so far as bribery; there were merely bribery costs given; as to the general costs, each party paid their own costs.

7151. At the last election was there a mob going about at the time of the polling?—I could not say that, for I was the conducting agent, and I was obliged to be in my own house, where parties were continually calling; I was scarcely out during the day.

7152. Who were you conducting agent for?—I was conducting agent for Sir Peter Tait, and also for Mr. Pigott.

7153. Had you any official position with reference to the election; how were you able to be conducting agent, being town clerk?—It does not interfere with the town clerkship. Mr. Murphy, who was town clerk also, has been conducting agent during the same time.

7154. Then the town clerk has no official position in reference to the election?—No, none whatever.

7155. Sir George Grey.] Does not the town clerk advise the magistrates as to various matters upon certain occasions?—No.

7156. Is he the servant of the magistrates?—No, it is the magistrates' clerk that advises them, the clerk of the petty sessions; and that is a different office.

7157. Mr. Hunt.] Was it the case that the under under sheriff had stones thrown at him at the election?—He told me so, that when he was coming through the Irishtown from one of the booths, stones were thrown at him.

7158. Is it your opinion that there is any freedom of election at Limerick under the present system?—I think the present system of voting is such that there could not be a really free election in Limerick; a great many are induced to vote, perhaps, in a way that they would not, in order not to create animosity towards themselves.

7159. Mr. Bright.] By what means and what forces?—A great number do not wish to be displeasing the Roman Catholic clergyman; they do not wish, and their families do not wish, to have him hostile to them.

7160. Are there any other forces of compulsion besides those of the priests?—Yes; of course in the rural districts, that is, what we call the liberties, there are the landlord and the agent.

7161. Mr. Hunt.] Was it established on the trial of the petition that some of the magistrates had been parties to hiring mobs?—There were some magistrates examined, and they stated that in Mr. Murphy's office, when they saw the canvassing party go with Sir Peter Tait and Mr. Pigott, they felt that there would be no safety for them unless there were persons hired to protect them, and Mr. Russell's clerk, Mr. Brown, was sent for, and he was directed to get parties to protect them. The party whom they were pleased to call a mob were respectable electors, a large number of whom had met for the purpose of going out in the canvass, and they were merely going to the electors to canvass. Of course a great many persons attended, out of curiosity, after them, but there was no mob. I was present, but I did not see any mob whatever.

7162. Did the Conservative landlords take any part in the recent election?—No, not as a body they did not; some of them voted, but not generally. There were some tenants of some Conservative landlords who did not vote at all; I refer to the tenants of Archdeacon Gould, and the tenants, I think, of Captain Rose and others. The contest sprung up so unexpectedly and so suddenly, that there were not preparations made even for a canvass.

7163. Was it considered that it was a contest between Conservatives and Liberals?—On Major Gavin's side and Mr. Russell's it might be thought that Sir Peter Tait was a Conservative, and that all who were supporting him were Conservatives, but beyond that there was nothing in it.

7164. He was put forward by the Conservative party, was he not?—No, not at all.

7165. Sir George Grey.] Did he not put out any address?—No, he did not.

7166. Nor Mr. Pigott?—No. If I may be allowed to mention, Sir Peter Tait did intend to come forward as a candidate for Limerick; and about, I should say, three weeks or more prior to the election, from the circumstance of his business engaging him, he gave up the intention altogether, and communicated with me, and all preparations then ceased.

7167. Had he announced himself as a candidate before then?—No, he had not; it was generally understood he would be, and he wrote a letter stating his intention of not coming forward.

7168. Upon what political principles was it understood that he was to contest the city of Limeric before he determined not to come forward?—I understood on Liberal principles.

7169. Mr. Bright.] Do you call yourself a Liberal?—I do.

7170. Did you support Major Gavin and Mr. Russell before?—I voted for Major Gavin and Mr. Russell.

7171. At this last election?—No, not at this last election. I did not vote at all at the last election; being conducting agent I could not, under a penalty, vote.

7172. Mr. Hunt.] Sir Peter Tait was a gentleman who had been mayor of Limerick, and he was a great employer of labour there, was he not?—Yes, and a most popular man.

7173. He thought he had a claim upon his fellow townsmen, without reference to his particular political principles?—I should say that he thought so; he was generally so popular; in fact, everyone was speaking about having him as Member, he was so energetic and active.

7174. Was not he taken up more on personal grounds than on political grounds?—Yes, a great many supported him on personal grounds.

7175. Are you able to tell us what kind of influence the priests use at elections in Limerick?—There are generally meetings held in the evening prior to the election at committee-rooms, and there is a large crowd, a mob of the working classes (I do not use that word offensively), and they assemble outside, and the priests address them and use very strong language.

7176. Do they ever use any threats as to what will happen to them in a future world if they vote contrary to their priests' wishes?—I have never heard anything of that kind as to the world to come, but I have heard them say that they ought to vote for their religion, and vote for their country and for their God, in that way.

7177. They put it on the ground of duty to their God to vote in one particular way?—Yes, that they were bound to vote according to their conscience, which meant voting for the Liberal party.

7178. Do they say that in their chapels?—The chapel which I frequent is one of the regulars, and they do not address them from the altar at all with reference to politics.

7179. But do the secular clergy make use of their positions in their chapels to intimate how the voters should vote?—I have heard so; but I was not present myself. I do not reside near to the parish chapel.

7180. Do you agree with Mr. Spaight, that if the system of secret voting were adopted, the priests still would find out how those members of their congregation voted?—I do not agree with him; I think it would be the greatest public advantage possible for Limerick, if a proper ballot system were adopted.

7181. Do you think that you would be able to maintain secrecy as against the priests?—I do. Elections are looked at in Limerick as bringing so much animosity, and such bad feeling between parties, that even the better classes have really a horror of it when they hear of any probable dissolution of Parliament.

7182. Do you think that people would vote very differently if they voted under a system of secret voting?—I think, of course, that some would. I have heard it stated in Limerick very lately, there were some Conservatives, perhaps, who who would not vote for the Conservative side if there were vote by ballot; and, I believe, some parties who profess liberality would vote in the same way, but, I think, under the ballot system the free voice of the people would be exercised. I say, provided it be a proper ballot, as I understand the Victoria ballot to be; but if it were the American system, I think it would be just as bad, if not worse, perhaps, than open voting.

Mr. J. Ellard.

7183. With regard to the damages done at elections in Limerick, there have been presentments made at the assizes, have there not?—Yes; the mobs attack the houses, and wreck them, and in some instances they destroy all the goods that will be in them, and then at the following assizes there is a presentment, and the parties make their claim to have a presentment, in order to compensate them.

7184. Was it the case that at the summer assizes of 1858, 27 l. was presented? — Yes, about that sum.

7186. At the spring assizes of 1866 over 500 l.?—Yes, there was over 500 l.

7187. And at the spring assizes of 1869, 88 l.?—Yes, something about that. It was a very large sum at the time of Mr. Russell's election in 1852, for there was immense damage done at that time.

7188. Do you know what was the presentment then?—No, I do not remember.

7189. What was the cause of the very large sum that was presented in 1866; what was the damage done that that was to pay for?—I think there was an election in 1865, Mr. Spaight's election, and I think there was also a municipal election; but a large amount was for the Parliamentary election.

7190. Do you know how the damage was done?—Yes, by the mobs. Stones are thrown at the windows of parties; and where they have shops, the shutters are dragged down, and then they get into the shop and they throw everything about, and gut the place. I have known one instance of a man who happened to have been living in Boherbee in the year 1852; his leases happened to have been in a box, and they were torn to pieces, and thrown out into the street.

7191. Sir George Grey.] Whom were those damages paid by?—The amount is levied upon the city, under what is called the General Purposes, or Grand Jury Rate.

7193. But are the contests political contests at the municipal elections?—Generally they have been, but the Liberal party nearly have it all their own way, so that latterly there have not been many contests at all.

7194. Do the Roman Catholic clergy take part in them in any similar manner to what they do in Parliamentary elections?—In some of them they take an interest.

7195. Do you see a remedy in vote by ballot, as applied to municipal elections, to cure the evil, as well as the Parliamentary elections?—Yes.

7196. What is the feeling as to the ballot in the constituency; has it been the subject of consideration?—Yes; in Limerick, I think, the majority of the people would be greatly pleased with the ballot.

7197. Does that answer, as far as you know, apply to both sides in politics, or only to one side?—I think that the Conservative party would be anxious for the ballot, if they could get over the idea that the confessional would be used to divulge the mode in which a man voted.

7198. Whatever idea may obtain upon the probability of getting over the confessional, you think that, on the whole, they would approve of the ballot?—No; I have been speaking to some of them, and it appeared to have a very strong hold upon their minds that through the confessional the priests would be likely to become acquainted with the way that the party voted, and that that would influence the party in giving his vote, knowing that afterwards it would be known how he voted.

7199. Mr. Bright.] Are you of that opinion?—No, I am not; certainly not.

7200. Mr. James.] You think that the priests would not by means of the confessional arrive at the knowledge?—I know that it would be contrary to their duty if they were to attempt it.

7201. The O'Conor Don.] Did you ever hear a Roman Catholic object to the adoption of the ballot, through fear that if the ballot were adopted he would be at the mercy of the priest?—No, I cannot bring to my mind that I ever did.

7202. You never heard any objection raised by any one who knew anything about the confessional?—Certainly not.

7203. At the last election you were conducting agent for Sir Peter Tait, were you not?—Yes.

7204. And also for Mr. Pigott?—Yes.

7205. Had they a joint committee then?—No, there was no committee. The election sprung up in a very peculiar manner. There was intended to be no contest. There was a paper published in Cork, which was brought down to Limerick for circulation; that paper had a correspondent from Limerick, and that correspondent used very strong and most insulting language to any one that was at all supposed to be friendly to Sir Peter Tait. That created a very strong feeling amongst the friends of Sir Peter Tait against those parties who had spoken and written in that manner, and that urged them on. They were determined then that they would not be defeated. They considered that it was an unpleasant thing that Sir Peter Tait did not come forward, and that they should afterwards be grossly insulted when there was to be no contest, disgusted them very much indeed. I was not at Limerick at the time; I was attending a fishery inquiry at Ennis. They met, and came to the conclusion to put forward Sir Peter Tait without asking him at all, and then Mr. Pigott, I believe, by some of the parties, was also named in that way; and I received a communication from the gentleman who was acting as chairman of that meeting, requesting to know whether I would act, and stating, with regard to fees, that he would be responsible to me.

7206. Mr. Bright.] Who was the chairman of that meeting?—Mr. Kelly.

7207. The O'Conor Don.] At that meeting both these gentlemen were put forward, were they not, as candidates?—That meeting took place on the Friday and the election was to take place on the following Tuesday. I was in Limerick that day. I did not know of it exactly at the time, when I saw them it was about half-past five. There was no idea that a contest would really go on until Sunday evening.

7208. Had you on former occasions always voted on the Liberal side?—Yes, I voted for Mr. Russell in 1852, when it was supposed that he was a Conservative, just in the same way as perhaps now, I am called a Conservative, although I voted for Mr. Russell then, and I voted for him afterwards.

7209. Did you vote for Mr. Spaight at his election?—I never voted for Mr. Spaight.

7210. I understand that you are town clerk of Limerick; do you know anything about the municipal elections in Limerick?—Yes.

7211. Do you agree with Mr. Murphy in the evidence which he gave here, that up to the year 1865 those elections were on the whole pure?—No, I cannot say if he stated that; I have not read Mr. Murphy's evidence.

7212. Do you believe that at the municipal election of 1865 a great deal of bribery took place?—I was not in Limerick at that election. I was over here at the time; I merely returned to Limerick the day or two before it, and I did not know what was going on in Limerick.

7213. As a general rule, is there much bribery or intimidation at the municipal elections in Limerick?—I have heard it stated that, in some instances, to qualify parties their taxes have been paid for them or advanced by the party who was seeking for their support, but I do not know it of my own knowledge.

7214. You are not aware of any extensive bribery on any occasion of a municipal election?—No, I am not.

7215. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Have the voters in Limerick generally any politics in the English acceptation of the term?—They have more Irish politics than English.

7216. If they had the ballot, how do you think they would vote; would they vote with the landlord or with the priest?—I think in the rural districts they would vote with the priest; the people in the city are rather an intelligent class, and I think that they would look somewhat to the local interests of the city.

7217. Then, where they are an intelligent class they would not vote with the priest?—No, I would not say that.

7218. You say that their principal politics, if I rightly understood you before, are national politics?—I think with the humbler class that is so.

7219. What do you mean by national politics?—The Repeal of the Union and questions of that kind.

7220. Anything more?—Of course there is some of the Fenian element.

7221. The landlords are not in favour of that, I suppose?—No, very much against it.

7222. Are the priests?—I am not an exponent of the priests' principles.

7223. You say that the general wish of the people would be for national politics?—Yes, the priests are for national politics.

7224. Therefore the priests and the people in these matters are in accord?—They are, except those who are of the Fenian principles, and they do not at all accord with the clergymen.

7225. Do I understand you to say that the priests are for the Repeal of the Union?—Yes, I should say so.

7226. Are they not for anything more besides the Repeal of the Union, because that is only one public measure?—Of course they are for tenant right and denominational education.

7227. Sir George Grey.] I understand you that you acted at the last election entirely professionally as an agent?—Yes.

7228. As a paid agent?—I was not paid, because I would not take payment.

7229. But you were retained as a professional agent?—Yes.

7230. You did not take any other part in the election than as a professional agent?—No, I was conducting agent; I did not vote.

7231. Mr. Bright.] Mr. Spaight told the Committee that at the last election the town was tranquil until about one o'clock, and that afterwards it became very much disturbed; do you confirm that statement?—The conducting agent is generally obliged to be more in his own office for parties to call on, so that I had not an opportunity of seeing the state of the town.

7232. Have you observed at the commencement of the state of the poll at various times in the day, more especially when the poll was running near, that the excitement has been increasd by those statements?—Considerably increased; that has been my experience at former elections.

7233. Therefore you think that if the poll went on, and the state of it was unknown to the public until it was announced by the returning officer at the conclusion of the election, that would tend to the peace of the town?—I consider very much so, because if the poll be at all a close one I have seen the excitement become very great; and on the occasion, in 1852, when Mr. Russell was returned, I think it was either by a majority of four or eight, (and he was then the unpopular candidate), the excitement became intense, and it was then that the houses were wrecked.

Mr. J. Ellard.

that was done with the object of intimidating me at the time from going forward with the petition which was pending, and also to show others that if they differed from him, they would be subjected to unpleasant consequences. At the same time, I know that that proceeding was not approved of by other clergymen.

7236. In the Roman Catholic Church as in other churches, I presume there are hot-headed injudicious persons?—Yes, I am sorry to say there are in the Roman Catholic Church.

7237. With regard to influence other than that of the priests, is it generally conceded, or is it your opinion, that the ballot would be an effective security?—I think it would. I think it right to observe, that in the city of Limerick I do not think that the landlords have much influence; it is only in the rural districts in connection with the borough.

7238. Speaking as a Roman Catholic, you think that the ballot would be a security from undue influence on the part of the priest?—I do, if it be as I say, a proper ballot, such as I understand the Victoria one to be; but I would have a different opinion if parties were allowed to be declaring as they were going in, or as they were going out, who they voted for; that would be most objectionable.

7239. You stated that the tenants of some landowners did not vote? — Yes; I think Archdeacon Gould's tenants did not.

7240. Will you explain, if you can, the reason why the tenants of certain landowners did not come in to vote?—I think I stated, in reference to a question that was put to me, that I did not know that the landlords had acted at the election generally.

7241. With reference to the case of Archdeacon Gould, or any other landlord that you are acquainted with, how can you explain that those tenants did not vote, if the priests were so anxious to get all that they could?—I think Archdeacon Gould is considered by his tenants to be a first-class landlord, and they did not like, perhaps, to vote; they might vote in a way that would displease him.

7242. Do you think they made a compromise by remaining neutral?—I should say so, but I had not an opportunity at the time of communicating with them.

7243. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Archdeacon Gould's property is his own property, is it not?—Yes.

7244. It is no property held in connexion with the Church?—No, none whatever.

7245. Mr. Bright.] Mr. Spaight expressed a strong opinion with reference to nominations; I do not know whether you heard him; do you agree with him that it would be desirable to put an end to the practice of holding public nominations of candidates?—Yes; I think it would be a great advantage, and of the declaration I would say the same.

7249. You abstained from preferring charges of intimidation from the difficulty of getting evidence of such notorious facts, as of rioting and intimidation, as those which Mr. Spaight has informed the Committee of at the last election?—Yes; counsel thought our case was proved without troubling the court with further evidence.

7250. Mr. Bright.] Was not the real reason that there was no charge of intimidation preferred, because intimidation was probable on both sides?—Intimidation was charged under the head or title of undue influence. The judge gave what he called bribery costs, but not any other general costs.

7251. Mr. Bright.] Can you tell me who paid the expenses of Sir Peter Tait and Mr. Pigott at the last election?—There were subsciptions made up; I had nothing to do with the money part of it. There was one gentleman sent me a subscription of 200 l. towards the expenses; I had not occasion to use it.

7252. Did Sir Peter Tait pay any portion of the expenses?—No; I have not got any portion from him.

7253. Did Mr. Pigott pay any portion of the expenses?—No, he did not.

7254. Who paid the expenses of the petition?—I myself paid the fees, but I presume Sir Peter Tait will pay me; I think it right to say that I merely charged the expenses out of pocket; I think he was very badly treated.

7255. The O'Conor Don.] Was not the defence to your petition a charge of intimidation against your side at the last election; did not the sitting Members' defence charge mob intimidation used against them?—Yes, they did; it was on that occasion that the magistrates proved that in Mr. Murphy's office; they sent for Mr. Russell's conducting clerk, and directed him to employ men.

7256. You charged them with treating in your petition, and their defence was that mob intimidation was used against them, and they were obliged to hire and treat a mob to protect them?—Yes, they gave that evidence.

7257. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] With reference to one answer which you gave as to the possibility of secret voting in a country where the Roman Catholic priests have such influence as they have in Ireland, you appear to think that a man, supposing the ballot was in existence, might keep his vote secret from the priest in spite of the confessional?—Yes, I am speaking as a Roman Catholic; and I know that a clergyman would be acting outside his duty to ask such a question, and that if he did, it would be the duty of the penitent, if he were to go outside certain limits, almost to make a complaint of it.

7259. As a Roman Catholic, you consider that it would not be the duty of the party confessing to confess a wrong action of a nature such as voting against a particular candidate would be?—No; but if he does anything contrary to his conscience, it would be necessary for him to tell it. Protestants generally have been under the impression the confessional can be used for any purpose of the priest; but if it really were so, I think it would do more to bring the Roman Catholic religion into disrepute than anything that could be done; because if the faith of the people of Ireland could be shaken in the confessional it would be a great blow to the Roman Catholic religion.

7260. Chairman.] You think that even if the priest extorted from the voter in the confessional the way he had voted he never would divulge it?—It would be quite contrary to his obligations.

7261. If you had had the ballot at the last election do you think that it would have protected you from the annoyances that you suffered?—If we had had the ballot at the last election I am convinced that Sir Peter Tait would have been returned at the head of the poll.

7262. It would not have protected you personally from the annoyances under which you have suffered?—I do not think it would have subjected me to them.

7263. Would it have protected you?—Yes, I think it would, because the circumstances would not have been known. I did not vote at all.

7264. But you were the agent for Sir Peter Tait; under the ballot Sir Peter Tait must have had an agent, I suppose?—But I was for the two, and they were appointed by a committee, or by a meeting rather, there was no committee.

7265. I presume that a candidate who was obnoxious to certain persons must have had an agent under any circumstances?—Yes; Mr. Murphy was agent for Mr. Russell, and Mr. O'Donnell was agent for Major Gavin.

7266. You were agent for Messrs. Tait and Pigott?—Yes.

7267. And for that you were publicly abused by the Roman Catholic priest?—Yes, I was.

7268. The ballot would not have protected you?—Of course, they would have known that I was the agent; but the time would have gone by, and matters would have cooled down; but it was in reference, I think, to the petition, the occurrence on the 1st of January. The polling-day of the election was the 19th of November, and it was on the 1st of January, when the priest came to the town hall where I was discharging my duty.

7269. You think that if you had the ballot you would not have been abused?—I do not think I would; because I think if the election were over, and the result known, that would end the matter.

7270. Do you think that if you had the ballot mobs would be employed as they are now?—No, I do not think that they would; there would be speech making, and I think there would be a great deal of meeting beforehand.

7271. And some excitement, probably?—Yes, some excitement in that way.

7272. But not organised mobs deliberately employed for the purpose of intimidating voters?—No.

7273. Mr. Graves.] Is it usual to allow a Sunday to intervene between the nomination and the day of polling?—Yes; the clergymen are very anxious for it, and the parties who are unpopular are always anxious to have the day of nomination as far towards the end of the week away from the Sunday as they can.

7274. Do you consider that the fact of allowing the Sunday to intervene, tends at all to excitement, seeing that it is used for electioneering purposes?—I do; Sunday being a leisure day, in the evening they will assemble. In the case of Mr. Spaight's house, it was on the Sunday evening that the mob came up the town and did the mischief. Bands were at that time in Limerick, and they used to assemble people; they commenced to play through the street, and a crowd would gather.

7275. Would you consider it an improvement upon the present system if the Sunday was not allowed to intervene between the day of nomination and the day of polling?—Yes, I think it would.

THE RIGHT HON. THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. WILLIAM ELLISON OTTO, called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. E. Otto. 8 June 1869.

7276. Mr. Hunt.] ARE you Factor to the Marquis of Lothian?—Yes, in Roxburghshire and Mid-Lothian.

7277. Have you had your attention called to some evidence reported in the "Scotsman" newspaper with regard to intimidation in Roxburghshire?—Yes; Mr. Russell's evidence about Roxburghshire was brought to my attention, being published in the "Scotsman."

7279. Who is it understood to be?—Mr. Scott, of Timpendean Farm.

7280. And his landlord, I believe, is the Marquis of Lothian?—Yes.

7281. It is perfectly notorious that that is the case which is alluded to?—Yes, perfectly notorious.

7282. Are you the factor for the Marquis of Lothian for that part of the estate in which his farm is situated?—I am.

7284. Does William Scott manage the farm of Timpendean?—Yes, and resides there.

7285. So that William Scott made application for the renewal of the lease of his farm before it expired?—In the summer of 1868 he made application to me at the rent-day as to what was to be done about his farm, and afterwards, in September 1868, he wrote to me, requesting me to look over the farm, as there was a long autumn for improvements, taking it for granted that he would get a renewal of his lease.

7286. Did you reply to that letter, or did you see him?—I saw him, and verbally stated to him that I would bring the matter under Lord Lothian's consideration.

7287. Did you bring the matter to Lord Lothian's

Lothian's notice?—I did so during the summer, when he was at Penielheugh, in 1868, and he merely requested me, as usual, to send in a report upon the state of the farm.

7288. Was it the Marquis's practice, when a lease was about to fall in, for you to make a report upon the state of the farm to him?—Invariably.

7289. And his Lordship requested you to do as you would do ordinarily, namely, to make a report upon the state of the farm and the state of the buildings, and so on?—Yes, upon the state of the buildings as they appeared before me, and what improvements were required, without entering into any details as to whether the tenant was to get a renewal or not.

7291. That was before there was any question about the election pending, was it not?—Yes, during August and September 1868.

7292. Had you any communication with Mr. Scott after you had seen Lord Lothian on the subject, and did you tell him your instructions?—I told him my instructions on the subject, and he twice asked me to fix a day to go over the farm and inspect it.

7293. Did you fix a day eventually to go over the farm?—Yes; in the end of October 1868; I did at last fix a day. I went over the farm and inspected it as to the state of cultivation, and what repairs were necessary, and the drainage, and generally, so as to get sufficient details to make my report. I had never before examined the houses or the buildings upon the farm, and several fields I had never been on.

7296. Did you see Mr. Scott?—I saw him a few days afterwards; I met him in the street one market-day, and said to him, "I was just about to write to you, but I may as well now take the opportunity of informing you that, before his Lordship left for London, I had his instructions with regard to your farm of Timpendean, and he requested me to intimate to you that it was not his intention to renew the lease at its expiry."

7298. Did you afterwards have a letter from Mr. Scott?—Two or three weeks after the election I had a letter from him.

7299. Have you got that letter here?—I have; it was dated the 11th of December 1868.

7301. Did you reply to that letter?—I met him the next day or so, and I said to him, that really I could not be responsible for the reports that people circulated about the country, and would certainly not write to the papers contradicting them; but that if he sent any person to me, I was quite willing to inform him that he had not pledged himself to me to remain neutral, and that I did not consider that he had broken any pledge whatever.

7302. The honourable Member for Bedford put this question to Mr. Russell: "With regard to the Roxburghshire case to which you have alluded, was there any difference, between the landlord and the tenant, upon the matter of rent, for the renewal of the lease," to which Mr. Russell replied, "None whatever; the conditions were all agreed to, and everything was carried out but the formal completion of the deed;" was that the case?—It is quite untruthful; there were no conditions and no rent whatever mentioned.

7303. Had you never gone into any negociations with the tenant?—No negociations, except my simply walking over the farm to get the necessary details to send in a report to Lord Lothian; no negociations in any shape ever ensued.

7304. What would be the practice on the Lothian estates with regard to the out-going tenant getting a renewal of the lease?—The sitting tenants generally, but not always, get an offer of the lease at its expiry; but it is invariably Lord Lothian's practice to have a report made in every case upon the different farms before taking up the matter at all.

Mr. W. E. Otto.

7305. When you walked over the farm Mr. Scott had assumed, had he not, that he would have the offer of the farm again?—In his very first letter to me he assumed that.

7306. But when you walked over the farm and made the report, did Mr. Scott suggest certain alterations and improvements as if he were going to be continued the tenant?—Exactly; he said he should like so-and-so, but it was merely stated as what he considered necessary, and not at all what might be granted.

7307. Had anything been said between you and him at that time about what rent should be reserved?—None whatever; the rent was never mentioned between us.

7308. Nor had you promised to recommend to his Lordship any improvements or alterations?—I had promised to recommend nothing.

7309. Did you ever intimate to Mr. Scott or to any tenant on Lord Lothian's property, that the landlord would not let farms to those who would not vote as he wished?—I certainly never did.

7310. Did you ever receive any instructions from his Lordship to that effect?—No, never; it was entirely an inference of Mr. Scott's own that it was for political reasons that he was dismissed.

7311. During the elections, you had conversation with Mr. Scott about the election, had you not?—Yes; I had twice or three times.

7312. Had you given him reasons why he should vote for Lord Schomberg Kerr?—I said that he ought to hear both candidates, and he said that the only difference between them was with regard to hypothec and the game laws, which were subjects in Scotland which created a great deal of agitation; and I said that he ought to hear both parties, and that the one candidate was quite as liberal as the other upon those points.

7313. Mr. Villiers.] When was this conversation?—Before the election; perhaps from two to three months before the election.

7314. Mr. Hunt.] It was not, I presume, at the time when you went over the farm to make a report of it?—We might have had a few words occasionally at that time, but I would not be above a couple of hours with him going over the farm.

7315. But you argued with him upon the merits of the respective candidates, did you?—I did.

7316. Did you ever put any pressure upon him to declare himself in favour of one or the other?—Not the slightest; I neither put any pressure upon him, nor held out any inducement whatever.

7317. Did Lord Lothian ever give you any reason for his intention not to re-let the farm to Mr. Scott?—He gave no reason whatever.

7318. Chairman.] Did you not say that it was in consequence of something that he had heard about Mr. Scott?—Yes; in consequence of what he had heard about Mr. Scott he did not intend to renew the lease.

7319. Mr. Hunt.] He gave no specific reasons?—He gave no reasons whatever, and I did not presume to ask him for reasons.

7320. His Lordship did not tell you what he had heard of Mr. Scott which induced him to decide so?—He did not.

7321. Was it known to you, or was it notorious, that Mr. Scott had spoken very disrespectfully and contemptuously of the Lothian family at a meeting?—I had heard of it.

7322. But was it notorious in the neighbourhood that Mr. Scott had spoken disrespectfully of the Lothian family at a farmers' meeting?—It was; amongst the farmers it was quite well known.

7323. Did you assume in your own mind that that was what Lord Lothian alluded to?—It was a mere assumption on my part. I could not tell his Lordship's reasons, but I knew that there were quite good and sufficient personal and private reasons for not giving Mr. Scott a renewal.

7324. But when Lord Lothian said that he had heard something about Mr. Scott, did you suppose that those expressions of Mr. Scott at this farmers' meeting were what was in his mind?—I certainly did.

7325. Do you know when that meeting was held at which Mr. Scott spoke disrespectfully of the Lothian family?—It was some time in the course of the summer of the year 1868.

7326. Was Mr. Scott's the only farm of which the lease fell in about that time?—The only farm in 1870.

7327. But were there not other farms out of lease at the time of the election?—In 1869 there were four other farms out of lease.

7328. And did the outgoing tenants of those farms all vote for Lord Schomberg Kerr or not?—There were four farms, all of which, after my report was sent in to Lord Lothian, he instructed me to offer to the sitting tenants; and two of them voted for the Conservative candidate and two of them for the Liberal. One of those who voted for the Liberal is a man notorious for his extremely violent political opinions, and was well known to be so to Lord Lothian.

7329. Was he one of the principal supporters, and one who took an active part on the Liberal side in that election?—He was the principal supporter and canvasser on the Liberal side, and materially assisted to carry the election.

7330. Notwithstanding that, did he receive a renewal of his lease?—He obtained a renewal of his lease, and it was exactly in the position mentioned by Mr. Russell in his evidence, the rent and the conditions were fixed, but the new lease was not signed; but his Lordship had never spoken to me of cancelling or repudiating that arrangement.

7331. Then the two Liberal tenants and the two Conservative tenants whose leases fell in at that time all had renewals of their leases?—The whole four had renewals.

7332. Then we were told in evidence that Mr. Scott wrote to his Lordship about the lease; was that so?—I believe he did, but I never saw the letter until two or three weeks ago, at the time his Lordship wrote to me, giving me the tenor of the letter, which he thought most fallacious and unprincipled, but I never saw the letter itself till a few weeks ago.

7333. Is that the letter (handing a letter to the Witness)?—That is a portion of it.

7334. His Lordship could not find the whole of the letter, I believe?—No; his Lordship could not find the whole of the letter, but that is Mr. Scott's handwriting.

7335. Have you understood that his Lordship never answered the letter?—His Lordship did not tell me whether he did so or not.

7336. Is it the case that his Lordship is unable to write himself?—He is quite unable to write himself, and I think he sufficiently answered that question in the letter which he wrote wrote the other day to the "Times," saying that "he was quite unable to write, and that dictating was very difficult to him, so much so, that when any precision of language is required, I have, after several failures, given up the attempt."

7337. Mr. Leatham.] Will you read the letter?—It is only a portion, and not the whole; I may say that it was from no want of courtesy on Lord Lothian's part that the letter was not answered; unfortunately it had fallen aside, and in his precarious state of health had been neglected.

7338. Mr. Hunt.] Was there any notice taken in the "Scotsman" of this case?—In the beginning of April an article was written upon it by the "Scotsman," and on seeing it I drew Lord Lothian's attention to the article which had appeared; he had not seen it, but on reading it he thought it so fallacious and untruthful that he declined to answer it, more especially as he had had a recent instance of the unfair treatment that the "Scotsman" gives to any contradictions which may appear to its statements; during the time of the Roxburghshire election all sorts of reports had been circulated with a view to damage the Conservative candidate, and amongst these the most flagrant was one imputing to Lord Lothian that he had handed over the whole of the game on his estates to his brother, the candidate, with a view to farm it, and make a large revenue out of it by selling the game, and that most stringent clauses were inserted in leases to protect the game and the rabbits, and insinuations of that kind; on drawing his Lordship's attention to it, I was authorised to contradict it, which I accordingly did, giving an entire and emphatic denial to the whole of the assertions. Lord Lothian's brother had no interest whatever in the game, any more than occasionally having a few days' shooting, the same as any of his Lordship's brothers; but not a single head of game is sold off the estate, and no shootings are let, and as to the game clauses it is a simple legal reservation of the game.

7339. Had you written to the "Scotsman" to contradict the assertions with respect to game?—I had, and the letter certainly was inserted; but notwithstanding that, the assertions still continued, quibbling, and making all sorts of insinuations that the first statements were quite true, and, in fact, making out that the contradiction was worth nothing at all; so after receiving such unfair treatment, Lord Lothian declined to contradict the "Scotsman" again.

7340. On the appearance in the "Scotsman" of Mr. Russell's evidence about the case of Timpendean, was it his Lordship's wish that you should appear and give evidence before this Committee?—It was; and that the matter should be investigated, and the whole of the evidence brought out.

7341. You can tell us something about the election; are there many voters upon the Lothian estates in Roxburghshire?—Not many; the farms are generally large, and there are very few voters upon the Lothian estates.

7342. Did you canvass Lord Lothian's tenants for the Conservative candidate?—I went about introducing the Conservative candidate; but I do not think that I asked half-a-dozen of the tenants for their votes; I never canvassed a single tenant in Mid-Lothian.

7343. Is that where the principal estates are?—No, in Roxburghshire.

7344. Was much pressure put upon the tenants generally by the landlords in Roxburghshire?—No pressure whatever; I do not know of a single case of coercion by landed proprietors in Roxburghshire.

7345. What were the influences principally at work in that election?—Principally mob violence; many people were deterred from coming to the poll for fear of being maltreated.

7346. On which side was that intimidation used?—Entirely on the Liberal side.

7347. And had that intimidation any effect upon the election, in your opinion?—It deterred several from going to the poll, and many were most unfairly treated; at Morebattle, for instance, the voters for the Liberal side, on coming out of the polling booth, when it could hardly be known whether they voted for or against, were cheered and allowed to go away, whereas people who had polled for the Conservative side were misused, and pelted, and half drowned, and ill-treated in every possible manner.

7348. Was any other kind of influence used on the Liberal side of a different nature?—There was a good deal of class coercion in the villages.

7349. What do you call class coercion?—I mean among the villagers themselves; take a village, for instance, where, perhaps, there were a few voters on the Conservative side, they dare not vote because of the coercion by the large majority in the village.

7350. What was the nature of the coercion that was used?—It is difficult to explain that.

7351. Were they threatened with loss of custom, or were they teased and tormented?—They were teased and tormented, and I have no doubt threatened with loss of custom too; I have known several cases of that.

7352. Were the ministers of religion very active at that election?—The Established ministers were not, but the Dissenting ministers took a very prominent part in it.

7353. What was the nature of the influence that they used?—It was exercising all sorts of authority over their congregations, and being Dissenters, they hold that they ought to vote for a Liberal, and any person who votes for a Conservative is rather looked down upon in a Dissenting congregation.

7355. To go back to Mr. Scott's case, there are some assertions in Mr. Scott's letter which I think renders it necessary that it should be read; I think you dispute the accuracy of Mr. Scott's letter?—I do.

7356. Mr. Scott begins, "Timpendean, 16th December 1868. My Lord, a sense of duty to myself and a justification of my conduct at the late election induce me to write you on the present occasion; Mr. Otto yesterday (that would be on the 15th of December 1868) communicated to me your Lordship's resolution, declining to relet me this farm, because I had voted against your brother, brother, Lord Schomberg Kerr, at which I expressed my surprise and regret, as no such case has ever happened on the estate before." Is it the case that you told Mr. Scott on the 15th of December, that his Lordship declined to relet him the farm, because he had voted against Lord Schomberg Kerr?—I did not; I assigned no reason whatever.

7357. Or at any other time?—Nor at any other time; it was entirely an inference or assumption of Mr. Scott's own; it is always invidious to assign personal or private reasons.

7360. Mr. Whitbread.] How long have you been factor over that property where Mr. Scott's farm is?—Five years.

7361. During the whole of that five years, I think you say you never were upon Mr. Scott's farm?—I had been upon the farm, but I had never inspected his houses or buildings; I had no occasion to do so.

7362. This meeting, at which Mr. Scott spoke disrespectfully of the Lothian family, was in the summer, was it not?—Yes; in the summer.

7363. What kind of a meeting was it?—Some farmers' dinner, or something of that sort; I did not inquire particularly into it; it is a disagreeable thing to have anything to do with.

7364. Where was it held?—It was a farmers' dinner at Hawick.

7365. What gave rise to his speaking disrespectfully in this way of the Lothian family?—I really cannot say.

7366. What was the nature of the language?—I was merely informed that it was most abusive and disrespectful.

7367. Was it a speech or an ordinary conversation?—Mere after-dinner conversation, I believe, across the table.

7368. Do you know how and when it was reported to Lord Lothian?—I am not aware.

7369. You do not know how soon at all he became acquainted with it?—No; I have no idea of that at all.

7370. Was it reported by yourself to Lord Lothian?—No, it was not.

7371. Mr. Leatham.] How do you know that Lord Lothian was aware of it?—His brother was aware of it, and I presume he would inform him of it.

7372. The O'Conor Don.] Was it reported to you yourself?—It was reported to me myself.

7373. Mr. Whitbread.] You had no reason to understand that Lord Lothian had heard of that language before he gave you final instructions not to let the farm to Mr. Scott?—He never even informed me that he had; as I said, he assigned no reasons whatever, and it would be utterly out of my place to presume to ask reasons for any instructions that I might receive.

7374. What ultimately became of Mr. Scott's farm?—Nothing has been settled to this day; no conditions and no arrangements have been made. As I before said, Lord Lothian intended to make considerable alterations upon it, and he desired at one time, and he still thought of exchanging with another tenant, so as to give him Timpendean Farm, and make the other farm the home farm; but no arrangements have been fixed yet; the farm is not out of lease till the separation of crops in 1870.

7375. Is it a fair question to ask you whether the report which you made of the state of cultivation of the farm was a satisfactory one?—As I said, the report was never sent in; my notes were merely lying in draft, and prepared to be sent in; his Lordship did not even ask for it; it was before leaving for London, and I said I had better get definite instructions with regard to the farm, and I would send my report in to-morrow, but his Lordship informed me that it would not be worth while, as he had not made up his mind at all about the farm, but I certainly would not have been prepared to report very favourably upon the state of cultivation.

7376. You practically canvassed a good many of the tenants, did you not, on Lord Lothian's estate?—Very few indeed.

7377. You introduced the candidate, I think you say?—Yes, I introduced the candidate.

7378. You know the tenant farmers very well by this time; do not you think that the very fact of your going to introduce one candidate to them is a thing which, in their minds, would be construed as a desire on the part of their landlord that that they should vote in a certain direction?—Not at all; I do not think so. The farmers in Roxburghshire are far too independent for that.

7379. Did you introduce the candidate on the other side?—No, I did not.

7381. Did you take any other part in the election, except that of introducing the candidate on the Conservative side to the tenants?—I introduced the candidate to very few tenants indeed, not above one-third upon the estate. I went about with the candidate among the other electors, but I do not believe that I introduced the candidate to half-a-dozen of the tenants upon the estate.

7382. You spoke of class coercion in the villages, and you said that there were several cases within your knowledge; can you specify any one of them in which coercion was used?—It is very difficult to prove coercion in any shape, but I have been informed by the villagers that they could not vote as they pleased.

7383. What reason did they assign?—That they got no peace; that they were tormented, and they refrained from voting.

7384. Did they anticipate personal violence, or what?—Personal violence at the poll, in some places, they would have experienced.

7385. But they did not assign that as their reason to you?—No; but just generally ill-treatment; that is to say, they would have been looked upon with scorn, and every sort of thing would have been done to ill-use them; kept at an outside, in fact.

7386. But was it by Lord Lothian's instructions that you introduced the candidate to the tenants?—I merely went about with the candidate in the Jedburgh district, and when we crossed any tenant's farms we called upon them as well as upon any other electors, but we did not call specially upon any tenants; I rather avoided that; as I have before said, I do not think I introduced him to half-a-dozen of the tenants.

7387. My question was, whether your action was by Lord Lothian's instructions?—Certainly, to introduce the Conservative candidate throughout the district; his Lordship is a Conservative.

7388. And he instructed you to do it?—I understood so; general instructions to support his own brother.

7389. The O'Conor Don.] You stated that you were informed of this disrespectful language used by Mr. Scott at a meeting of the farmers; when were you informed of it?—I should say that it would be four or five weeks before the election; some time after it occurred.

7390. But you said it occurred in the summer, did you not?—During the summer; I do not remember the date at all just now.

7391. By whom were you informed?—By two or three farmers.

7392. Did you ever speak to Mr. Scott about it?—Certainly not; I never spoke to Mr. Scott about it.

7393. When you were speaking to Mr. Scott about the election, and going over the farm with him, you never alluded at all to this language which he used disrespectfully to his landlord?—I did not; it would have been quite out of place to do so I think.

7394. Mr. Leatham.] When did you first receive instructions to inspect this farm?—In August or September 1868.

7395. And you did not inspect it till a week before the election?—A month before the election; the 22nd of October I inspected it.

7396. Did the Marquis give no reason to you whatever?—No reason whatever.

7397. Is it usual, when a landlord communicates to an agent that he is about to dismiss a tenant, to give no reason to the agent why he is dismissed?—Yes, I never presume to ask reasons for instructions that I may receive.

7398. Even although you furnish a report of the state of cultivation of the farm?—The report was never sent in.

7399. Therefore it was not owing to any report of yours with reference to the cultivation of the farm that Mr. Scott was dismissed?—Lord Lothian knew generally from my statements as to the farm, but the report, as I say, was merely my notes prepared, but not made up.

7400. But he made no reference to the statements which you had made to him at the time that he communicated to you his intention of dismissing the tenant?—He made no reference whatever.

7401. You had no idea in your mind why he dismissed the tenant?—He assigned no reasons; I can merely say that I, of course, can give no reasons as his Lordship's agent.

7402. Did he know of your coming up to give this evidence?—He requested me to do so.

7403. Have you had a conversation with reference to it?—I have never seen his Lordship at all.

7404. Did his Lordship empower you to say that this lease was refused entirely without reference to Mr. Scott's vote, or the part which he took at the election?—As I before said, I have not seen his Lordship at all.

7405. I thought you said that he requested you to give this evidence?—By letter.

7406. What did he request you to say in that letter?—It was through his agent in Edinburgh requesting me to contradict the statements, but I have had no communication with his Lordship at all. His Lordship left immediately after, and I have never seen his Lordship since.

7407. Is it usual for Lord Lothian not to reply to letters addressed to him?—In his precarious state of health they sometimes fall aside.

7408. Does not he keep a secretary?—He does not.

7409. Then his agent does not act for him in correspondence with reference to the estate?—Letters addressed to myself certainly, I answer, but not his Lordship's letters, unless I am specially desired; it was from no want of courtesy or ungraciousness, as the editor of the "Scotsman" seemed to imply.

7410. How do you know that Lord Lothian's brother was aware of the language used by Mr. Scott?—Because I had heard him say so; it was perfectly notorious throughout the country at that time.

7411. What was the latest day at which it was necessary to inform Mr. Scott that his lease would not be renewed?—Six weeks before the 26th of May 1870; it did not expire until then.

Mr. W. E Otto.

3 June 1869.

7412. It was not necessary to state to him until that day that his lease would not be renewed?—No; but as a matter of courtesy, I did it, in order to take no disadvantage of him in any shape; it was but fair to a tenant to allow him to know that he was not to get a renewal, and it was entirely for that purpose that I understood Lord Lothian to request me to intimate it to Mr. Scott.

7413. Why did you select those half-dozen tenants to introduce the Conservative candidate to?—Merely as we rode across the country; if we passed any of their farms, we took them along with other electors in the district.

7414. Do you happen to remember how those tenants voted?—No, I do not; there was no special canvass of the tenantry made in any shape; it was merely in riding across the country.

7415. What is the number of Lord Lothian's tenants in Roxburghshire?—They are principally large farms, and very few votes, not above from 30 to 40.

7416. Mr. Hunt.] Do you know how they voted?—Some of them voted for the Conservative, and some of them for the Liberals, as I gave an instance of that before; four farms were out of lease in 1869, and I reported upon the whole of them, and the sitting tenants got the offer of them, two of whom voted for the Liberal, and two of them for the Conservative candidate.

7417. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Is Mr. Scott a good farmer?—I should not say he was a first-rate farmer.

7418. Should you say that he was as good as his neighbours on the average?—Not on the average; he has a large quantity of land.

7419. Would you say that his farm was in a good state of cultivation?—Not in a very good state of cultivation; it is not in a high state of cultivation.

7420. Is he an old tenant upon the estate?—No; he and his brother had this last lease, and his brother got another farm of Lord Lothian's some eight or nine years' ago.

7421. Were those on a 19 years' lease?—Yes.

7422. Was he a tenant before that lease?—His father had another 19 years' before that.

7423. And before that?—Those two leases are the whole time that they have had the farm.

7424. Can you give any reason that caused this disrespectful language which you say was used by Mr. Scott towards Lord Lothian?—I know of no reason for it whatever; his Lordship has always treated his tenantry with great liberality.

7425. What was the nature of the disrespectful language used?—I was simply informed that it was abusive and contemptuous language of the whole Lothian family, generally?—I did not enter into particulars, as it was a very disagreeable subject to hear of.

7426. Mr. Villiers.] Then as far as we understand, there was nothing in your report which could have led to Mr. Scott's dismissal?—The report was never sent in, and as I have before said, his Lordship assigned no reasons whatever to me.

7427. But did I understand you to say that he had plenty of personal and other reasons against Mr. Scott?—That is my own inference; I had abundance of personal and private reasons for not strongly recommending Mr. Scott to be a tenant, but they were merely my own reason, not that I mentioned them to Lord Lothian, because he never called upon me to do so.

7428. But independently of politics, there were personal reasons why Mr. Scott should not have his lease renewed?—There were, quite unconnected with politics, personal and private reasons.

7429. Personal reasons entertained by yourself and by Lord Lothian?—I am speaking for myself, and not as the agent for Lord Lothian.

7430. I thought you referred to personal reasons of his Lordship in your former evidence?—No; I said that there was abundance of personal and private reasons quite unconnected with politics, that would have prevented me from strongly recommending Mr. Scott, but I was never called upon to give those reasons.

7431. Then, do we understand that you and Lord Lothian never had any conversation with respect to Mr. Scott, except that you were directed to survey the farm?—None.

7432. And no particular reason assigned why you were to survey the farm?—It is invariably done in all cases where a farm is near the end of the lease.

7433. But do you call it near the end if it does not expire until Lady Day 1870, that you should survey it in August 1868?—Yes; tenants look upon it as a privilege to have at least two years' knowledge of whether they are to get the farm or not; it is a great advantage to a tenant to know that, and it is frequently done by Lord Lothian.

7434. Then it was done to other tenants as well as to Mr. Scott?—Yes; frequently.

7435. Upon this occasion it seems to have been, I think you stated, six weeks before the election that you surveyed his farm?—About that.

7436. Were there other tenants whose leases would expire in 1870, like Mr. Scott's?—No, it is the only lease that expires in 1870.

7437. Then it was only in the ordinary course of business that you went to his farm?—In the ordinary course of business.

7438. But it was after this abusive language which he was reported to have used at some farmers' dinner?—I had not heard of it at the time that I went over the farm.

7439. When was it first discussed; before or after the election?—Before the election, several weeks.

7440. Then it was expected that he would be an adverse voter to Lord Lothian?—He said himself that after what he had said upon the hypothec and game laws, he could not but vote upon the Liberal side.

7441. Then had he been canvassed?—I introduced him to the candidate, and spoke twice or thrice generally discussing the subject of hypothec and the game laws with him, but it was merely meeting him and having five or ten minutes' talk.

7442. Was the candidate Lord Lothian's brother?—Yes; the candidate was Lord Lothian's brother.

7443. Did he express himself dissatisfied with the tenant because he did not vote for him?—No; I introduced him and left him in the street speaking to him, and I do not know what the conversation was; I heard them discussing hypothec and the game laws.

7444. In fact Mr. Scott's politics were perfectly fectly well known, and it took nobody by surprise when he voted for the Liberal candidate?—As to those two questions, his politics were quite notorious.

7445. I suppose the Liberal candidate was identified with the popular views on those questions?—I think that the one candidate was as liberal as the other upon those questions, and I said so to Mr. Scott, that he ought to hear both sides of the question of hypothec and the game laws.

7446. Was Lord Lothian's brother against the game laws?—Not against the game laws.

7447. I mean against the preservation of the game?—Yes, to remedy any evils in game preservation.

7448. They do not preserve the game there, do they?—Yes, the game is preserved to a certain extent and the shooting.

7449. And the farmers complain of it, do they?—Sometimes they complain of the rabbits.

7450. Was Mr. Scott amongst those who complained of the mischief the game does?—No, Mr. Scott said to me himself at that time that he had no reason to complain of the game, and that it was not a personal grievance with him at all; that he had no reason to complain of being annoyed by game.

7451. What was the particular view taken by the Liberal candidate upon the subject of the game laws?—It is difficult to say; he changed several times with regard to it.

7452. The question of the game laws went for a good deal at the last election in Scotland, I believe?—Yes, I think he would have done away with the game laws altogether; it made very little difference to him.

7453. It would make a difference in the preservation of game, would it not?—It certainly would, if there was no trespass act.

7454. But that is a thing at issue between the farmers and the proprietors, the farmers declaring in all cases that they do not like the strict preservation of the game?—They do not like the strict preservation of the game.

7455. You mentioned two other tenants of Lord Lothian's, who voted for the Liberal candidate; when does their lease expire?—Whit-Sunday, and the separation of the crops in 1869, so that their leases are not actually out yet.

7456. But their farms have been surveyed already, have they not?—Yes, the year before, at the usual time.

7457. And were their farms found in a good state?—Yes, in a fair state of cultivation. There were four farms out of lease that year, and a report was sent in upon them, and they were all offered to the sitting tenants.

7458. Were the farms of those two Liberal farmers in a better condition than Mr. Scott's?—One of them was in a very much better state, and the other better too, I should say.

7459. When had they received a promise of their leases being renewed?—The rent and the conditions were fixed before the election.

7460. In fact, everything had been settled before the election?—Yes, shortly before it, but no lease was entered into.

7461. I suppose it is the custom, is it not, to give a lease?—Yes, I never heard Lord Lothian even hint at repudiating or cancelling those arrangements.

7462. Those Liberal farmers that you allude to, whose leases expired in 1869, were not quite in the same position as Mr. Scott, as his expires in 1870, does it not?—Yes; in 1870.

7463. It had been all settled, at least as far as you describe it as a settlement, that they were to have a renewal?—It was exactly in the position described by Mr. Russell in his evidence as to Timpendean, which was false, that the rent and conditions were fixed, and all that was remaining was, the formal completion of the deed. Those farmers were exactly in that position.

7464. But Mr. Scott had not got so far as that?—Not nearly so far.

7465. Was there a general opinion in the county that Mr. Scott was to be turned out on account of his vote?—I heard nothing about it.

7466. I suppose there was a pretty general notion that influence was used on both sides; you say that it was distinctly so in the villages by class coercion, I think you called it?—Yes, by class coercion.

7467. And the other people heard that influence was used by the proprietors over their tenants for the other candidate?—I do not know of a single case of landlord coercion.

7468. But I suppose that other people might have informed themselves upon that matter, so that there is very little free action in that county in the case of an election?—I think it is one of the purest counties that you will get anywhere. There is no coercion of any kind by the landed proprietors; I can only say that the Conservative proprietors as a rule do not canvass, and do little except giving their own votes. Many of them, I think, never even canvassed a single tenant or applied the slightest influence in any shape.

7469. It is not very necessary, is it; if he can turn the tenant out, he need not ask him to vote, because he knows what his opinion is?—It does not follow from that that he turns him out.

7470. You told us that it was quite notorious who was the candidate that his Lordship supported, he being his brother?—Of course it was; of course he would support his brother.

7471. When his agent went with his brother, there could not be any doubt about it;—But I did not go and canvass from tenant to tenant; I was merely taking the round. There is a large district, and in riding round to the different places, visiting the electors, we sometimes passed farms belonging to Lord Lothian, and we passed in there too, and I introduced the candidate, but it was simply that.

7472. You did not ask everybody that you met on the way?—I was riding to the different farmplaces of the electors, and of course knew the different electors.

7473. Chairman.] When did the contest begin in Roxburghshire?—I forget just now, but it would be from two to three months at least before the polling-day in the end of November.

7474. Was it in August or September?—About September; I think it was rather the beginning of that month; it was not one of the earliest contests.

7475. Was it known that Mr. Scott was opposed to Lord Lothian in politics when the question first arose between him and you as to the renewal of the lease?—It was not known what Mr. Scott's politics were at all.

7476. Did you know nothing about Mr. Scott's politics?—Nothing politically, as he said himself he was Conservative in many respects as to the reduction of the franchise and various other matters; matters; it was simply in the hypothec and the game laws that he took such a keen interest.

Mr. W. E. Otto.

8 June 1869.

7477. You knew previously, did you not, that he had strong views upon those subjects?—I did.

7478. And Lord Lothian knew it also?—I am not aware of that, but possibly he may, as Mr. Scott has taken a very strong position with regard to the law of hypothec.

7479. When the first conversation between Lord Lothian and you as to the renewal of the lease took place, was anything said at all about Mr. Scott's political views, or views on those subjects?—None whatever; his Lordship, as a matter of course, simply requested me to send in my usual report.

7480. And I think you said that you knew at that time, or that Lord Lothian mentioned to you at the time, that he had views as to the separation of his farm?—He did; he mentioned to me that he had not decided at all in his own mind what to do with the farm.

7481. Did Lord Lothian ever speak to you about a letter from Mr. Scott?—He wrote to me giving me the tenor of it, but I never saw the letter until two or three weeks ago.

7482. When his Lordship wrote to you, did he ask you to do anything?—He asked me as to the truth of it. Mr. Scott began by asserting that I had informed him that he was deprived of his farm because he did not vote for Lord Schomberg Kerr. Now, I distinctly did no such thing; he merely inferred it or assumed that it was on account of his vote.

7483. And Lord Lothian wrote to you about it?—Yes.

7484. And he asked you for an explanation, did he?—Yes, as to the truth of it.

7485. And you informed Lord Lothian that it was not true?—Yes, I told him that it was not true.

7486. Do you imagine, then, that it had escaped Lord Lothian's recollection to write and answer Mr. Scott's letter?—There is no doubt that it had fallen aside, and in his precarious state of health had been neglected.

7487. Mr. Hunt.] Did his Lordship write to you himself, or did he dictate the letter?—He is quite unable to write a letter; it was dictated, and he is only occasionally able to do that.

7489. Was it on that occasion, or was it on some other occasion, that Lord Lothian told you that it was on account of what he had heard of Mr. Scott?—At that time he said that on account of the reports which he had heard of Mr. Scott, he did not intend to renew the lease.

7490. Then he did give you a reason that it was on account of the reports?—He said that, but he assigned no reason, and I never presumed to ask him.

7492. Were any other of Lord Lothian's tenants present at the time?—I am not aware; it was rather out of the district, it was in Hawick.

7493. Was the language so violent as to render it in your judgment undesirable to continue Mr. Scott in his relation as tenant?—I did not inquire particularly into the language used; I was merely generally informed that it was very disrespectful, and contemptuous of the whole family; it was after dinner.

7494. And did it not come to your knowledge till after you had gone through the farm?—It did not.

7495. The O'Conor Don.] I thought you stated that it came to your knowledge shortly after it was spoken in the summer?—I went over the farm in October; what I mean by summer is the harvest time; I do not remember the date just now.

7496. Mr. Whitbread.] Had you ever heard that Mr. Scott was in the habit of going about and abusing his landlord?—No, I never heard that he was in the habit of going about doing that; but his farm lies very close to the policy, and certainly it would not be desirable for his Lordship to have a tenant within sight of the residence to behave in that manner.

7497. And beyond this question of the language you say that you had other private reasons which in your mind were sufficient to justify the non-renewal of his lease?—Certainly, but they were my own reasons, which I was never called upon to give.

7498. Mr. Leatham.] Did you communicate those reasons to Lord Lothian?—No, I was never asked for them.

7499. Did you at any time recommend Lord Lothian, either by letter or otherwise, refuse to Mr. Scott the lease?—Never, I had no correspondence with him at all about it; he was resident at the time in Roxburghshire when the whole thing occurred, and I had very little communication with him, in fact only seeing him occasionally, and but very seldom.

7500. Mr. Greaves.] Is it part of your duty, when giving in a report upon the expiration of a lease, to say whether the lease shall be renewed or not?—It is not.

7501. Mr. Hunt.] You told us that Mr. Scott's politics were very well known to Lord Lothian, and you have told us that two persons who voted against Lord Lothian's side at the election had a renewal of their lease; were their politics also generally known?—One of them was notoriously well known; he was the principal canvasser and supporter, and one of the leading Liberals in the county, and in fact he materially assisted to carry the election, and has been well known for 20 or 30 years to be an extreme Liberal in his politics.

7502. Was that known at the time that the arrangements were made for renewing the lease?—Perfectly well known to Lord Lothian, and yet he renewed the lease.

7503. With regard to this farm at Timpendean, is it not a farm very near Lord Lothian's own residence?—It lies close to his residence, within sight of it.

7504. Do you think it is a pleasant thing to have a tenant living within sight of your residence who makes use of abusive expressions at a meeting?—It is not very desirable, certainly.

7505. Do you think that any landlord would be justified in discontinuing a tenant living just under under his windows who went to a meeting and abused him?—I think that he would be perfectly justified in doing so.

7506. Do you agree with Mr. Russell's opinion that this tenant was one of the most eminent farmers in Scotland?—I do not. He certainly has a large extent of land, but he is not a very eminent or high farmer.

Major General MONTAGU MCMURDO, C.B., called in; and Examined.

7507. The O'Conor Don.] YOU are Commander of the Infantry Brigade in Dublin, are you not?—Yes.

7508. Were you stationed in Ireland in that position during the time of the late election?—Yes.

7509. In the course of your service in Ireland have you been able to form any opinion upon the subject of the employment of troops at elections?—I have formed some opinions. It is the duty of a general officer to make himself acquainted with all the circumstances under which troops may be required to come into action, and I have informed myself upon the subject of elections in Ireland by examining the officers under my command who have been engaged in them, as well as from my own experience and observation of the matter.

7512. Were they collected in the first instance by the aid of the military?—I do not know whether they were collected by the aid of the military, but they were shut up by landlords, for some four or five days, and then Dragoons were sent by the direction of the Government to take them to the polling-place, and the Dragoons did perform that duty.

7513. Are you aware that the troops were employed to collect the voters in some cases several days before the polling day?—I do not know that the troops were employed to collect the voters, but I know that the troops were employed in escorting the voters after they had been collected.

7514. And that several days before the election?—From the information that I have received, it was several days before the election.

7515. How do you account for those measures being taken by the military in the elections in Ireland?—The possession of land involves great political influence. The majority of the landlords in Ireland are Protestants, and therefore it must follow that the majority of the Catholic tenants must be unduly influenced by those landlords. Take, for example, the last general elections; in Ireland as well as in Great Britain these pivoted upon the Irish Church question. The Roman Catholic tenants thus unduly influenced by their landlords and taken under military escort, must have voted contrary to their conscience and to the interests of their own religion.

7516. In what light do military officers regard those voters that are committed to their charge; do they regard them as free men whom they are bound to protect, or do they regard them in the light of prisoners?—Practically as prisoners; in receiving charge of a number of men, with orders to take them to a polling station, the officers are bound, according to their ideas of military usage, to take care of those men, that they do not escape and that others do not injure them. I am not aware of any discretion having ever been given to officers in this respect.

7517. The officers understand that they are to take care that those men do not escape?—Certainly; I gave orders myself in Tipperary that, in case of attack, the voters should not be allowed to move for fear of their being taken for rioters.

7518. Was that the ground on which you put it?—Yes, it is the opinion amongst the officers of the army that the voters make their escape when they can and go home, and perhaps even turn upon the escort.

7519. And you were determined, in the case where you were employed, that they should not escape?—Certainly; I gave specific instructions with regard to the conduct of the officers and their men in the event of their convoys being attacked.

Major-Gen. M. McMurdo, C.B.

8 June 1869.

7520. Have you got those instructions with you?—Yes, I had issued them to the nearest detachment in Tipperary, where my head quarters were; but before post hour information was given that the election would not be contested, and therefore I did not issue the remaining copies.

7521. Will you read those instructions to the Committee?—"Head Quarters, Tipperary, 23rd November, 1868. Should the election be contested, and the magistrate make requisition to escort voters, ascertain from him the point where the convoy is to be formed, and reconnoitre the road at once, noting all awkward points where interruptions to its progress might be attempted, such as woods and hollow roads. Regulate the strength of the convoy according to circumstances, but it is not, under any circumstances, to exceed one-half of your command. The infantry should be on cars; if there are not enough cars, then as many as can be furnished by the election agent. A small party of cavalry should be in advance to look out and give information, then an advance-guard of infantry, then the cars, the leading one carrying entrenching tools (spades, axes, and a cross-cut saw), with men to use them. The rest of the infantry should follow; then voters; the rest of the cavalry bringing up the rear. The constabulary should be distributed on either side of the line of cars. Should interruption be offered the convoy should halt, and the officer examine the obstacle, turning the flanks of the position by a demonstration of his infantry. (The constabulary should look after the voters, who should be warned to keep their places, to avoid being mistaken for rioters.) If this threatening attitude is not sufficient to cause the mob to evacuate their position, the officer must then act as laid down in paragraph 34 of Parchment Book of General Orders. If required to advance, he will avoid, if possible, attacking in front, till his flanking parties have produced their effect; he will also combine the use of his cavalry (if the nature of the ground permits) in aiding a flank attack. He will then move forward the pioneer party, protected by infantry, and clear the obstacles. The escort for voters on foot" (that is quite a different case), "say from a railway station" (such as happened at Drogheda) "should be much the same as above, except that the rear of the voters should be brought up with infantry and a few cavalry. If the road is at all favourable for cavalry these should be in front; and if the crowd be hostile, ordered to make free use of their horses by passaging and plunging. A judicious use of the spur may obviate the necessity for extreme measures; I shall not object to the Dragoons having light sticks in their hands which they may use if pressed upon or ill-treated by a truculent crowd, but officers must be prepared to cast these away and resort to their weapons if the magistrate should require it; in conclusion, I am to be kept well informed, by telegram, of all that passes, or that may be apprehended." These were my instructions: it is right, however, that I should add that the latter part relating to the Dragoons having sticks was not approved by Lord Strathnairn.

7522. These instructions are somewhat similar, are they not, to what would be issued if you were conveying prisoners through an enemy's country?—I would not give other instructions if I were attacking a regular force.

7523. It appears by those instructions that there are two uses made of the troops in Ireland; one in conveying voters from the rural districts to the poll, and the other in protecting the public peace upon the day of the election in the polling place?—Yes, those are very different uses.

7524. You consider that the use of the military in the latter case is a very different use from the other?—Yes, but I entertain very strong opinions upon that subject.

7525. Will you state generally what are your opinions with respect to the use of the military in the suppression of a riot upon the polling day?—I have always been of opinion that a soldier ought not, when aiding the civil power in the suppression of riots, to have in his hands the mortal weapons which are intended for use against the enemies of his country. I conceive that in the suppression of civil riots, an infantry soldier can execute his duty as a citizen perfectly well with a staff in his hand, aided by the military organisation which he has acquired; and acting under the orders of his officers and non-commissioned officers: in the same way with regard to the cavalry, in place of a cavalry soldier sitting helpless on his horse with a drawn sword in his hand, which he dare not use; if he had a single stick, and acted as a special constable, no rioter in the world would dare come near him to seize his bridle, or throw him from his horse. The present system of employing soldiers in suppressing a riot, is as remarkable for its stupidity as for its cruelty; because a soldier having mortal weapons in his hands, the last thing that he would do would be to use them upon his countrymen; but when that happens a man is slain, and the soldier cast into prison.

7526. You consider that the soldiers would be much more efficient if they were armed with less deadly weapons? — Unquestionably; the very fact of soldiers being armed with deadly weapons gives the mob courage to proceed with outrage. I have printed some observations of my own upon the late affair at Drogheda which I have brought with me.

7527. Will you put them in?—Yes, they are as follows:—

OBSERVATIONS ON THE SYSTEM OF EMPLOYING TROOPS AT ELECTIONS IN IRELAND. By a General Officer.

Anyone who reflects upon the deplorable occurrences at the late election at Drogheda, ought to be convinced of the necessity that exists for remedying one of the worst defects that a military system can be subject to, in its relations with the people, viz., the habitual and reckless employment on such occasions of troops armed solely with deadly weapons; the provocation to outrage, on the part of an excited populace being stimulated by the fact (well known to all) that soldiers dare not use their weapons; and are, therefore, at their mercy till the extremity of violence has been reached and the magistrate orders them to act; and then, there being but one course open to the officer, he has only to obey his orders and to fire on the people, who, after all, are only rioting.

The phase of contact with the mob which usually precedes the action of the troops, may be briefly described as follows: the bridles of the cavalry horses are seized, and the men struck with sticks; but as they must not use the swords swords that are in their hands, they have only to submit to be helplessly "driven back on the infantry," while the latter are thrust aside in their ranks, and the voters they are "escorting" deliberately struck in their presence; but the Snider rifle, good against an enemy at a thousand yards, may not avail the soldier against the citizen in this situation; indeed, he becomes more interested in preserving the rifle than the voter's head from injury. He may even see his officer "felled to the ground," and himself and comrades beaten and bleeding; yet, like the Hussar, he must remain passive; or, may be, unable to control himself under such injuries, he fires in defence of himself and officer, and the end is, that a countryman is slain, and the hapless soldier is cast into jail.

These are recent incidents; but, in one form or the other, the same occur at every contested election in Ireland.

The existence of the defect is therefore beyond dispute; and it is equally apparent that this defect is owing to the absence of a due gradation in the employment of physical force; in other words, because no other form of organised force is brought to bear at an election riot between the defeated efforts of the police and the fatal action of the military.

There does not appear to be any sufficient reason why other and more constitutional means might not be resorted to in these circumstances; it is proposed, therefore, to consider the subject from this point of view.

The principle of employing troops at all on such business is not here questioned; it is accepted as an evil necessity. The object of this paper is rather to propose a method by which the requirements of the civil authority should be effectually carried out by the troops; but not at the cost of their morale.

The law regards an election riot in a very different light from armed insurrection; and the citizen engaged in the first is treated differently from the rebel; still, however opposite in their character these may be, no corresponding change is ever made in the means with which the soldier is equipped for the suppression of either class of disturbance; that is to say, the sword or the rifle is to be ever in his hand, whether he is shot at by a rebel or pelted with mud by an independant elector, though his conduct in the respective cases is governed by widely different laws and liabilities.

In short, the effectiveness of the armed soldier at an election suffers inversion of its normal state, while his liabilities are increased in alarming proportion to the immunity enjoyed by the citizen.

But the soldier is himself a citizen; he is, therefore, entitled to share in all the consideration that a citizen can claim; and the highest and most important consideration that could be conceded to him is, that when required to aid the civil power at elections, it should be, in the first instance, in his capacity of citizen; in other words, troops should appear on such occasions as special constables, and not as armed soldiers, although retaining their military organisation in every other respect.

In offering this suggestion for consideration, it is not proposed to deny the use of troops armed with deadly weapons, upon the demand of the civil authorities; but, on the contrary in every case, one-third of the contingent should be fully armed, in reserve; and this proportion might be increased on the responsibility of the civil authorities, according to the nature of circumstances.

Major-Gen. M. McMurdo, C.B.

8 June 1869.

It is not expected that such a proposal will be received without numerous objections being raised; it is probably too much at variance with professional sentiment to be readily accepted; it may be said that the employment of soldiers in the capacity of special constables would be an unmilitary proceeding. It may be sufficient in reply, to point to the fact that nothing can be more unmilitary, false, or abnormal than the present situation of troops at elections in Ireland, as already described.

If it is objected that, to give sticks to the cavalry and truncheons to the infantry, would tend to provoke a conflict with the people; in reply, it may be observed that the reverse would appear to be actually the case. The provocation to conflict (or rather to outrage) already exists (as has been shown at the beginning of this paper), when soldiers armed with pointed weapons which they cannot use, are required to escort voters whom they cannot protect; but a different result might reasonably be expected if the proposed changes in their condition and equipment were effected. For example, the Dragoon, whose bridle is seized with a view to rendering him helpless, might now deliver a sharp stroke with a single stick on the wrist of his assailant; and it is not too much to say, this would be more likely to prove an inducement to let go than a provocation to further conflict; while the superior power of horses and their riders in "passaging" briskly through a crowd would cause these military special constables to be respected, instead of as at present, held in utter disregard.

With respect to the infantry, could the belief be seriously entertained that a man would dare to thrust a soldier aside in the ranks to reach the head of a voter he was escorting, if he saw the soldier and his comrades ready to make use of their truncheons? Mobs do not possess the rashness usually attributed to them; on the contrary, their elements are largely imbued with discretion; their courage and determination to mischief are always in accurate ratio with the timidity and incapacity for action displayed on the side of order. It is not, therefore, in their nature to regard a state of preparation to act, as a provocation to conflict.

The Irish, like any other people, will respect authority when legitimately and vigorously enforced; but it is not reasonable to expect that they, any more than Englishmen, will bear patiently the standing menace involved in the habitual display of deadly weapons at their elections.

7528. At Drogheda was not a soldier tried for having fired upon the mob and shot a man?—A soldier was tried in the Court of Queen's Bench in Dublin the other day, and I was present at the trial.

7529. He was tried, was he not, as a citizen, and not as a soldier?—Yes; he was tried as a citizen and not as a soldier.

7530. The troops are held in readiness all over the country before general elections in Ireland, are they not?—Yes; at the last general election they were distributed strategetically, as if the country was in a state of insurrection, and they must have been so distributed at vast cost.

7531. Is not the country in Ireland at the time of a general election in fact a military occupation?—Yes, clearly in military occupation.

Major-Gen. M. McMurdo, C.B.

8 June 1869.

7532. And at the last election you believe that there must have been an enormous sum of money spent in military movements?—There must have been a vast sum of money spent in military movements with this object: to escort voters great distances to the poll, necessitated the distribution of the whole garrison of Ireland all over the country in posts. The 14th Hussars, which formed part of the garrison of Dublin, were spread broadcast over Ireland, their right troop being up at Belfast and their left down at Kinsale.

7533. Just the same as if the country had been in open revolution?—Just so. I commanded the troops in Dublin on the day of the Dublin election, and the posts then occupied by the troops were 10 or 11 in number, and they were distributed as if the city had been in a state of siege, and insurrection apprehended; such a distribution was sufficient to have put down any insurrection.

7535. From whom did you receive those directions?—I received my directions first of all personally from Lord Strathnairn, who was anxious for the success of the operation, but he recommended me to see also General Sir Thomas Larcom, who was the secretary to the Government, and from whom the application for troops for that purpose had been received by Lord Strathnairn. I accordingly saw the Secretary to the Government upon the subject, and conferred with him.

7536. It is your opinion, I presume, that the present system does not tend to freedom of election in Ireland?—Very far from it.

7537. What remedy would you propose for the present state of things?—Considering that the employment of troops as I have described it, is a violation of the principles of popular election, I should recommend the total abolition of the system; bearing in mind, moreover, that the franchise has been greatly extended, if this system of employing troops to escort voters is continued, the complications will increase; I am therefore of opinion, that with the extension of the franchise, there should be a proportionate increase of protection to the people in the exercise of their rights, and that this can only be done by introducing the ballot.

7539. Do not you consider it very undesirable that the military should in those civil matters be brought into collision with the people in the exercise of a constitutional privilege?—Clearly, and every Englishman must think so too; it is contrary to all principles of freedom of election.

7540. Sir Frederick Heygate.] You consider, I believe, that it is not necessary to employ troops at elections; does your objection principally extend to conveying voters to the poll?—Yes.

7541. Do you extend that objection to maintaining the peace in towns where elections are being held?—I apprehend that soldiers must always be ready to be called upon to preserve the peace, if the civil power should fail in doing so; but in that case they should appear armed as citizens would be, and not with mortal weapons.

7542. But do you consider that they should not have their weapons with them, in case of emergency?—In that paper which has been put in, I have recommended that whatever number of troops are required in such a service, one-third, fully armed, should always be in reserve, and at the call of the magistrate, in the event of extreme measures; one soldier armed with a breech-loader is quite sufficient for a thousand or two thousand mob: two men firing and killing one person in Drogheda cleared the whole street.

7543. With regard to those elections in Ireland, is it not always the case that the military are accompanied by a resident magistrate?—Yes.

7544. Do you know any instance where the military have been used at elections where they have not been sent for upon the requisition of a magistrate?—We have got the most positive orders that we are not to send them unless they are called for by competent authority; that is to say, the magistrate, or the sheriff; a police constable may call out the military, he being a peace officer.

7546. In that instance were those troops sent down at the application of the magistrate?—It was upon the order of the Government, and I have no doubt that that order was induced by the application, either of a magistrate or of one of the candidates; but that I do not know; I only got the order of the Government from Lord Strathnairn, without question as to its source.

7547. Then your opinion would be, if I understand it, that military officers are better judges of the necessity of protection than the magistrates who make the application; could you state that, to the best of your belief, the troops were sent by the requisition of the magistrate in the district?—In the case of an apprehended attack, the magistrate must be the best judge. There was an apprehension of attack upon the convoy of voters coming from Garristown; but I am not aware that riot at the polling place was expected.

7549. If I understand you aright, because no attack attack was made upon those voters you consider that there was no danger, and never had been any danger?—Of course I do not know that; I only state the fact that this large body of troops did not meet with a single soul on their 12 mile march that opposed them, or even hooted at them. The ordinary means for obtaining correct information was open to the magistrate.

7550. Would not it be the natural consequence, if it was known to those people who intended to interrupt the voters, that they were escorted and protected by a large force of military, that they would not even attempt to interrupt them?—On the contrary, I think the military are rather an attraction for attack when convoying voters.

7551. Is this practice that you speak of, of employing the military, used at every election in Ireland?—Very generally, when the election is contested.

7553. If troops were not employed, what do you think would happen at elections?—If troops were not employed, then the Government would be compelled to adopt more sensible measures of election, such as the ballot, and also by increasing the polling places.

7554. Did you ever hear of intimidation by the priests in Ireland?—Yes; there are two influences at work with those tenant voters: the influence of the landlord, and the influence of the priest.

7555. Is it your opinion that it generally is the case that the tenants would almost always rather vote at the instigation of the priest than of the landlord?—I do not know about the instigation of the priest, but if he voted according to his own conscience I think he would not vote against the disestablishment of the Church.

7556. You stated, I think, that the whole of Ireland might be said to have been in military occupation at the last election; do you mean to say that every county in Ireland was in that condition?—Yes; without having reference to the Quartermaster General's returns, I am aware that the troops out of my command, and the troops generally from the garrisons of Ireland, were distributed about the country in numerous detachments.

7557. Were many troops sent up to the northern counties of Ireland?—Yes; a great number.

7558. Will you state the counties to which they were sent?—No, I cannot without reference to the Quartermaster General's returns. But one of the regiments in my brigade was sent to the northern counties; the 17th regiment, of 10 companies, was broken up into detachments.

7560. Do you think that the distance of the polling places from the voter's residence is a very great evil?—Very great.

7561. Are you aware that the late Government attempted to increase the number of polling places previous to the last election?—Yes: and it was a great mistake of the Opposition to defeat the measure.

7562. With regard to the riot which took place the other day in Wales at Mold, do you think that if the military had not been armed with rifles, there would have been less loss of life?—They would have done the work much better, and there would have been no loss of life, and no necessity to fire at all.

7563. Is it your suggestion that the military should have been allowed to attack the rioters with sticks beforehand?—Yes; by the infantry with quarter staffs, certainly. As I understand the Mold riot, the people had taken post upon high banks overlooking the road, and those banks ought to have been cleared by the infantry before the head of the column came under such a disadvantage.

7564. Do you think from your knowledge of Ireland that that principle of action would be efficacious?—I know it from the power given by organisation and drill.

7565. You suggested the ballot as another means of avoiding the use of troops in Ireland, but I presume you mean that the ballot should be held in certain polling places in the towns?—Yes.

7566. How would you propose to keep the access to the ballot clear in case the civil power is not strong enough?—We have some 12,000 or 13,000 constabulary, besides the town police in Ireland, which is an enormous amount of civil force.

7567. Has it not often been urged that the constabulary in the case of a general election taking place, in many towns, at the same time, would not be sufficient to maintain order?—In that case the troops might be called out, but they should be called out as special constables.

7568. In fact you would employ troops at an election after the manner of citizens?—Troops are liable, with other citizens, to be called out at any time for the suppression of civil riot. My only objection is to the troops being armed with mortal weapons when so employed; it renders them so thoroughly inefficient, and dangerous to their countrymen.

7569. If a voter had to exercise his right by the ballot, and had to come to the place where the ballot was kept, he must still be protected by either the civil or the military power, must he not?—I do not think that it would be necessary.

7570. Would not there be the same risk to the voter in coming to the place where the ballot was of his being attacked and interfered with by the mob?—I should think not; he would come as an individual, and not under the demonstration of a military escort.

7571. Not if he was known to be on the unpopular side?—I do not think so; it is a mere matter of opinion; but it is worth trying.

Major-Gen. M. McMurdo, C.B.

8 June 1869.

7572. I think you stated that the troops were always accompanied by a magistrate?—Yes.

7573. And that they were never sent except upon the requisition of a magistrate?—Never sent except upon the requisition of a magistrate.

7574. Do you attribute to those magistrates any political feeling in making the application?—I can hardly say so; the resident magistrates are appointed by successive Governments, and no doubt those Governments naturally appoint men favourites of their own, and no doubt there must be a particular bias here and there, but I am not able to state that; I have never heard any complaint of the magistrates; they have always done their duty rightly, I believe.

7575. Is it not the case that the great majority of the resident magistrates have been appointed by Liberal Governments?—That I do not know.

7576. Mr. Bright.] You have been asked what would happen if you had the ballot, and the troops were not used to convoy the voters; do you think generally that the voters who are thus convoyed by troops are on one side in those contests; do you ever convoy them on behalf of the side which is espoused by the priests?—I never heard of it.

7577. They are always, then, employed to convoy the electors who are going up on behalf of the party supported by the landlord?—Yes; I believe so.

7578. If you had the ballot, and no landlord and no priest could calculate with certainty as to how any voter would vote, would there be the same inducement to make attacks on voters, and the same necessity to guard them and convoy them?—Certainly not; it is for that very reason that I recommend that the ballot should be used; it would obviate the necessity for escort.

7579. If every man could vote as he liked, every man, in your opinion, would be free to go unmolested to the poll?—I believe so.

7580. You spoke of the election of Waterford, where the voters that you were sent to convoy had vanished?—Yes, they had vanished entirely, under cover of an attack made upon the escort.

7581. If at any point of the march near the polling place the troops were withdrawn, do you think that the voters that they convoy would generally vanish?—It is my impression, that if you had tenants to convoy and you said, "Now get off the cars and vote as you please," they would vanish in another direction altogether; but I must say that is only my impression. In the army we know well that the majority of those tenant voters are going contrary to their inclinations to vote as their landlords wish.

7582. With regard to the question of the troops interfering in any case at an election, I presume you know that there are cases in England where the troops interfere if there be a riot?—That is only in the suppression of riot, but not in taking an active part in escorting voters to the poll; that is never done in England.

7583. I presume your opinion is that the assistance of troops should be confined in Ireland, as it is in England, to maintaining the peace when there is a breach of the peace?—Yes.

7584. But that they should not be employed for any particular party in an election to convoy voters to the poll, where there appears no prospect of their being molested?—That is not only my own opinion, but the opinion of every officer of the army.

7585. Is this plan of convoy very general throughout Ireland?—Generally at all contested elections.

7586. Does it take place in Ulster, for example; have you any experience of Ulster?—No, I have not had experience of Ulster.

7587. But troops are sent down there, are they not, with the view to keep the peace?—Yes.

7588. But in the parts of the country with which you are more acquainted, where the landlords are mainly Protestants and Conservatives, and the tenants mainly Roman Catholics and Liberals, the system of convoy is extensively practised?—Yes, at contested elections.

7589. Mr. Villiers.] You do not mean to say, do you, that the voters who go in the interest of the landlord would always be assailed and attacked but for the military; as far as I have understood you, you have said that in Tipperary, for instance, when the troops are there they are chiefly employed to convoy voters who are under the influence of the landlords?—Yes.

7590. And you seldom are required to convoy those under the influence of the priest?—No, not to my knowledge.

7592. Does he dare to give his vote for the other side?—I have heard of individuals being hardy enough to do so, but as a general rule they do not.

7593. When a man has been rescued in this way from the convoy, does he dare generally to vote for the priest, or at least for the other side?—I believe they invariably keep out of the way and do not vote at all; we never hear of them again.

7594. In those cases, which I suppose frequently occur, where you say that the convoy has been attacked and the voters taken from the convoy, are they brought up to the poll?—I never heard of such a case.

7595. What do the voters do when they are rescued?—They simply escape.

7596. Chairman.] And it is an excuse to the landlord for not having voted?—Yes, that they were in fear of their lives from the attack.

7597. Mr. Villiers.] If they allege that they are in fear of their lives from attack, a convoy seems to be necessary, does it not, if they are to vote at all?—Under the circumstances; but if you provide a more sensible arrangement, that would not be so.

7598. I collect from what you say, that under the circumstances, if people are to vote at all a military convoy is required, at least for a portion of of them?—Yes, if a landlord is resolved to carry his tenants to the poll, he has only to apply to the Government under apprehension of attack, and troops are sent down in order to escort them.

7599. Have you ever seen elections in England?—Yes, I have.

7600. As you are familiar with them in Ireland, you would observe a great difference, would you not, in the character generally of the whole of the proceeding in England and in Ireland?—Perhaps my experience is not sufficient in England to give an opinion from my own knowledge, but from what I have read, I think that they are violent in England sometimes.

7601. But are not the people in Ireland generally more excitable, and are they not more under the immediate influence of the priest and the landlord as you have described them?—Yes; they are under antagonistic influences.

7602. And it is, perhaps, more necessary to have an extra force to protect them when they are exercising their right at an election?—I do not know that; I never would allow troops to interfere at elections, except, as I have said, to keep the peace.

7603. You make the suggestion that you would dispense with them, but until your suggestion is carried into effect, is it not necessary to have an extra force to enable voters to vote, for instance, in the south of Ireland?—No, I think not; I am completely against that principle.

7604. From what you have seen in Tipperary, do you think that troops might be dispensed with now, and that the election would be quiet?—The election would not be quiet without the provision of the ballot.

7606. Do you mean that the voters would not vote?—They would not go to the poll at all.

7607–17. Then the election could not be conducted without a military force?—Of course, at the present moment, you employ a military force, but I think it is a most unconstitutional act; you employ a force to execute an injustice.

7619. From your experience, would you say that it is a grievance with any part of the constituency of a large town, that the military should be there?—In escorting voters; it is a grievous injustice.

7620. Is it so viewed by the people?—It is so viewed.

7622. But that is in consequence of what you expect if the open voting continued, and you propose that there should be secret voting instead?—Yes.

7623. Do you know whether the troops dislike the service?—They get perfectly frantic about it, and they call out "Are we brought here to be murdered"?

7624. Are they generally ill-used by the mob?—I inspected a company that were ill-used by the mob at Drogheda; and I think that there were more than one half the men with cuts and bruises about them, and out of the 64 rifles that were employed there were 49 injured by stones and sticks.

7625. Is not a man allowed to defend himself when he is struck, or when a stone is thrown?—No, not according to military law; a man is not allowed to use his arms or fall out of the ranks without the orders of his officer.

7626. Are the constabulary ever used at elections?—Yes, the constabulary have been used at elections.

7627. And have they acted with effect?—Yes, they are armed.

7628. Mr. Hunt.] When you have been on duty at an election in Ireland, have you seen the priests about the streets at the time?—No, not more than usual; I have never seen much of them.

7629. Do you think that the priests have such an influence with the mob that they could stop any riot if they chose to exert that influence?—Very possibly; but I think that the feeling of the mob is not one of religion, but the right of exercising their vote, which is interfered with by the Government coercing them by military escorts.

7630. The point I am asking you about is this; do you think that the priests could prevent the mob assaulting voters who are so escorted, if they chose to use their influence?—The priests could do a great deal in that way, if they chose to do it.

7631. But they do not choose?—I do not suppose that they do choose.

7632. Have you never known any instance when you have been on duty of any minister of religion attempting to prevent the rioting that has been going on?—No, I never heard of it.

7633. The mob are on the same side as the priest, for the most part, are they not?—Yes, the mob are on the same side as the priest; as far as I understand the priests are on the Liberal side always.

7634. Do you think that the priests are not displeased at the mob exercising this intimidation?—I cannot say that.

7635. At all events they make no attempt to prevent it?—I never heard of it. The influence of the priests is exercised to counteract the influence of the landlords, I believe.

7636. The presence of the military might entirely be dispensed with, might it not, if the voters had an opportunity of voting nearer their own homes?—Yes, certainly, with the ballot.

7637. Even without the ballot, would it not be so?—Yes, by increasing the number of polling places; but I would dispense with the military by all means.

7638. Without the ballot, if the voters could vote near their own homes instead of coming up to the towns to vote, might not the presence of the military be dispensed with in almost every case?—

Major-Gen. M. McMurdo, C.B.

8 June 1869.

case?—It would very much modify the difficulty, I should suppose.

7639. The riots occur, do they not, from the town mobs attacking the rural voters, and those who escort them?—Not always.

7640. But for the most part?—Not always. The attacks are made in the country, and very well chosen attacks too, not in the towns.

7641. At the entrance to the towns?—Some distance from the towns.

7642. How far from the polling place have you known an attack made?—I cannot tell.

7643. But is not the attack generally made when the escort approaches the neighbourhood of the polling place?—No. With regard to the convoy from Garristown to Balbriggan, for example, which was about 12 Irish miles, I apprehended, and Lord Strathnairn agreed with me, that the attack, if made at all, would be made at certain cross roads, near a little village about half-way, and we apprehended the attack to be made by the people of the country, and not of the town.

7644. That was a case of voters leaving their own homes, and going a distance to vote?—Yes.

7645-46. But suppose those voters who you apprehended would be attacked at those cross roads could have voted nearer their own homes, would that attack have been likely to be made?—Not so likely.

7648. Very likely; but the mob intimidation would not be brought in in the great majority of cases?—The mob intimidation would be subdivided.

7649. Do you think that the presence of the military acts like a red rag to a bull?—Exactly. The people know very well that the soldiers dare not use their arms, and therefore they are all the more audacious.

7650. Do you think that if the ballot were adopted, there would be entire secrecy preserved as to how the electors had voted?—There might not be entire secrecy preserved as regards the influence of the priest over his parishioners; but as the influence of the priest cannot be avoided, it is better that a man should be under the influence of his priest than under the influence of his landlord.

7651. Do you think that the fear of eternal punishment has a better influence over a man than the fear of temporal consequences?—I think that spiritual tyranny is to be preferred to temporal tyranny; at all events, now he has got both.

7653. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Did I rightly understand you to say that the voters were taken as prisoners?—That is merely our feeling.

7654. But I presume that if any one of those persons were to tell the escort, or the commander of the escort, that he wished to be left, he would be left?—No, certainly not; no such discretion is given to officers.

7655. I understand your orders to apply only in the case of an attack upon the escort; but supposing that at starting any one of them said, "I do not wish to go," do you mean to say that the escort would compel him to go?—Certainly; he is committed to their charge. If such a principle was understood, then they might all go.

7670. With respect to the use of weapons, I understand that you would always keep a reserve of the military with their deadly weapons, to be called into action, in case of the defeat or retreat of those who had the civil weapons?—Yes.

7671. You stated just now, did you not, that the attacks in Ireland are generally organised?—The attacks upon convoys of voters have of late years been exceedingly well organised.

7672. Do not some of those mobs that so attack show symptoms of having been militarily organised?—Yes.

7673. They are under such command that they select proper passes in which to attack troops who are bringing convoys of voters?—Yes, of late years that has been the case; they are supposed to be headed by Irishmen who have acquired some smattering of military knowledge in America.

7674. Then assuming, for the purpose of argument, that the voters do require to be protected in going to the poll, the military are almost essential to protect them, are they not?—I would avoid giving occasion for attack, and for employing the military at all.

7675. That is your moral opinion upon the subject; but if there be an organised mob for the purpose of preventing voters from voting, who for the sake of argument we will assume to be voters, going freely to vote or wishing to go freely to vote, is it necessary to have the military to meet that organisation that is brought up against them?—Yes; in that case the evil cannot be avoided.

7676. You take the view that all the voters are coerced?—No, I said the majority of them.

7677. Do you not make any allowance for persons voting from old family attachment from having resided in the same place, and voting with their landlords without any coercion at all?—I might assume these to be about one-fourth.

7678. Then that one-fourth would, at all events, be be unable to get to the poll without some protection?—Under the present system perhaps they would.

7679. Do you think with the late Mr. Sheill, that a number of large villages, with a good mob of patriotic priests in each of them, tends to influence the voter before he gets to the polling place?—No doubt of it.

7680. And if there were a military escort, the votes even of those who wished to vote otherwise would be changed by the time that they got there?—No, I do not think so.

7681. They would be deterred from voting before they got there, would they not?—Yes, if the escort was attacked, and the voter escaped.

7682. And even with the ballot, in your opinion, polling places much nearer the residences of the voters are imperatively required?—I am not very sure of that; but perhaps it might be an assistance, and perhaps not.

7683. Do you think it a reasonable thing that any voter should go what you call a two days' march to the poll?—In the case of the ballot, it would carry him out of the circle of the influence of his landlord.

7684. For instance, take a Protestant tenant, do you think it would be a reasonable thing that he should have to go all that distance to record his vote, through what you evidently feel to be a hostile mob the whole way?—It would be very inconvenient.

7685. And I suppose that, even with the ballot, there would be a very shrewd suspicion of how a Protestant was going to vote?—That is quite true. It is a matter which I have not considered myself, because I am a soldier, and not a politician; but I agree with you now, that in that point of view the polling places or the ballot places ought to be closer together.

7686. At present, there is really very great suffering, is there not, on account of the great distance at which the polling places are situated, alike to the voters and to the military?—Yes, certainly.

7687. Mr. Bright.] Do you belong to the Roman Catholic or the Protestant Communion?—I am a Protestant.

7688. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Are we to understand that your opinion is that the undue influence which is exercised by those convoys of troops is confined to those counties where the landlords are Protestant and the tenants Roman Catholic?—Naturally that would be the case.

7689. Of course in the northern counties, the tenants would wish to vote on the same side as their Protestant landlords?—I assume so, but I have not had much experience of that.

7690. With regard to the Roman Catholic counties, of course in the last election, the Irish Church question exercised considerable influence over the voters?—Yes, naturally.

7691. What are the political opinions of the representatives returned by those counties?—I cannot say; I am a soldier.

7693. Do you take the county of Dublin as one of the counties in which voters were convoyed to the poll?—Yes; I commanded on that occasion.

7694. Cannot you give any other instance besides that?—I commanded also in Tipperary, but the election was not contested. I had nothing to do personally with the other counties.

7695. Supposing that, as a rule, you found that the Members returned by those counties were of the popular political opinion, what harm would the convoy of troops have done in those counties to the voters?—That is a question which I cannot answer. I only talk of the broad injustice. It is notorious that the majority of the voters are disinclined to be forwarded under escort in that manner, and therefore it is considered a great injustice.

7696. But the practical result has not been the return of candidates opposed to the popular feeling of the tenants?—I have never taken any notice of that.

7697. When you speak of Tipperary, had the landlords applied to the magistrates for convoys of troops there?—We were all prepared, as my instructions will show, to furnish the convoys to the magistrates and to the landlords.

7698. But, in spite of that readiness on your part, the priests were more powerful than the landlords, inasmuch as the priests' candidates were returned without a contest?—To tell you the truth, I do not know who was returned; I only know that the election was not contested, and that I had nothing to do. Politically, I never took the slightest interest in the matter.

7699. Do you not know the name of the candidates?—I really do not. I may add, that although I have a vote for Dublin, I have never exercised it, because I do not think it proper for an officer in command to interfere in political matters.

7700. You stated that some voters had to go 11 Irish miles to the polling places; what would that be in English miles?—I should say about 14 or 15 miles.

7701. Is it not possible that if the polling place is far distant from the residence of the voter, the popular feeling at the polling place may be very different from the feeling of the voter?—Yes, that is quite possible.

7702. As a rule, are not the politics of agriculturalists very often different from the politics of persons living in towns, upon very many public questions?—Yes; but Balbriggan, where the polling place was, was a mere country town; it was rather a part of the county, and not a borough.

7703. There are other places, are there not, quite as distant from the voters' residences?—Yes, there are.

7704. I presume, at all events, you would admit that there were some cases where voters might really wish to record their votes in opposition to the popular feeling prevailing at the polling place to which they were going?—That is possible; but I am unable to give any information upon that subject.

upon a convoy known to be marching by a certain route, at a certain hour, to a certain place. But from Garristown to Balbriggan, for example; there are three roads by which a voter could go; and no party could lay in wait for him if he chose his own hour and his own route.

7706. But there would be the same inducement, would there not, to stop those voters from voting as at present, under the system of open voting?—Supposing those voters to be protestants and known to vote with their landlords from their own wish, perhaps that might be so.

7707-8. That would be of course undue interference with their freedom of voting?— Yes, certainly.

7709. And you would propose, as I understand, to allow soldiers to be employed in a certain way in preserving order in such a case?—In preserving peace, soldiers can always be employed.

7710. Such interference might involve, might it not, a breach of the peace?—Yes, such interference might involve a breach of the peace, and in that case the soldiers would be liable, as any other class of citizens, to be called out to suppress a riot.

7711. You would call them out as special constables?—Yes, as special constables, with non-mortal weapons.

7712. And under the orders of their officers?—Yes, under the whole system of discipline and drill that we have in the army, only that the weapons should be left at home. I should give the infantry quarter-staves, and it would do them a great deal of good to learn how to use them.

7713. In the case of an important riot, how would you meet it?—There should always be one-third of the troops fully armed to meet serious cases.

7714. And they would only be called in in case of need?—They would be armed so as to act at any moment.

7715. Do you think that such an alteration as that would do away with a great many of the objections to the employment of the military in Ireland?—Yes; and I am quite sure that it would cause the military when interfering in riots to be respected by the people.

7716. Mr. Graves.] Do you consider that a quarter-staff in the hands of a soldier would be as well used as a shillelagh in the hands of a Tipperary man?—Putting a Tipperary man and a soldier with his quarter-staff in this arena here, I daresay the Tipperary man would beat the soldier; but remember that the whole organisation of a regiment, or a company, or a section, under its officers and non-commissioned officers, would be brought to bear against the mob, and then the soldier, as a unit of that organisation, would be superior to the Tipperary man.

7717. But it is usual, is it not, in those cases of attacks upon military convoys that those men are armed with sticks?—Yes, with sticks and stones as well.

7718. So that the mob would have a double advantage, in fact, in acting against the military under such circumstances?—The mob enjoy that double advantage now, for the military are encumbered with weapons they dare not use except in dire extremity. Put staves in the hands of soldiers, and the double advantage will pass to their side. When a mob holds an advantageous position it should be dislodged by turning, without an attack in front; that could always be managed.

7719. Is it not notorious that in those contests in Ireland each of the candidates generally selects a mob to assist him in canvassing?—Yes, that is very common, and I believe in England, too.

7720. But it is generally the case in Ireland?—Yes.

7721. Is not it a part of the tactics of an Irish election that those mobs should endeavour to intimidate each other or the voters?—The voters.

7722. And the candidate having the largest number of a mob, and the best armed, would probably have the greatest effect in influencing the voters if the military were not there to interfere and keep the peace?—There are two services in which the military are employed; the one is keeping the peace, and the other is escorting voters. I am not quite sure which the honourable Member means.

7723. I would ask you simply now to take a town in Ireland, and a contested election, with mobs on each side, as is usual; what substitution for preserving the peace would you propose in place of the military?—In case of riot I think the military ought to be called out to assist in keeping the peace, but with non-mortal weapons.

7724. Did I rightly understand you to say that the military had a very injurious effect in exciting the mob in Ireland?—They excite the mob when employed in coercing voters, and because they have in their hands weapons which they dare not use.

7725. And, therefore, they are not upon equal terms?—No; they are not upon equal terms, because a soldier dares not use his rifle, and the mob who attack him know this, too.

7726. Then you would still have the military for the preservation of the peace, but not to be used in any way as convoys for voters, as I understand you?—Yes, that is so.

7727. Are you at all aware of the evidence which was given before the Tipperary Election Committee of 1867?—No; not all.

7728. You were not in Ireland at that time, were you?—Yes, I was; but I did not read all that evidence.

7729. You are aware, perhaps, that the Committee reported that very serious disturbances had taken place at that election?—Yes.

7730. Do you at all suppose that those disturbances were in any way connected with the appearance of the military as convoys?—Of course, the fact that the people were aware that the military were taking their brethren almost as prisoners from one spot to another, for the purpose of making them vote as their landlords desired them, and not according to their inclinations, excited the people against the military, and they attacked the military, and in some cases with success.

7731. In that particular case I see that there was a large amount of abduction of voters without any military being present; would you consider that that should be allowed?—It should not be allowed, but I think that the military ought not to be employed in obviating it.

7732. Did I understand you to say that the priests in Ireland at the time of a general election would be more active than at other times?—No; I have read of priests being exceedingly active, but I have never seen it myself.

7733. You

7733. You have stated that the landlords were the parties who have generally made the application for this particular kind of protection for their voters; who is the person really responsible for the preservation of the peace in the conduct of an election in a borough in Ireland?—I fancy the mayor, and the magistrates are responsible.

7734. Would the landlords at all have any right to interfere in a borough?—No; the landlord applies to the Government for an escort through the county to escort his voters to the polling place.

7735. As far as the boroughs are concerned, the landlords do not appear at all there?—No, not at all.

7736. As regards the counties, is it not the usual course that the application should come from the magistrates, or through the sheriff?—Yes.

7737–52. What means have you of knowing that those applications come from the landlords?—Only by inference. I mentioned in a former part of my evidence that my instructions came from the Government, influenced, no doubt, by landlords who wanted to have their voters protected.

7753. Do you know upon what requisition the magistrates act; is it upon the sworn information of anyone as to the necessity of employing the military, or do they act simply from private information?—I think it is from private information as well as sworn information; but I cannot state positively.

7754. Are you in the habit of receiving the orders of individual magistrates, or the magistrates sitting in petty sessions?—Our orders are to obey the orders of any magistrate, or any sheriff.

7755. For the purpose of the convoy of voters, what orders do you receive?—For the purpose of the convoy of voters, we generally receive our orders from head quarters; that is, from the Commander of the Forces office, through the Military Secretary, and he receives a requisition from the Government, but where the Government receive their requisition from I am not able to say.

7756–57. Then it is from a communication between the magistrates of the locality and the Government?—Yes, I apprehend so.

7758. Mr. Whitbread.] Speaking of the conveyance of voters by convoys to vote against their inclinations, did you ever know a case where a voter so convoyed expressed his wish to leave the convoy, and permission to do so was refused to him?—No, I never heard of such a case.

7759. Chairman.] Are the views which you have expressed, do you think, generally held by officers?—Yes.

7760. Have you discussed this subject very much?—Yes, a good deal as to the escort of voters.

7761. Do you think it is generally regarded by the officers as being a service on which the troops ought not to be employed?—Yes, that is their opinion.

7762. Sir Frederick Heygate.] Do you know the Irish constabulary?—Yes.

7763. How are they armed?—With a rifle and sword bayonet.

7764. Are they armed in all respects in the ordinary way that soldiers are?—Yes.

7765. Are they drilled in the same way?—In the same way, and magnificent troops they make.

7766. In fact you consider them in the light of a military force?—Yes, quite so, to all intents and purposes; they are the connecting armed link between the civil power and the military.

7767. And yet it is to this body that you would entrust the duty of maintaining the peace at elections in towns?—Not armed; they should be provided with staves in the same manner that soldiers should be provided; I would not ordinarily allow a mortal weapon to be used against a crowd.

7769. When they are called upon to preserve the peace in towns where there is an apprehension of an election riot, you would not allow them to have their arms with them?—Not then.

7770. What would you substitute for their arms?—A quarterstaff and a truncheon; one-third remaining armed.

7771. Have you had much experience in Ireland for a long period of time?—No, only two-and-a-half years.

7772. Were you ever there before?—Yes, as a young officer.

7773. But you never had any experience in command, or in a responsible position, until within the last two years?—Not as a general officer, but I had a collision with the people as a subaltern officer in command.

7774. Do you think, from what you have seen of the people of the country, that the constabulary would be able to maintain the peace with the ordinary truncheon or quarterstaff in Ireland?—Not invariably, perhaps; but when a riot takes place it is usually upon the occasion of some election, or other municipal function, and in that case there is generally a concentration of constabulary, as there is a concentration of the military, and whatever number of constabulary was so concentrated, and called out, for the suppression of a civil riot, this force should, with the exception of one-third of their number, leave their arms behind, as the military should do, and act in a body with non-mortal weapons. But the normal state of the Irish constabulary is that of an armed body, which I would not alter at present.

7776. You are aware, that in the case of riotous assemblies in England, special constables are largely employed; from what you know of Ireland, do you think it possible that special constables could be called out and act efficaciously in Ireland?—I am afraid not; the circumstances of Ireland at present put that out of the question.

Major-Gen. M. McMurdo, C.B.

8 June 1869.

7777. Then you consider that there is no difference really between the constabulary in Ireland armed with the rifle and the military armed with the rifle?—Militarily there is no difference, but the constabulary are also peace officers.

7778. Therefore, my objection to employing the military applies equally to the constabulary?—Yes, in point of concentration or concentrated action.

7779. Mr. Bright.] I understand from your evidence that you rather prefer the influence of the priest to the influence of the landlord in Ireland?—Yes; you cannot have the influence of the landlord exercised without also the influence of the priest, so that there is a double influence exercised upon the tenant, and if the tenant was to be deprived of any, I would much rather that he was deprived of the influence of the landlord and remain with his priest.

7780. Do you suppose that the existence of the intimidation or coercion of the landlord excites and is the cause in many cases of the exercise of the influence of the priest?—The influence of the priest is exercised to counteract that of the landlord, of course.

7781. If you had the ballot I understand your opinion to be, that the influence of the landlord, not the influence to which some reference has been made, which comes from old connection and from sympathy, but the illegitimate influence, would be destroyed; do you think that that state of things would tend greatly to lessen the influence of the priests, and the part which they now take in elections?—It would make it less called for, and the priest would not meddle so much in politics as he does at the present time.

7782. You were asked by the Chairman whether, amongst the officers, the question of employing the military was a subject of discussion, and you said that it was; should you say the same with regard to the question of the ballot, as a means of tranquillising elections in Ireland?—That has never been discussed by the officers—officers never discuss politics. I stated it because my own opinion was asked.

7783. But I mean with regard to their own duties?—They are quite clear with regard to their own duties, that they ought not to be employed in escorting voters.

7784. That is your clear opinion?—Yes; and the clear opinion of the officers of the army generally.

7785. Chairman.] Has that question of the employment of soldiers as special constables also been much discussed?—No; never.

7786. You do not know whether your views on that subject are agreed in by other officers?—No; they are not likely to be agreed in, because all professions have got very strong prejudices, and it would require some time for the officers to understand the change that I propose. I have never discussed it with the officers at all.

7787. You think that probably at first sight it would not be popular?—Perhaps not; I cannot tell 7788. The O'Conor Don.] You stated, in answer to a question from one member of the Committee, that requisitions for troops to escort voters always came from the magistrates; are we to understand by magistrates resident magistrates or local magistrates?—If I said so, I must have made a mistake; what I meant to say was, that those requisitions reached us through the Government, and the military secretary.

7789. They never came direct to you from the magistrates?—Never; a magistrate has the power to call upon us to suppress a riot at any time; even a police officer could turn the military out for that purpose.

7790. You are not aware of a requisition ever being made to a commanding officer to give an escort for the conduct of voters direct from the magistrate to the commanding officer?—I think, perhaps, I have not made myself understood. The Government desire that a certain county where a contested election is apprehended should be occupied so as to give escorts to voters when required. That is the chief requisition; and those requisitions, which I will call subsidiary requisitions, are given to the officers commanding the various posts, by the resident magistrates at those posts, and the local magistrates.

7791. Therefore a local magistrate who is also a landed proprietor, having a large number of tenant voters, can, of his own motion, apply to the officer for an escort to escort his tenants to the poll?—Yes; and the officer is bound to comply with the requisition.

Mr. James Kennedy, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Kennedy.

7792. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Where do you reside?—In the parish of Sanquhar, in Dumfriesshire.

7793. What is your occupation?—I am a tenant farmer.

7794. What is the amount of your holding?—I pay about 3,000 l. a year for land in the counties of Dumfries, Kirkcudbright, and Caithness.

7795. What is the amount of your holding in the county of Dumfries?—£ 1,000 a year.

7796. Under how many landlords are you tenant?—In Dumfriesshire only one.

7797. Are you under the same landlord in the other counties?—No; they are all different landlords.

7798. Did you take an active part in the Dumfriesshire elections of 1868 and 1869?—I did, more particularly in the second election in March in this year.

7799. Were you chairman, or an active member on any committee?—I was chairman of a parochial committee, and chairman of the general meetings of the tenant farmers, held at Dumfries, on behalf of the Conservative candidate.

7800. You were connected also with the election in 1868; to what do you attribute the loss of that election by the Conservatives?—To the want of general organisation, and perhaps more particularly to the very prevailing idea in the county amongst the tenant farmers that the sitting Member would be returned by a large majority; consequently, a great number of the tenant farmers did not come up to the poll.

7801. The county had not been tested for many years previously, had it?—I believe not for 60 years, or something like that.

7802. Therefore there was a general feeling amongst the tenant farmers that a resident candidate date would be certain to win as against a non-resident?—There was.

7803. What feeling did the result of that election excite amongst the tenant farmers in Dumfriesshire?—A very unsatisfactory one.

7804. In what way?—In this way; we consider that a stranger who knew nothing of the interests of an agricultural county, such as Dumfriesshire is, was not a proper person to represent, more particularly the tenant farmers that I speak of.

7806. Do you mean that a good many persons promised Sir Sidney Waterlow their support, thinking that there would be no other candidate?—Yes.

7807. You were present, I suppose, at those meetings to which you have alluded?—I was present at most of them; indeed I was at all but two, I think.

7808. Of what class were the people who attended those meetings?—Principally tenant farmers.

7809. Was there any influence exercised by the landlords in getting up those meetings?—No; it was entirely a tenant farmers' movement.

7810. Did the landlords take any action in the matter at all?—Some of them did, but not generally speaking.

7811. In what way did they take action; were they cordially in accordance with the tenant farmers in wishing that there should be a contest?—No; the landlords generally expressed themselves against the movement.

7812. Am I to understand from you that the people in Dumfriesshire, who were really anxious for a Conservative candidate to be brought forward at the second election, were tenant farmers?—Yes, that is my belief.

7813. That was, I believe, mainly on the ground that they wished for a local representative who was connected with the county, and who understood agricultural questions?—Yes.

7814. Who were the persons who mainly canvassed at that second election on behalf of Major Walker?—The tenant farmers.

7815. Did you canvass on his behalf?—I called on one or two voters; a very few indeed.

7816. Were those tenant farmers who canvassed on his behalf the smaller class or the larger class of farmers?—The larger class, generally speaking.

7817. They are persons of independent position, are they not?—Yes, persons of independent positions, quite.

7818. It was stated by one of the witnesses before this Committee that the majority of the tenant-farmers in Dumfriesshire voted for the Liberal candidate; is that your opinion?—No, that is not the case; there were somewhere about two-thirds of the tenant farmers voted for the Conservative candidate.

7819. Can you give the Committee any idea of the class of voters by whom Sir Sidney Waterlow was mainly supported?—They were tradesmen and merchants in the smaller towns and villages in the county, such as Moffatt, Langholm, Lockerbie, and Penpont.

7820. Was the contest, then, rather one of the agricultural class against those resident in the small towns?—Yes, that was the contest principally.

7821. And those who supported Major Walker did so perfectly independently of their landlords?—Quite so.

7822. It has been stated that the election of 1869 was turned by the undue influence of the landlords in favour of Major Walker; what is your opinion as to that statement?—I have reason to meet with a great many tenant farmers in the county in my usual business, and since reading that evidence I have made some inquiry, and I have not been able to find a single case, nor have I ever heard a single tenant complain of any undue influence either in the way of intimidation or by other means, fair promises, or anything of that kind.

7823. The evidence of intimidation that was given before this Committee was rather general, I think, than special; at least no cases being named, it is difficult, of course, to look at it except in a general light, but looking at it in a general light, could any general system of intimidation have existed without your knowledge?—I do not think so.

7825. Are you aware that in some cases the fact of a person being on a committee has been taken as a proof of agency?—I am not aware of that fact.

7826. But if that were so, you would be of opinion that, as regards the factors, they were on Major Walker's committee, and could easily have been proved to have been his agents?—Yes.

7827. Were you present at the nomination?—Yes, at the nomination in 1868; not at the last nomination.

7828. Did the nomination in 1868 go off quietly?—There was no mob and no riot; but the Conservative candidate and his nominator and seconder were not heard.

7829. Did those present make a noise and decline to hear them?—Yes.

7830. Were you present at any polling places in the election of 1869?—I was present at Thornhill, in both elections.

7831. Were there any difficulties put in the way of the voters for Major Walker upon that occasion?—In 1868 there was a good deal of abuse to Major Walker's supporters, such as throwing rotten fish, and soot, and spitting upon people who voted for Major Walker.

Mr. J. Kennedy.

8 June 1869.

7832. Were any persons severely injured?—No; some gentlemen were put down in the street; jostled so much as to be thrown down in the street.

7833. Then there was a sort of rabble in favour of the other candidate?—Yes.

7834. It was stated that it was generally believed that those tenants who had leases to run out, and who voted for the Liberal candidate, would not have their leases renewed; so far as you have been able to learn, is there any general opinion of that kind?—No, I do not think there is.

7835. Do you think so yourself?—No, I have no such idea.

7836. It is stated that the Dissenting clergy in Dumfriesshire did not exercise any undue influence in their chapels; what is your opinion upon that point?—There were meetings held in their chapels, and on some occasions they took the chair, and made very violent speeches.

7837. Did any cases come to your knowledge where the supporters of the Conservative candidate were named and abused in consequence of the support given to him?—There were none named that I am aware of.

7838. Were they violent speeches mostly?—Yes, mostly so.

7839. It was mentioned that public opinion in Dumfriesshire had since the election turned in favour of the ballot, and that a petition had been signed by a great number of people in favour of the ballot; do you know what the class of persons were who signed that petition?—I never knew that there was a petition until I saw it in the evidence here; I never heard of it in the county, at least, not in the parish where I reside; there was no such thing there.

7840. I think one of the witnesses said that a great many of the tenant farmers who voted for Major Walker at the last election were anxious for the ballot; is that your opinion?—No, it is not.

7841. Do you think that that is the case?—I do not think that the tenant farmers wish for the ballot as a rule.

7842. It is strange that you should not have heard of that petition, because it was signed by 5,000 or 6,000 people; is not that a large number out of the population of Dumfriesshire?—The population is 78,000.

7843. Therefore you would hardly take that as representing the feeling of the county?—No; I believe those signatures must have been mostly got in the boroughs or in the villages. I do not think it was general at all in the landward part of the county.

7844. Are there many resident landlords in the county, or does the county belong mainly to absentee proprietors?—The majority of the landlords reside.

7845. You stated that the farmers were very active in canvassing for Major Walker at the election of 1869; were there many paid agents employed on his behalf at that election?—Only one that I am aware of.

7846. Then there must have been a considerable difference, I imagine, in that respect between the election of 1868 and that of 1869? Yes.

7847. There is a statement, I think, made by one witness, relating to the election of 1868, in answer to Question 5983, "At the very beginning of the last contest, the Conservative agent issued retaining fees to from 12 to 15 lawyers and bank agents in the small villages throughout the county, those men received fees of from 80 to 100 guineas; they did not do work sufficient to justify that payment, and they were paid for the influence they could exercise upon their clients, and not for any work that they could have done in canvassing." What is your opinion as to the truth of that statement?—There were more paid agents in 1868, that I am aware of; but so far as exercising any influence, I do not think that those agents were appointed for any such purpose.

7848. Was the feeling of the tenant farmers in favour of a resident candidate so keen in the election of 1869 that it was found possible to dispense with paid agents practically?—Yes.

7849. In fact, they were willing to work as well as vote?—They were very willing to work, indeed.

7850. When it was known in Dumfriesshire that evidence had been given before the Committee as to intimidation by landlords, was there any feeling evoked among the tenant farmers?—They were very indignant, generally speaking.

7851. Was there a great wish on the part of any of them to come up and give evidence to the contrary?—Yes, I believe any number might have been got to have come up to be examined.

7852. You came up entirely of your own free will and by your own wish, did you not?—Quite at my own free will.

7853. In point of fact, do you appear here because you wish to tell the Committee that the last election was fought by a particular class?—Yes, by the tenant farmers, of whom I am one myself.

7854. To what class do you consider that the success of the last election in Dumfriesshire was owing?—To what I have already stated regarding the voters that did not come forward in 1868; they came forward many of them in 1869.

7855. Why did they do so?—Just because their feeling was towards a local candidate.

7856. It was on account of their own feeling, and not on account of any undue pressure?—On account of their own feeling entirely, I believe.

7857. Mr. Leatham.] Did the factors generally take an active part in the last election?—Nothing like so active as the tenant farmers.

7858. But the factors, you say, were, with very few exceptions, on the committees?—Yes.

7859. And the landlords also?—Yes.

7860. Do not you think that the fact of the landlords and the factors being on committees, would be likely to weigh with the tenant farmers as a body?—No, I do not think so.

7861. Was the present Member returned by a large majority at the last election?—A majority of 36, I think.

7862. And beaten by how many at the preceding election?—Forty-four.

7864. Why did Mr. Hope-Johnstone refuse to stand?—He did not give any reasons that I am aware of.

7865. You

7865. You do not think that it was because he thought it uncertain whether he would be returned?—No, I do not think so; it was his age, I think.

7866. Mr. Edward Egerton.] He sat in Parliament for 40 years, did he not?—I believe he did.

7867. Mr. Leatham.] Has your attention been called to the special cases of intimidation mentioned by Mr. McGowan?—No; I read Mr. McGowan's evidence.

7868. But your attention has not been called to all the cases that he mentioned?—No.

7869. Have you any idea who he meant by the persons to whom he referred?—I have no certain idea; I have heard what the country has said in the matter.

7870. You are not in a position to contradict any one of those alleged instances of intimidation?—No; I am not.

7871. Mr. Bright.] To what church do you belong?—To the Established Church of Scotland.

7872. You said that the Dissenting ministers made violent speeches; who are the Dissenting ministers?—The United Presbyterians, and the Free Church are the principal bodies.

7873. Do you call them Dissenters in Scotland?—We do.

7874. Did you hear any of the speeches?—No; I did not.

7875. You do not often go, I suppose, to Dissenting places of worship?—No.

7876. Still not having heard any of them you say that they made very violent speeches?—Some of them were reported in the newspapers.

7877. How many years was it before this last election, that there was a contest in your county?—I believe 60 years.

7878. What have been the politics of the Members during the whole of that time?—Generally speaking, the Conservatives have held the county.

7879. And the last Member had been a resident, had he not?—Yes.

7880. And at the general election the landlords, you say, did not care about a contest, and rather discouraged it?—At the last contest they did.

7881. Was the reason why the landlords discouraged it that they did not see much hope of success?—Yes, that was one reason given.

7882. They judged, I presume, from the general feeling of the county?—Yes, and the advantage which Sir Sidney Waterlow had in having got those cards sent in signed that they would support him,; and likewise the defective state of the registration roll.

7883. But the landlords felt that the feeling of the county was against their views, and therefore they were not disposed to contest it, until some of the farmers stepped out and provoked a contest?—That was so.

7884. Chairman.] Mr. McGowan stated that a considerable number of voters who had voted for the Liberal candidate in the election of 1868, voted against the Liberal candidate in 1869; do you know whether that is the fact or not?—There were a few, not many.

7885. Enough to turn the election?—I think there were 17 that voted for Major Walker in 1868 voted for Sir Sidney Waterlow in 1869; and 14 that voted for Sir Sidney Waterlow in 1868 voted for Major Walker in 1869.

7886. You think that there was about as much change on one side as on the other?—There was more; three more changes in the one case than in the other.

7887. Did you attempt to find out the reason of the change in any cases?—No, I did not.

7888. Do you know whether those who changed were in any cases tenant farmers?—I do not know any of them; there were none of them in my neighbourhood of the county, so that I cannot speak anything about them.

7889. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] The fact of many of the landlords and factors being on Major Walker's committee would scarcely be sufficient to intimidate the farmers, would it?—No; I do not think so.

7890. I suppose the Scotch farmers are not very easily intimidated?—I am glad to say that we are in a position, so far, independent of our landlords.

7891. One question as to agents; it was stated, and I think you agree with it, that Major Walker, at the election in 1868, had many more agents than Sir Sydney Waterlow; are you aware that Sir Sydney Waterlow employed any other agents except those resident in the county?—Yes; I am aware that he had a staff of professional men from London.

7892. Did he bring them down with him?—Yes, he did.

7893. And, therefore, that might be a reason why he should require to employ fewer in the county?—Yes.

Captain Carthew Yorstown, called in; and Examined.

7894. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] Are you a resident in Dumfriesshire?—Yes.

7895. Did you take an active part in the last election?—Yes.

7896. And in the one in 1868?—Both.

7897. You have heard the evidence of Mr. Kennedy; do you concur in what he has stated?—Distinctly.

7898. Do you wish to add anything to it upon the general question of intimidation by landlords?—I may state my own experience, which is not that of a tenant farmer, but I reside as a proprietor in the county. The proprietors and the tenant farmers of the district meet very often, and I think if it had existed to any extent, or I may say at all, in any marked instance, I could not have failed to have heard of it. I have never heard upon any occasion, or in any class, any case of intimidation or oppression alluded to.

7899. Do you concur with Mr. Kennedy that a very large proportion of the farmers supported Major Walker, and not Sir Sydney Waterlow?—Distinctly. The majority against Major Walker was made up chiefly of the residents and tradesmen in small towns and villages; and if I remember rightly, 272 electors in these towns and villages, most of whom were enfranchised by the Act of 1868, voted at the elections of 1868 and 1869, and of these 203 voted for Sir Sydney Waterloo, while only 69 voted for Major Walker. I think that that showed an overwhelming majority majority for the Liberal candidate at those places.

Captain C. Yorstown.

8 June 1869.

7900. You would concur, would you not, in the opinion expressed by the last witness, that it was a contest rather between the rural and the urban population?—Certainly. The greater part of the wealthy farmers of the county. Eight-tenths of the entire agricultural interest, proprietors and tenants, were in favour of Major Walker.

7901. Are the wealthy farmers whom you speak of well known to be an independent class?—Yes, they all hold long leases, and they are independent of the landlords, as much so as the landlords are of them, I think.

7903. In fact, the change of tenancy was due to that circumstance?—Yes, it was due to the rise of rent, which the old tenant refused to give; that is, as I am informed, upon the best authority.

7904. Is there any other special case which Mr. McGowan referred to with which you are acquainted?—No; they are so indefinite that I really cannot speak of them with any degree of certainty. The limekiln pointed distinctly to one particular case; but as to the other cases I cannot say anything.

The Marquis of Hartington.	Mr. Villiers.
Sir Frederick Heygate.	Mr. Whitbread.

THE RIGHT HON. THE MARQUIS OF HARTINGTON, IN THE CHAIR.

Mr. WILLIAM SCOTT, called in; and Examined.

Mr. W. Scott. 11 June 1869.

7905. Mr. Leatham.] YOU are the tenant of the Marquis of Lothian, are you not, to whom Mr. Otto referred in his examination?—Yes.

7906. Do you object to state the sum which you pay in rent to various landlords?—I pay over 5,000*l.* per annum.

7907. Have you taken any other farm since you received notice to quit from the Marquis?—I have taken the farm of Cessford, belonging to the Duke of Roxburgh.

7908. Is it a large farm?—Yes, I believe it is, perhaps the largest arable farm in Scotland.

7909. About how many acres of arable land altogether do you farm?—Something near to 3,000 acres of arable besides pasture land.

7910. What rent do you pay to the Marquis of Lothian?—About 800*l.* to the Marquis of Lothian.

7911. Do you remember the conversation at Hawick, to which Mr. Otto referred as the probable cause of your dismissal?—I do not know whether it is the conversation referred to or not, but I remember having a conversation on election matters both at Hawick and elsewhere. I was often twitted by the statement that as my farm was nearly out of lease, they knew pertectly well who I would vote for; and being often twitted, I very indignantly repelled the statement, and said that I would neither be influenced by one thing nor another; that I would vote according to my own opinions, independently of either the farm or Lord Lothian. I stated this to other parties with whom I met. I was very frequently twitted both in Hawick and other places over the county.

7912. Was it at a farmers' dinner that you stated this?—No.

7913. Was it a farmers' meeting?—No, not a meeting of farmers at all.

7914. Not any public occasion at all?—No.

7915. Are you quite sure that you used no disrespectful epithet, speaking of either the Marquis or the family?—I am quite sure of it.

7916. Did Mr. Otto tell you why the notice to quit was given you at the time when he told you that you should leave your farm?—He did.

7917. Are you quite positive of that?—Quite positive upon that.

7918. It was not an inference in your own mind?—Not in the slightest; he told me positively. We had a long conversation.

7920. Are you quite sure that he used the words "because you voted against his brother"?—Quite sure.

7921. Has your brother had any conversation with Mr. Otto since with respect to your dismissal?—Yes.

7922. Did your brother state to you the purport of that conversation?—Yes.

7923. Did that confirm or remove your belief as to the cause of your losing your farm?—It confirmed it. It was to the effect that the Marquis of Lothian had done it on the spur of the moment after the election, but that he had no doubt that the Marquis regretted it now.

7925. Was the agreement signed?—Yes, in 1867, with the exception of one which was early in 1868.

7926. That was a whole year before?—It was 12 months before the election.

Mr. W. Scott.

11 June 1869.

7927. A portion of a letter was put in the other day which was stated was written by you to the Marquis, but the whole of the letter was not put in; are you in a position to place the rest of the letter before the Committee?—Yes, I have a copy of it.

7928. Sir George Grey.] Did you make a copy of the letter at the time you sent it?—Yes.

7929. Is this the copy which you now produce?—It is.

7930. Mr. Leatham.] Will you read the letter to the Committee?—

"Timpendean, 16 December 1868.

"My Lord,

"A sense of duty to myself, and justification of my conduct at the late election, induced me to write to you on the present occasion. Mr. Otto, yesterday, communicated to me your Lordship's resolution, declining to re-let me this farm, because I had voted against your brother, Lord Schomberg Kerr, at which I expressed my surprise and regret, as no such case has ever happened on the estate before. A statement of facts will best illustrate my case. When canvassed I expressed my regret that I could not vote for Lord Schomberg Kerr; and when I say I regret, I say so in earnest, as in other circumstances nothing would have given me greater pleasure. I told Mr. Otto that I had spoken, written, and been examined on the principal subjects before the country, and had given my opinion in such a way that I could not degrade myself by having spoken one way and voting another, but that out of respect for my landlord and his brother I would take no part in the election against beyond giving my vote. This I did, and even advised some parties who were hesitating between the two candidates to vote for Lord Schomberg Kerr; and so closely did I keep my mind to myself, for fear of influencing a single voter against him, that the other party did not know till I went to the poll how I was going to vote. On this I can refer you to Mr. Otto, who complimented me that I had behaved remarkably well in that respect, and very different from others he could name. Three of my brothers were on the committee, and voted for Lord Schomberg Kerr, and one against; and the landlord (Sir G. Warrender) of the one who voted against him came and stayed with him the night before the polling, and both went together to the poll in good friendship, and voted against each other. I cannot see, my Lord, why I am singled out as the scapegoat of the election as if I had canvassed and done my utmost for the other side; nay, I cannot believe your Lordship will remove me as a tenant for giving my conscientious vote after having spent so large a portion of my life on the estate in comfort, and happiness, and peace to my family and myself; and I trust not increditably to my landlord. Even as a matter of expediency, I cannot think it would be advisable, as many Conservatives have told me I could neither honourably nor conscientiously do otherwise at the election; and if they know my position (which I trust they will never need to know) will sympathise with me in the matter; and my brothers, what are they to do at next election? I do not mention these circumstances in any hostile spirit, but a straw in the air indicates which way the wind blows. The questions at present before the country will no doubt get settled ere long, and others may arise on which our views may coincide. I trust, therefore, your Lordship, in the circumstances, will give the whole matter your early and favourable consideration, and I have the honour to be, &c. &c."

7931. To that letter you received no answer I believe?—No answer whatever.

7932. Either verbally, or through the post?—In no shape whatever.

7933. Did Mr. Otto ever refer to that letter in conversation with you afterwards?—No; we have never had any conversation on politics since.

7934. Mr. Hunt.] You say that Mr. Otto told you that Lord Lothian was not going to renew your lease because you voted against his brother?—Yes.

7935. Do you remember on what occasion he said that?—Perfectly.

7936. Will you tell us when it was?—He came to me at Jedburgh Market after I had written to him about hearing the story with regard to breaking my pledge.

7937. On what day is the market held?—It is held on the Tuesday; I think it would be the 15th of December; the letter is dated the 16th.

7938. You wrote to Mr. Otto, did you not, in the summer of 1868, about the renewal of the lease of your farm?—I wrote after the harvest, but I had previously a conversation with Mr. Otto.

7939. You had some conversation about the time of the election, was it not, with Mr. Otto?—Yes; at different times.

7940. Was this the conversation that you speak of with Mr. Otto, when he intimated to you that your lease would not be renewed; was that the time when he came to you and said that it was his duty to tell you that your lease would not be renewed?—Yes; he came to me and told me, first, that he had got my note, and that he never imagined I had broken my pledge, and then he added I may just as well tell you that nothing more can be done about the farm.

7941. When was that, do you remember?—It was on a Tuesday, and I think it was the 15th of December.

7942. Can you tell us the words which Mr. Otto used?—Yes.

7943. What did he say?—He said, "I may just as well tell you that nothing more can be done about the farm"; I said, "Why, what is up?" He said, "I have the report cut and dry, ready for the Marquis's approval, but he positively declines to renew the lease, because you voted against his brother."

7944. Do you say that those words were used by Mr. Otto?—I do.

7945. Just try and recollect; is not it the case that you observed to Mr. Otto that it was on account of the way that you had voted; will you undertake to say that you did not suggest to Mr. Otto that it was on account of the way in which you voted?—I will; I am quite positive upon it.

7946. And that he said so himself?—Yes, quite positive.

7947. Mr. Otto had been over your farm, had he not, to make a report upon it?—Yes, he had been over my farm previously.

7948. Had you gone into the question of rent then?—Not into the rent; we went into the question question of conditions, but not of the rent then.

7949. You mean the conditions for the renewal with you?—Yes.

7950. Were there any changes of conditions proposed?—Yes, a number of conditions were proposed.

7951. By you?—Both by Mr. Otto and myself.

7952. And nothing was said about rent?—Not then, in going over the farm; he could not say it then till he had got time to make up his mind as to the rent in valuing it.

7953. You voted for the Liberal candidate, did you not, at the election?—I did.

7954. Did you try to persuade any other voter to vote for the Conservative candidate?—There were two or three came to me and asked my advice, and I gave it them.

7955. What did you advise them?—After hearing their statements, and knowing the position in which they were placed, I advised them to vote for the Conservative candidate.

7956. Did you write to Mr. Otto to say that you had neutralised your own vote by getting someone to vote for the Conservative candidate?—No, I did not; I wrote to Mr. Otto that one had stayed at home.

7957. Sir George Grey.] At your suggestion?—Yes.

7958. Mr. Hunt.] You wrote to Mr. Otto that you suggested to a voter to stay at home, and not to vote for the Liberal candidate?—Yes.

7959. You voted for the Liberal candidate upon principle, I suppose?—Yes; I had better explain why I did it. In going over the farm when Mr. Otto was pressing me to give Lord Schomberg Kerr my vote, I said that I was on terms for the purchase of a small property from a party who was going to vote for the Liberals, and that would neutralise my vote. This negotiation broke off, and I thought perhaps Mr. Otto might think that I was in part committed in that way to neutralise my vote, and that was the reason.

7960. You voted for the Liberal candidate on principle?—I did.

7961. Did you ask a man who was going to vote for the Liberal candidate to stay at home on principle?—It was perfectly on principle, for the simple reason that I had committed myself to Mr. Otto by thinking that I would finish this arrangement for the purchase of the property.

7962. Had you committed yourself to Mr. Otto?—I had committed myself to Mr. Otto by saying that I was on terms for the purchase of this property from a voter on the Liberal side; but that arrangement broke off. If I had purchased the property the voter would not have voted on the Liberal side.

7963. Sir George Grey.] You felt yourself bound in honour, therefore, to advise that voter not to give his vote?—Yes.

7964. Mr. Hunt.] You have been asked about the meeting at Hawick; were you at that meeting?—I do not know the meeting that Mr. Otto alludes to. I do not remember being at any agricultural meeting at Hawick excepting the show when Lord Schomberg and Sir William Scott were both there. I may have been at Hawick, at a private meeting, but I never was at either a farmer's club or any other agricultural meeting for a long time before.

7965. Do you know what meeting is alluded to by Mr. Otto?—The only thing that I can recollect is that at different times, when I have been both in Kelso and Hawick, I was twitted with the remark that it was easily known how I would vote, considering that my farm was nearly out of lease; and I once and again very indignantly replied that I would vote as I thought proper, independent of either the farm or the Marquis of Lothian.

7966. On that occasion was it, or do you know when it was?—On different occasions I have done it, both in Kelso and Hawick and elsewhere.

7967. On the occasion when you were twitted about this, was it a meeting at Hawick?—I have been twitted both at Hawick and Kelso, and elsewhere.

7968. Take time. When you were twitted at Hawick, what meeting was that?—The only occasion that I can recollect was early in November 1868.

7969. Did this conversation take place after dinner?—It may have been after dinner.

7970. Do you undertake to say that upon that occasion you did not speak in very disrespectful terms of your landlord, Lord Lothian, and his family?—I do. I undertake to say I did not, and never did use disrespectful language towards them.

7971. Have you heard that it was said in your neighbourhood that you had done so?—Yes, once; and I denied it, and I do so still.

7972. Still the people in your neighbourhood say that you have done so?—I think there are very few say it, and very few think it.

7973. But some few do?—No doubt; there are always some to believe evil reports.

7974. Mr. Villiers.] When was the date of that conversation which you had with Mr. Otto in which you denied having broken any pledge?—I think it was on the 15th of December.

7975. Was that the occasion when he said he had all the deeds ready, or that everything was prepared?—Yes; that was the occasion.

7976. When he said that, did that mean to say that the lease would be granted to you again?—Decidedly.

7977. What was the date of the letter that you wrote to the Marquis of Lothian?—The 16th of December.

7978. Then it was the day after the conversation that you had with Mr. Otto on the subject of the farm?—Yes.

7979. Was it in consequence of what passed between you and Mr. Otto that you addressed Lord Lothian?—Yes.

7980. In fact you had not thought of doing it but from what Mr. Otto said?—None whatever; because I had expected a renewal of my lease until Mr. Otto told me.

7981. And it seems Mr. Otto had expected it also before you gave the vote?—Yes; I have no doubt he did.

7982. Had you had any conversation with Mr. Otto about your renewal before the election?—Yes.

7983. Did he suggest how you should vote?—He pressed me very strongly to vote for Lord Schomberg Kerr.

7984. Did he tell you what might be the consequence if you did not?—No, he did not.

7985. But did he leave you with the impression

Mr. W. Scott.

11 June 1869.

sion that you would not get a renewal if you did vote against Lord Schomberg Kerr?—No.

7986. In fact you were on a perfectly friendly footing with the agent, Mr. Otto, before that time?—Yes, perfectly friendly.

7987. Were you on friendly terms when he told you that there was no chance of doing anything about the lease?—Perfectly friendly terms.

7988. Do we understand that it took you by surprise to hear that?—Yes, it did take me very much by surprise.

7989. Had not the neighbours thought that you would lose your lease after you voted against Lord Schomberg Kerr?—I do not think they had. I think they were mostly of opinion that the day had gone past for landlords resorting to such extreme measures.

7990. Just at the time when leases are about to expire, do not tenants generally vote with their landlords?—I think a number of them vote with their landlords whether their leases are expired or not.

7991. Do you mean that the time is passed when that sort of influence is used over tenants in Scotland?—No, I do not think the time is passed now. I have seen very much of it lately.

7992. Did you hear any remarks about it; was it well known that you were not to have a renewal?—I think it was quite well known over the district, and quite believed.

7993. What do you say was notorious in the district; was it that you had been refused a renewal on account of your vote?—Yes.

7994. That would be what you would hear; and that is the general opinion there, is it?—Yes, that is the general opinion; and it is the fact that Mr. Otto told me so.

7995. Have you never had any other reason assigned whatever?—Never, until I saw Mr. Otto's evidence.

7996. And you, by your own account, had been on perfectly good terms with the proprietor before that?—Perfectly good terms with both the proprietor and the factor; so much so that Mr. Otto, shortly after Whit Sunday last year, asked me to act as his arbiter, in a case between the Marquis of Lothian and an out-going tenant.

7997. Do you know any instance in which any tenant was ever turned out on account of his vote from Lord Lothian's property?—Not until this occasion.

7998. Sir George Grey.] I think you stated in your letter, that if you were turned out it would be a singular and unprecedented case?—Yes.

7999. Chairman.] Was there anything that you did on your farm, in consequence of what was said to you by Mr. Otto when he made his inspection; was there any circumstance about the inroads which were being made by the river?—Yes; in going over the farm I pointed out that the water was making inroads on some of the low-lying land next the river, and he suggested that it would be as well that I should get a lot of stones forward and get it hutched, as we call it, and I did so, and I led down 400 or 500 cartloads of stones; half of them were put into the water, and the other could not be very well taken to a different part till the frosty weather came on; and before the frost came the negotiations were broken off, and they are still lying there.

8000. Should you have led those 400 or 500 loads of stones if you had thought that you were not to have your lease renewed?—Not at all, because I was not bound to lead the stones.

8001. Do you think that Mr. Otto would have recommended you to do so if he had thought that you were to lose your farm?—I do not think so; I think it would have been a very ungracious act to have done so.

8002. Mr. Brand.] Did Mr. Otto actually suggest to you that you should cart those stones?—He did.

8003. Did you report to him that you had done so?—Yes; he knew perfectly well that I had done so, for he sent men to put them into the river.

8004. Mr. Whitbread.] When Mr. Otto had the conversation with you, in which he told you, as you say, that it was on account of your vote that you were to lose your farm, did he add anything to the effect that he regretted it himself?—He did; he told me that I was to lose the farm, as they were determined to have tenants that would support them; that he did not approve of it himself, and that he was very sorry to part with me as a tenant, but he had just to do as he was bidden, and if I had remained neutral I would have got my farm again.

8005. He told you that if you had remained neutral you would have got your farm?—Yes.

8006. Are you quite sure that those were not words that you suggested to him, but that he used those words to you?—Quite sure.

8007. You know Mr. Dunn, do you not, a corndealer at Kelso?—I do.

8008. Did you have any conversation with him upon this subject?—I had a conversation with him upon the subject within a minute or two after leaving Mr. Otto, and with one or two other of my friends who had been watching Mr. Otto and me, thinking that we were closing a bargain for the farm; and Mr. Dunn said, "Well, have you got the bargain finished?" and I said, "Well, it is finished for ever now, as far as I am concerned;" and I told him exactly what I had stated at that minute, and to three or four other parties.

8009. Will you give us the names of any other parties who saw you in conversation with Mr. Otto, and to whom you told the reasons why you should lose you farm?—Yes; there was Mr. Dunn, Mr. James Scott, of Lantonparks, Mr. Hilson, a solicitor of Jedburgh, and I told Mr. Scott, of Mervinston, as well; he is a Conservative voter, who voted for Lord Schomberg Kerr.

8010. Those gentlemen were present and saw you in conversation with Mr. Otto, and you told them the reason why you were to lose your farm?—Yes.

8011. Because you had given your vote to the Liberal candidate?—Yes.

8012. Have you seen any one of those gentlemen lately?—Yes, I saw Mr. Hilson on Wednesday, and he remembered the statement exactly.

8013. He remembers that you had stated to him that you were to lose the farm because of your vote?—Yes; and I may add that he suggested to me at the time that I ought to write to Lord Lothian.

8014. Was it upon his suggestion that you did write to Lord Lothian?—Both on his suggestion and on my own thoughts of the matter.

Mr. W. Scott.
11 June 1869.

8015. Mr. Hunt.] There were, I suppose, several conditions in your existing lease about the cultivation of the farm and other things?—Yes.

8016. And about keeping the banks in repair?—Yes.

8017. And your lease is not up yet, is it?—No, it has not expired till Whit Sunday next.

8018. You are under terms in your existing lease to keep the banks in repair?—The landlord is first bound, if new hutching is required, to put it there, and then we are mutually bound to protect it afterwards.

8019. What is the nature of your covenant about keeping the banks in repair?—That is the nature of it.

8020. The landlord does it, and then you keep it in repair afterwards?—It is kept in repair afterwards mutually between the landlord and the tenant.

8021. The tenant does all the leading, does he not?—No, the whole of it is mutual.

8022. But supposing that you left the banks out of repair would not you have to compensate the landlord for it?—If it had been put in order before, but not when it was required for a new place. The water sometimes breaks out at a new place altogether where nothing has been done to it, and, of course, the landlord has first to put it in repair.

8023. Where this breach was made that you carted those stones to, was it in good repair when you took the farm?—There never were any stones put in it before.

8024. But was it in a sound state when you took the farm?—I have no doubt that it was when I took the farm.

8025. Would not it be your duty to keep it in repair?—No, it would not.

8026. Do you mean that if the bank was washed away you were to do nothing?—Nothing. I had nothing to do with it till Mr. Otto first put it into repair, and then the landlord and the tenant kept it mutually afterwards.

8027. If it was in good repair when you took the farm and the water began to wash it away, do you say that it would not be your duty to do anything to it?—Nothing. What I mean is this; that no hatching with stones was ever done there before; it had not required it.

8028. But when it did require it, do you mean to say that you might have left it alone?—Yes, I do; my lease expressly states that when new hutching is required it shall be done by the landlord, and afterwards kept in repair mutually between landlord and tenant.

8029. Supposing that the landlord were to do the repair himself, would not it be the duty of the tenant to lead the materials there?—No, it would not.

8030. Would it be the custom for him to do it?—I have occasionally done it, but I was not bound to do it.

8031. Would not it be the custom for the tenant to do it?—No; I do not think it is the custom to do it where it is new hutching, and the lease expressly states differently.

8032. Would not it be the custom for the tenant to lead the stones that were necessary?—No, neither the custom nor according to the lease.

8033. Mr. Stavely Hill.] What was the date at which you first heard of disrespectful words having been used by you with respect to the Marquis?—I could not well tell the date that I first heard about it.

8034. It was after the election, was it not?—Yes; it was after the election.

8035. How soon after the election?—I cannot say; it was not very long after the election.

8036. Was it weeks, or a week, or days, or what?—It would be weeks, I think; but I could not be very positive.

8037. Was it a month?—It might be three weeks or a month, but I could not be very positive.

8038. Would it be about three weeks to the best of your belief?—Perhaps it might.

8039. Then you had heard that it had been said, that you had used disrespectful language?—Yes.

8040. And that was about three weeks after the election?—Perhaps it might be.

8041. What was the date of the election?—I think it was the 23rd of November.

8042. What was the date of the letter of yours? It was written on the 16th of December.

Mr. William Ellison Otto, called in; and further Examined.

Mr. W. E. Otto.

8043. Mr. Hunt.] Did you state to Mr. Scott "I have the report cut and dry ready for the Marquis's approval, but he positively declines to renew the lease because you voted against his brother"?—Not those words, "Because you did not vote for Lord Schomberg Kerr." I said that I had my report ready to be submitted to Lord Lothian, but his Lordship never took it up, and he declined to renew his lease, and he asked me to intimate so to Mr. Scott, as he thought he should be taken at no disadvantage.

8044. But what we want now to know is what you said to Mr. Scott?—I said that there was no wish that he should be taken at a disadvantage, and so I gave him early intimation, but I certainly did not say that it was because he did not vote for Lord Schomberg Kerr. That was an inference or assumption of Mr. Scott's own. He certainly took it for granted, and I never contradicted him; I held my tongue.

8045. Did Mr. Scott himself say that he believed that it was because he had voted against Lord Schomberg Kerr?—Yes, he said somewhat to that effect; he seemed very much surprised and taken aback. I do not remember accurately the words he said, but it was to that effect that he had been deprived of his farm because he had not voted for Lord Schomberg Kerr.

8046. You did not say anything one way or the other?—I held my tongue. I said it made no difference to me. I had my instructions to follow, and must carry out my instructions.

8047. Sir George Grey.] Why did not you contradict him if you believed that he was under a false impression?—I had no business to contradict any assertion that a person might make. Lord Lothian instructed me to decline, without assigning any reasons whatever, and it would be exceeding my instructions to give any reasons.

8048. Mr. Hunt.] Mr. Scott also stated that his brother had had a conversation with you in which you said that the Marquis of Lothian had done done it on the spur of the moment after the election, but you had no doubt that the Marquis regretted it now; did you say that to Mr. Scott's brother?—I had several conversations with Mr. Scott's brother; his brother was very anxious to get the farm when he heard that his brother had been refused a renewal, and he made application for it, and began by taking it for granted that it was on account of his brother's vote, and saying that he was a good Conservative, and would always vote for the Conservatives, and had taken an active part, and I said, "If you wish to make any application I will mention it to Lord Lothian, but the farm is not out of lease yet, and I cannot say what steps may be taken in any shape; you can make an application to his Lordship if you think proper."

Mr. W. E. Otto.

8049. Did you say anything to Mr. George Scott on that occasion about your having no doubt that the Marquis regretting it now?—Not that I am aware of. I remember using no expression of that kind, and I could not say so because I had never seen Lord Lothian since, and had had no conversation with him or writing at all about it, so that I was not aware whether he might regret it or not.

8050. But are you prepared to say that you did not say so to Mr. George Scott?—Yes, I am quite positive that I could not have said so.

8051. Did you say to Mr. William Scott that if he had remained neutral he would have got his farm again?—No, I certainly did not. He went on muttering a good many things about his voting that he could not even remain neutral, and I listened to him, but I said almost nothing. Our conversation did not last beyond one or two minutes; another person came up, and I went away.

8052. What took place was what he said and you replied to?—I replied nothing, or perhaps I interjected a single word, or something of that kind, but I certainly never made any such statement to him.

8054. With regard to leading the stones to the bank that was washed away, what have you to say about that?—I may read the clause in the lease with regard to that, "Further, the tenant is hereby bound to keep, during the lease, the river sides, in constant good order and sufficient repair, and to leave them so at the end of the lease, the landlord relieving the tenant of one-half the expense of so doing. Should any new hutching be required near the Mains Boathole, or elsewhere on the farm, the landlord to be at the expense of making, to be upheld as above." It is the usual thing during a lease for those repairs to be made. It depends entirely upon the state of the river, if it comes down in a severe flood and carries a portion of it away; it may be near the end of the lease, or it may be near the beginning.

8055. Do you consider, with regard to this breach in the bank, which was repaired by leading those stones, that under that lease the tenant would have had to have done all or any part of it?—He would have been required to have done some part of it; I cannot remember now what state it was in, but he would have been obliged to do some part of it, or leave it in repair.

8056. Do you consider that the suggestion that he should put stones there ought to have led him to suppose that he should have a renewal of his lease?—I cannot see why it should; no person would begin an improvement of that kind until he had got a new lease. If he wished to draw the stones, it may have been at his own leisure, to suit his own convenience.

8057. Mr. Villiers.] Are the Committee to understand that you and Lord Lothian never had any conversation at all about the renewal of Mr. Scott's lease?—Not except the one time when I saw him before he left for London, in the end of November or the beginning of December. The day before leaving I had a number of instructions to get from him, and one of them was with reference to the Timpendean Farm, when I was simply instructed that Mr. Scott was not to get a renewal of his lease.

8058. Had you reported upon the state of that farm?—My report was in draft.

8059. Do you mean that Lord Lothian never said a word about that report?—He said "I cannot take it up just now, I am leaving to-morrow; there is plenty of time to take it up afterwards."

8060. Did nothing pass between you and Lord Lothian as to the state of the farm?—Nothing whatever. We had very little conversation upon it. Those were my instructions, and I never presume to ask any reasons for those instructions.

8061. You do not deny what Mr. Scott said, that you had prepared everything for the renewal?—I stated in my evidence that I had prepared everything for the report to be submitted to Lord Lothian.

8062. Was that report favourable for a renewal, as far as the condition of the farm would justify it?—I have nothing to do with being favourable, or not, to a renewal; I have merely to send in my report, and get my instructions from my constituent.

8063. But your report was favourable to a renewal, or there was nothing against the renewal?—I merely report as to the state of cultivation, the buildings required, the drainage, and various improvements; there is nothing stated as to whether the tenant ought to get a renewal or not; that is left entirely to the proprietor.

8064. There was nothing in your report at all opposed to his having a renewal?—It was merely lying in draft as I say.

8065. There was nothing in your report, whether in draft or otherwise, opposed to his having a renewal?—Nothing either for or against, in any shape. There never is in a report of that kind.

8066. It was a report upon the condition of the farm; was it not?—Yes, but not as to whether the tenant ought to get a renewal of his lease or not.

8067. If the condition had been very bad it would have been against his having a renewal?—That depends upon the state of badness.

8068. However,

8068. However, there was nothing in your report at all to prevent the renewal of that lease?—Nothing.

8069. Do we understand you to say that Lord Lothian did not look at that report, or to use your own expression, did not take it up?—He never saw it; it never was sent in; it was merely lying in a draft form, and it never reached him. I would have made a proper copy of it, giving all details, and sent it in, but it was not asked for; his Lordship would not take it up.

8070. Just let us know whether we understand you correctly, that you neither submitted it to him, nor did he say a word to you about the renewal of Mr. Scott's lease?—He told me to intimate to Mr. Scott distinctly, that his farm was not to be renewed.

8071. And without seeing your report?—Without seeing the report.

8072. Do you dispute your having said to Mr. Scott, that everything was prepared for his having a renewal; but that in consequence of something else that had passed he was not to have it?—I said that the report was all ready, which was quite the fact.

8073. But did you not lead Mr. Scott to believe that you were favourable to the renewal?—I led him to believe nothing of the kind. An agent is not at liberty to let a farm, or make conditions, or anything of that kind, without the landlord's instructions.

8074. Did you not intimate to Mr. Scott that everything was ready for the renewal of his lease?—I said that my report was quite ready, but not that everything was ready for the renewal of his lease; that would be impossible, because the rent and conditions were not fixed.

8075. You have been in the room, I think, whilst Mr. Scott gave his evidence?—I have.

8076. Do you dispute what he stated as to what passed between him and you; that you stated that everything was ready for the renewal of the lease, but that he was not to have it?—I stated that my report was all ready, but not that everything was ready for the renewal of the lease.

8077. Then you deny positively what he said?—Yes, distinctly.

8078. Mr. Whitbread.] You stated that Lord Lothian instructed you to decline, without assigning any reasons; did he assign no reason to you why he declined, or did he desire you not to assign a reason why he declined?—I asked for instructions with regard to the farm, and he said, "I have now made up my mind not to grant a renewal to Mr. Scott; you had better intimate it to him without assigning any reason whatever."

8079. Did he add that, "without assigning any reason whatever"?—Yes, he added that.

8080. When Mr. Scott told you that he believed as you say, that it was because of his vote he was going to lose his farm, you must have been quite aware that that involved a very serious charge against his landlord?—I had no business to contradict it; a man may infer anything.

8081. I only ask you the question whether you were not fully aware that that did involve a very serious charge?—Perfectly aware of what people would say.

8082. And you did not think it your duty to disabuse his mind of that impression?—No, I had no business to interfere and make any suggestion; it would have been exceeding my instructions.

8083. Were you quite clear in your own mind that the vote had anything to do with the refusal?—As I said before, I simply had no instructions at all, whatever I may have thought myself; I certainly had no instructions, or thought very little about it; and on meeting him the next day I simply intimated it to Mr. Scott. As I said before, I was perfectly aware that there were sufficient reasons without political reasons, but it never entered into my mind to go into that. At election times people are very apt to ascribe those things to political reasons.

Mr. W. E. Otto.

11 June 1869.

8084. Sir George Grey.] You stated the other day that there were four farms, all of which, after your report was sent in to Lord Lothian, he instructed you to let to the sitting tenants; that two of those tenants voted for the Liberal candidate, and one of them was a principal supporter and canvasser on the Liberal side, notwithstanding which he received a renewal of his lease; when was the agreement made with those two tenants that they should have their farms continued?—One in December 1867 and the other in April 1868.

8085. Long before the election in both cases?—Yes, both of them before the election.

8086. Chairman.] Does not Lord Lothian generally consult with you about the renewal of a lease?—I give in my report, and he takes it up in his own way, and makes arrangements and alterations as he thinks proper.

8087. Does he not ask your opinion whether the lease should be renewed or not?—Sometimes, and sometimes not.

8088. I think you stated that Lord Lothian is in a very bad state of health?—A very precarious state of health.

8089. Then he has no means of forming an opinion as to the renewal or refusal of a lease, except your report and your advice?—He has friends, who may give him advice.

8090. You cannot tell the Committee whether it is upon your advice that he generally acts upon in renewing and giving leases?—No, I really cannot say that; I simply do my duty in sending in a report; but as to asking reasons, or asking any special instructions, or advising, and so on, I have nothing whatever to do with that.

8091. Mr. Brand.] When you walked over the farm with Mr. Scott, did you suggest any alterations or improvements to be executed by the tenant?—Both the tenant and myself spoke of improvements; he spoke of what he would like in this shape or the other, either buildings, or drainage, or fencing, or whatever he may have thought necessary; but he simply stated it as what he considered necessary. I had no authority to grant those allowances, or to grant any sum.

8092. Did you suggest to him any improvements which he should execute?—Nothing special, except that ordinarily in going over a farm one may see a fence to go out, or such and such a building is necessary, but it was simply spoken of as being an improvement; it did not at all necessarily follow that the money would be allowed or the alteration effected.

8093. Did you point out this hutching of which we have heard?—I think he asked my advice about hutching, or something of that kind, and I may have said that it would be greatly improved by hutching; but as to asking him to carry it out, or anything of that kind, I had nothing to do with that.

Mr. W. E. Otto.

11 June 1869.

8094. I think you formed your own opinion as to the reason why the lease was not granted?—I mentioned in my examination the other day that it was merely an inference on my part.

8095. Was it in consequence of the notion that disrespectful language had been used by Mr. Scott towards the Lothian family?—Yes, I inferred that.

8096. When Mr. Scott stated to you that he understood that he was not to have the lease because of his vote, why did not you tell him?—It is a most disagreeable thing to state personal or private reasons for refusing a lease, and I do not think that a landlord is obliged to do so.

8097. He put a plain question to you, and you were in a position to give him a plain answer, why did not you give it him?—Because that would have been exceeding my instructions; I was instructed simply to intimate the refusal of the lease without assigning any reason; and had I assigned personal or private reasons, it would have been quite out of my duty. I may state that I had a similar case some five or six years ago, a tenant was refused his lease, and he was most indignant about it, and wrote both to myself and to Lord Lothian, wishing to know the reason of it; but he never got any reason assigned yet.

Mr. JOHN NORWOOD, called in; and Examined.

Mr. J. Norwood.

8098. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] YOU are a Doctor of Civil Law, and a Magistrate in Ireland, I believe?—Yes.

8099. Have you gone circuit?—Yes; the north-east circuit.

8100. Have you had much experience in Parliamentary and municipal elections in Ireland?—I have.

8101. In what capacity?—I have acted as assessor to the Mayor of Belfast, at Parliamentary elections, and also for several years as borough assessor, in the municipal elections, and as assessor to the sheriff of the county of Monaghan.

8102. Have you been revising barrister?—I was a revising barrister under the new Reform Act, last year, for the county of Antrim.

8103. Have you also been vice chairman of the North Dublin Union?—I have, for several years.

8104. And are you acquainted with the mode of elections there?—Yes.

8105. Do the Roman Catholic priesthood exercise an influence at all those elections, the poor-law, the municipal and the Parliamentary elections, in Ireland?—Yes, more or less.

8106. Can you give any instances of the extreme use of influence on their part; we will say first in Parliamentary elections; have you known of any in the county of Monaghan, where you say you were assessor?—I have seen them extremely active at a contested election. There was an election in which they took a very active part. I saw, while I was acting in my official capacity, a number of Roman Catholic clergymen engaged in the election; I saw them in the booths; I saw them apparently bringing up voters, and appearing extremely active.

8107. When they are in the booths are they acting as agents, or are they admitted as private individuals?—They appeared to be acting as agents for the Liberal candidate.

8108. Do you know whether they are paid or not for that?—I am not aware.

8109. Did they take any part in the booths at all?—Yes.

8110. Was the election to which you are referring the election of 1865, in the county of Monaghan?—It was the election at which Mr. Vesey Dawson, now my Lord Cremorne, was returned, in 1865.

8111. Were the Roman Catholic clergy, who were taking part in the election, those living in the county, or did they come from a distance, many of them?—I should explain that there was intended to have been a contested election in the county of Louth, which is in a neighbouring county; and, as I am informed, in consequence of the apprehension of violence at that election, the Conservative candidates withdrew on the eve of the election (when I say on the eve, perhaps it was a day or so before), and thereby enabled several Roman Catholic clergymen from that county, and a large mob of persons from that county, to come to take part in the county of Monaghan election.

8112. Did the Roman Catholic clergy bring a mob with them?—I cannot say that; but I can say this, that the Roman Catholic clergymen seem to exercise considerable influence over the persons composing that mob.

8113. Did you see them yourself with the mob?—Yes; I had been in the county of Down, and I was telegraphed for to act as advising counsel to the sheriff, who was a very young man and somewhat inexperienced, and I arrived early in the morning of the polling-day. Just previously there had been a collision in the town of Monaghan, in which several persons had been wounded; and when I arrived in the town I found a large force of military, both infantry and cavalry, and they had drawn a cordon of troops, under the command of resident magistrates, across the town, so as to separate the two mobs. On one side there was this mob, which they called the Cremorne mob, and which, I understood, came from a distance; the majority of persons composing this mob were not belonging to the county of Monaghan. On the other side there were a number of Protestants, who had come in from the neighbourhood of Clones, and I was informed that they came in a body for mutual protection. As soon as I saw this state of affairs, although my business was merely to advise upon legal points, I thought it my duty to assist the sheriff as far as possible in preserving Her Majesty's peace, and I said, "We must get this mob out of the town, or there will be still more bloodshed." I was informed that there was a Roman Catholic cleryman of great influence there, and I was introduced to that gentleman, and I said that, as a clergyman, he was bound to assist in preserving the peace and preventing collision between those two parties. I said I was informed that he had considerable influence, and he intimated that he had. After some further conversation, I spoke to Mr. Vesey Dawson, and explained to him the danger if those parties remained in the town, and Mr. Vesey Dawson asked asked me to go to his committee-room, and I went across, as well as we could, with him through this mob. I never saw such a mob in my life; they were armed with blunderbusses, duck guns, rifles, scythes on poles, sticks, and other weapons, and they roared and shouted; and Mr. Dawson and myself had very great difficulty in getting to his committee-room. When we reached his committee-room, I saw some Roman Catholic clergymen there; I was not acquainted with them, but I assumed that they were so from their costume. I implored Mr. Dawson to endeavour to get this mob removed, and he addressed them from the windows. The clergymen, I must say, seemed to exert themselves, and to see the danger of a collision, and, finally, after considerable difficulty, the mob were got into a very large yard, and closed up. One of the Roman Catholic clergymen gave me a pledge that the mob should be out of the town, and they kept that pledge, and the mob were got out of the town. I then went to a party who had influence with the other side, and I said that it was his duty to keep Her Majesty's peace, and that he should get his side out of the town also. That was done, and happily the peace of the town was preserved.

8114. Was that first mob which you spoke of, composed of strangers to the county?—So I was informed.

8115. At the Dublin city and county elections, do the Roman Catholic priesthood take a very active part?—I have seen them attending the elections, and apparently taking a very active part.

8116. In the municipal elections in Dublin have you seen any marked interference, as to the election of the mayor for instance?—There was a very remarkable instance. The Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin was anxious that a gentleman should be returned as mayor who coincided with the views of the present Government upon the Irish Church Bill, and a letter appeared in which he suggested that. There was a gentleman, a merchant of Dublin, who was eligible in every way, by social position and by fortune, to fill the office of Lord Mayor; he had been nominated by the town council in July, and after he had been so nominated, an article appeared in a London journal stating that his nomination was a triumph of the supporters of the Irish Church. After that, this letter appeared which purported to be by the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Dublin, Cardinal Cullen, suggesting that a gentlemen favourable to the disestablishment and disendowment of the Irish Church, should be elected at that particular crisis, and the consequence was that when the name of Mr. Mackey, who was the gentleman to whom I have alluded, came up for confirmation at a subsequent meeting of the council, he was rejected and many of those who had formerly voted for him voted against him, and one of those gentlemen informed me that he did so in consequence of the pressure that had been brought to bear upon him by his clergy.

8117. Have you known of meetings held in their chapels in municipal or poor law elections?—I have read in Roman Catholic journals of meetings held in the vestries attached to those sacred edifices, but I have never, of course, been present at them myself.

8118. But it has been notorious and it has been stated in the papers?—Quite so.

8119. Are the poor law elections in Ireland carried on by means of voting papers?—They are.

8120. How does that system work?—Excellently well, I have been myself elected for several y ears both on the north and south side of the city, and I have acted as counsel at some poor law elections, and during that period, I should say of eight or nine years, I have known but very few instances, indeed, in which those papers have been tampered with or destroyed.

8121. Have you known instances of strongly contested elections?—Very strongly contested.

8122. But voting papers have worked well, you think, in those cases?—Yes.

8123. From your experience in those different kinds of elections, have you any suggestion to make to the Committee as to any improvements?—I would venture to make three or four. In the first place I think that the abolition of the nomination day would be a decided improvement, I do not see what useful end it accomplishes, and I think that the nomination of candidates might be made by a letter or notification to the sheriff a certain number of days before the election.

8124. Would you suggest any security for costs in case of a contest?—In order to prevent persons nominating others without authority, I would suggest that the nomination paper should be accompanied by the security of persons of solvency for costs incurred by the sheriff in fitting out booths, and so on, for a contested election.

8125. Have you found any evils existing in Ireland from the want of a sufficient number of polling places?—Great evils; and I think that is one of the causes which leads to the formation of mobs. It causes great expense to the voters. For instance, the county of Monaghan is some 27 miles by 32, and there were but three polling places in that county, and it is a very serious thing; it amounts almost, in many cases, to a prohibition to require a poor farmer or other person to go 12, or 15, or 16, or perhaps 20 miles to record his vote. In addition to the expense of his carriage he loses his day; and, as I said, it gives an opportunity for the concentration of mobs, and it also necessitates the travelling of a large number of persons together for mutual protection, and it necessitates the granting of escorts by the Government.

8126. Do you think that escorts are absolutely needed so long as the polling places are at such distances from the residences of the voters?—Yes, certainly.

8127. Is that your opinion, from your experience of the violence which is used at those elections?—Certainly; where persons cannot get an escort, or where they cannot assemble in sufficient number for mutual protection, I believe they remain at home rather than go such a distance to record their votes.

8128. Have you seen any instances in Ireland, as, for instance, in Belfast, where, by the multiplication of polling places, much of the evil which existed at other elections has been avoided?—Yes, a large number of persons record their votes in Belfast, and they do so with great facility; but then the mayor of Belfast, who is the returning officer, takes every precaution to have a sufficient number of booths and in the most convenient places.

8129. Does that tend to divide the mob and prevent violence?—Yes, of course it does.

Mr. J. Norwood.

11 June 1869.

8130. Have you any other suggestion to make as to the mode in which persons should vote?—Yes, I think it would be of very great importance that persons who could not conveniently attend should be enabled to vote by a modification of the system under the University Voting Act. I think it is the 24th & 25th of the Queen, and amended by the 30th & 31st, where voters for a university, if it be not convenient to attend the polling-place, can sign a voting paper before a magistrate, and then forward it to a voter, and he brings it to the poll, signs it first, and then reads it out aloud. I think that would be a very great convenience in many instances. Will you allow me just to make a further suggestion which I think would be useful, and that is to extend the provisions of those Statutes which prevent the interference of certain persons at elections, to clergymen of all persuasions. I think it would be most useful if clergymen of all persuasions were confined to their legitimate and sacred duties, and prevented from interfering in political elections.

8131. What Statute do you refer to?—When I say statute, I believe it is the resolution of the House of Commons with respect to Peers.

8132. Do I understand you to mean that the clergy should not vote at elections or take any part whatever?—Certainly not, but that they should be prevented from interfering as agents.

8133. Have you found that the other clergy in Ireland, besides the Roman Catholic clergy, interfere as agents in elections?—I have not; not at all to such an extent. I have seen Presbyterian clergymen in the north of Ireland attending at elections, and I have seen Established Church clergy attending there, but merely as voters; the Presbyterian clergymen do not interfere in the active way that I have mentioned with regard to the Roman Catholic clergy.

8134. With respect to the ballot, have you paid any attention to that subject?—I have considered the subject since this Committee was constituted, and I do not see that the introduction of the ballot would accomplish the end proposed, which I understand to be the prevention of undue influence upon the voters.

8135. What undue influence would in your opinion exist even if the ballot were adopted?—Of course it is only a matter of opinion, but I think that it would leave the influence which is paramount over the voters in Ireland untouched; namely, the influence of the Roman Catholic clergymen.

8136. Mr. Villiers.] Will you state how it would not interfere with the influence exercised by the Roman Catholic clergy?—Because I do not think that the lower order of voters would have any security in the ballot; that their clergy would know how they voted, notwithstanding their voting in secret by the ballot.

8137. Why would that be; their votes would not be published, would they?—No.

8138. How are the clergy to know it?—If their clergyman asked them, of course, they would tell him; they could not help telling him, I believe.

8139. But that would apply to everybody else, would it not?—No.

8140. If a Presbyterian clergyman asked any of his flock how they voted, would they not tell him?—I think the Presbyterian population of the north of Ireland are so sturdy and independent, that they would not tell.

8141. What is your opinion of the other population?—I think the influence of a Roman Catholic clergyman over his flock is so peculiar and so strong, that his flock would confess to him the way in which they voted if he asked them.

8142. You propose, do you not, that the Roman Catholic clergy should not be allowed to interfere at elections?—As agents; I certainly think that that would be a very important mode of freeing elections in Ireland.

8143. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] Have you had an opportunity of considering any particular system of ballot voting?—As a member of clubs, I have seen the ballot.

8144. But are you acquainted with the particular systems in operation in the Colonies, for instance, for conducting the elections?—Practically, I have not seen them; but I have read about them in books, and in newspapers.

8145. Have you any other grounds against the ballot generally which you would wish to state to the Committee?—Yes, I understand that it has failed to secure secresy or purity of election in America; at least so I have read, and that it fails to secure perfect confidence in the public mind, and I think that it would lead to political hypocrisy.

8146. Do you mean by failing to secure confidence that there is a doubt as to whether the votes are published as they are given?—Yes.

8147. Do you know whether there is any feeling in Ireland, as far as you have come across it, in favour of the ballot?—I have spoken to some Roman Catholic gentlemen about it, and their opinions seemed to be divided about it. I should state that one Roman Catholic gentlemen to whom I spoke in Dublin was strongly in favour of the ballot, and I have spoke to others who are not. On the other hand, I have spoken to a number of Protestant gentlemen there about it, and they all agreed in thinking that it would not be a useful way of conducting elections there.

8148. Sir Frederick Heygate.] You gave an account of an Irish contested election; is that an account of what usually happens?—I do not say so.

8149. Is it usual that many people are armed with scythes and guns?—No; that was a very peculiar mob. I have seen mobs elsewhere, but never such a mob as that.

8150. What was the reason of that mob being so particularly bad in Monaghan?—They came, as I understand, from a part of the country which is somewhat lawless, on the border of the counties of Louth and Monaghan.

8151. Was it owing to the mixture in that county of Protestant and Roman Catholic populations?—I have no doubt of it; the political feelings in that county are very strongly marked, and it was of great importance at that time to secure the election for Mr. Dawson, and whoever brought this mob there, resorted to every means in their power to deter and intimidate voters from coming up.

8152. Do you think that Irish contested elections could be carried on without the use of the military?—I think the military ought to be there, or the police, who are, in point of fact, armed as the military are, and drilled and act as the military do; but I think that in aid of the civil power the military ought to be in readiness, but but of course placed in such a position that they would not be called for unless absolutely necessary. I know that in Dublin city, where there have been many contested elections, the military are placed in convenient positions; but they are not allowed to be seen, and they are never brought out unless there be an absolute necessity for them.

8153. I do not ask you as to the principle of escorting voters to the poll; but I ask you, in your experience, do you think that the peace of a town, where a contested election is being carried on, could be preserved by the constabulary alone without the aid of the military, or without the military being in reserve?—I should rather have the military in reserve. If I were advising the sheriff, and he asked me, I should say, "You had better have the military in reserve in a position of convenience, but do not allow the people to see them."

8154. Supposing the ballot was to be the law, do you think the military could be then dispensed with?—I am not prepared to say so. I should say that if a number of Protestant voters who came from Clones (I use the Monaghan election as an illustration), and from the Protestant districts, were coming in to record their votes, even by the ballot, I think their opinions being known as Protestant people, it would very likely occur that attempts would be made to prevent them reaching the poll, and in that case I should be prepared to advise the sheriff to have a sufficient force to protect the voters if necessary.

8155. Do you think that voters would be interfered with in coming up to the ballot to give their votes?—I should say so.

8156. And that the object of those mobs is generally to prevent voters coming to the poll?—Yes, and to intimidate them also.

8157. Do you think that voting papers would cure that?—I think they would tend to do so; if a number of farmers in a remote district, supposing they were Roman Catholics in a Protestant district, or Protestants in a Roman Catholic district, had a distance to go and were furnished with those papers, I think they would record their votes without intimidation, and thus prevent their being interrupted on their way to the poll.

8158. Did you ever know any instance of voters being taken to the poll by an escort against their will?—I do not know; I could not say whether they were taken against their will, but I know that at every contested county election a number of voters have to be escorted both to the poll and from the poll.

8159. Do you know whether it is the fact that the Presbyterian laity are especially jealous of the interference of their clergy in their secular matters?—I am aware of that; I know a great number of Presbyterians in the counties of Down and Antrim, and in private life I know that they are most jealous of the interference of their clergy.

8160. Is not it a peculiarity that a Presbyterian layman would especially resent the advice and interference of his clergyman in election matters?—I think so.

8161. Would he be likely to inform the clergyman, afterwards, how he voted?—I think if his clergyman asked him he would tell him.

8162. Would his clergymen have the same influence over him, upon that subject, as a Roman Catholic clergyman has over one of his flock?—I do not believe so.

8163. Therefore the ballot would be a protection in the one case, and not in the other?—That is my opinion.

8164. The O'Conor Don.] Did I rightly understand you to say that you were engaged in an official capacity at the election in Monaghan?—Yes.

8165. And that there were two mobs in the town?—I understood that there was the Cremorne mob, and the opposing party (perhaps I should call them a party) where a number of voters who had come up from a particular district, a large number of them together, for mutual protection.

8166. Were they all voters, or were there non-electors among them?—I cannot positively say whether they were all voters or no, but I was informed that the reason why they were there was, that they were voters who had come from the districts.

8167. What you believe is, that there was no opposing mob, but that the large body that was on the other side were all voters who came up to vote?—I have only the information that I received in the town, but certainly the mob which I have spoken of, the Cremorne mob, did not look like voters; they appeared to be strangers.

8168. I think you have stated in your evidence that you first went to the Roman Catholic clergymen and requested them to induce the Cremorne mob to disperse?—Yes, to withdraw from the town.

8169. And then I think you went on to state that you went to the other side and also advised them to withdraw their party?—Yes, I asked gentlemen, who were persons of influence, on the other side, to do so.

8170. Then you did believe at the time that there was an opposing party, and that they should also be withdrawn from the town?—My object was to get the two parties out of the town. I had no particular reason for going to the Cremorne mob first or last, if that is what you wish to know.

8171. What I wish to know is this; I understood you state in answer to my first question that there was only one mob, and that the other were electors who came up to exercise the franchise; why should you wish them to be withdrawn from the town?—I had no means of knowing that the other party were entirely composed of electors; there may have been non-voters among them; I cannot say as to that, but I was told so.

8172. When you went to what you call the party opposed to the Cremorne party, and asked them to get their friends out of the town, I suppose you understood that they were non-electors, or, otherwise, a mob?—No, I did not; they were the opposing party to the Cremorne mob, and in order to insure the peace of the town, my object was to get the two parties kept separate and sent away.

8173. You tell me that the Cremorne mob was on the one side, and another large body of people, whom you will not call a mob on the other?—Yes; I had no reason to call it a mob.

8174. Were they armed in any way?—I heard that they had pistols and firearms concealed.

8175. And, perhaps, scythes, and everything else of a like kind?—No; I heard that they had pistols and other firearms.

Mr. J. Norwood.

11 June 1869.

8176. Perhaps they had more firearms than the Cremorne mob?—I do not know that.

8177. Does the Orange institution prevail much in the county of Monaghan?—I believe it does.

8178. I presume it would not be very difficult to get up an Orange mob in the county of Monaghan?—I should say not very difficult.

8179. Do you believe that the large body that was opposed to the Cremorne party was not composed, to a great extent, of Orangemen?—I have no doubt it was composed, to a great extent, of Orangemen.

8180. I understand you that the description of the Monaghan election was, that you had, what you called, the Cremorne mob on the one side, and a large body, who were chiefly composed of Orangemen, on the other side?—So I was informed.

8181. And you were informed that the Cremorne mob came from another county?—Yes.

8182. But you had no knowledge of that yourself?—No.

8183. I suppose the Cremore mob was chiefly composed of Roman Catholics?—I infer so.

8184. The Catholic priests in Ireland have a great deal of influence with the Catholics, have they not?—Yes, certainly.

8185. Upon this occasion the Roman Catholic priests exercised their influence to get this body to leave the town?—Yes, certainly; I must say that they seconded my efforts to preserve the peace most promptly.

8186. You have no complaint to make of them at that election on that score?—None whatever.

8187. You say that you saw them taking an active part in the election and in the polling booths, and you suppose that they were acting there as agents; upon what ground did you suppose that they were acting as agents?—When I see a man, having a memorandum book or a card in his hand, apparently recording the number of votes, and handing in the voting cards occasionally of the voters, and bringing up voters and walking about and talking to the agents and tally clerks, I infer that he is acting as an agent there.

8188. Did you see any landlords in the booths on that day?—I saw a number of country gentlemen about.

8189. Did you see them taking an active part in the booths in collecting voters, or taking up papers, or anything of that sort?—I saw one or two.

8190. Did you see any persons whom you knew to be land agents in the booths?—I cannot recall it to my recollection.

8191. Are you not acquainted with the agents and landlords in that county?—I know a good many of those who attend upon the grand juries at the different assizes.

8192. But you are not acquainted with the different land agents and bailiffs in the county?—I do not know anything of bailiffs, but I know several land agents.

8193. Did you see any land agents whom you knew taking a somewhat similar part to that which you have described as being taken by the priests?—I did not; if I did, it has escaped my recollection.

8194. But it is quite possible that there were many taking a similar part to that which you have described with regard to the priests?—Quite possible.

8195. If you saw a landlord come up with a lot of voters, perhaps his tenants, would you at once say that he was an election agent on that account?—If he brought them up to the poll and saw them record their votes, and stood by while they were recording their votes, and handed in their voting cards, and stayed about the booth, recording votes, and so on, I should say that he was acting as an election agent.

8196. But you are not aware that those clergymen, to whom you have referred, were in any way paid for their services?—I do not know anything about that.

8197. With respect to the election of the mayor of the city of Dublin, what year was it that you referred to?—It was last year.

8198. A certain gentleman was nominated in the preceding summer, as was usual in the Dublin corporation for election in the ensuing winter?—Yes; in December I think the election takes place.

8199. The gentleman who was nominated, I believe, belonged to the Conservative party?—He was a Conservative, as I believe, but he was a gentleman who never interfered in political affairs in the council. I mean he never took part in any political matters in the council, and he was greatly respected as well by Roman Catholics as by Protestants.

8200. He was understood, however, to be opposed to the question at that time, the question of the day, about the disestablishment of the Irish Church?—Yes; he was asked to give a pledge with regard to his political opinions, and he said that "he was known to his fellow-citizens, that he would give no pledge, but that, during his year of office, he would act impartially and without favour or affection."

8201. But he refused to give a pledge that he was in favour of what was called "religious equality"?—Yes, that was the way in which the phrase was put to him.

8202. He was, in the first place, nominated at the summer election?—Yes.

8203. Was not his nomination followed by articles in the Conservative papers, accepting his nomination as a declaration by the Dublin corporation, that they were opposed to the disestablishment of the Irish Church?—It was followed by an article, which became subsequently a very celebrated one, in the "Globe," but it was not followed, as far as I remember, by any articles of a similar tenor in the Irish papers, for they knew the facts of the case, whereas the writer in the "Globe" apparently wrote in utter ignorance of the facts of the case.

8204. When that article appeared accepting that gentleman's nomination as a proof that the Dublin corporation was against the disestablishment of the Irish Church, was it not then that this gentleman, Mr. Mackey, was called upon to state whether he was in favour of religious equality or not?—I believe he was called upon to state it at several meetings.

8205. But he was called upon particularly after this article appeared?—Yes.

8206. And he refused to do so?—He refused to make any pledge.

8207. Was not it really in consequence of his refusing to make that pledge that the gentlemen who voted for him, in the summer, voted against him him in the winter?—I am not aware of that; several of them said so, but I believe that many of them reversed their votes in consequence of the pressure that was brought to bear upon them.

8208. At all events, that was what they themselves put forward as their reason for voting one way in the summer and another way in the winter?—Quite so. They stated so in public, but one or two of them mentioned to me, apologetically, the pressure that had been brought to bear upon them. There were others, however, upon whom great pressure was brought to bear, who kept to their votes and refused to break their promises, and those gentlemen told me that pressure of the gravest character was brought to bear upon them.

8209. That pressure was brought to bear upon them chiefly, I suppose, by their constituents?—By the clergy individually, and those who came forward, subsequently, in November for re-election were opposed very strongly by the Roman Catholic clergymen.

8210. And also, in some cases, by a very large number of their constituents who disapproved of their conduct in voting for a gentleman who would not pledge himself upon a point which was considered of importance at the time?—I have no doubt that many of their constituents did oppose them on that ground, but I was informed by many of the gentlemen that many of their constituents refused to yield to the pressure.

8211. Did I rightly understand you to state, that so long as the polling places are so far apart as they are at present, military escorts will be absolutely necessary, and that you are in favour of an addition being made to the number of polling places in Ireland?—Yes.

8212. How near do you think a polling place ought to be to any voter?—That very much depends upon the position of the towns; I would bring it as near as I possibly could to the voter.

8213. But how near a distance of the polling place from the residence do you think would dispense with the necessity for those military escorts; how many miles could a man safely go without a military escort?—That depends very much upon the state of the county. In Tipperary, or in Limerick, or Waterford, or perhaps in Monaghan, it depends very much upon the district in which he was whether he could go one, or two, or three miles.

8214. You stated, did you not, that if the polling places were multiplied the necessity for those escorts would be done away with?—Not absolutely done away with, but greatly diminished.

8215. You still think it would be necessary to have those escorts, no matter how much the polling places might be multiplied?—I think there are cases in which it might be necessary to have an escort.

8216. Have you ever known voters escorted by the military or police into the polling-places several days before the election?—I have not; I have heard of such cases, but I have not known them personally.

8217. It was not done in this case that you alluded to in Monaghan?—No; I understood that those persons came in in the morning and were escorted back. I know of one case where they were escorted back from the poll, and a serious riot took place at the railway station at Castle-Blayney.

8218. You are opposed to the ballot, I understand?—Yes, certainly.

8219. You do not think that it would accomplish the prevention of the undue influence of priests?—I do not.

8220. You told us that you believe that the priests would still discover how the Catholic voters had voted; upon what grounds do you make that statement?—I think from the peculiar influence that the clergy exercise over their flocks in that country, I would say the almost unbounded influence, if his clergyman asked a voter how he voted he would, at once, tell him.

8221. I suppose if the priest thought it worth his while to question a voter how he had voted after he had voted, he would think it worth his while, in the first instance, to advise the voter how to vote?—I should say he would.

8222. And do you think that if a man resisted the influence of the priest in the first instance, that, having voted contrary to the priest's view, he would afterwards yield to that influence and tell him how he had voted?—If he had strength of mind to resist in the first instance, I think he would have strength of mind to resist in the latter case.

8223. Then your objection to the ballot is not that the priest would find out how a voter had voted, but that he would influence the voter to vote in a particular way?—No; my objection is that the ballot, as I understand, is for the purpose of securing secrecy of voting, and if it fails in that end, it does not accomplish the object in view.

8224. But I understand you to state that any voter who had strength of mind to vote against the priest's wishes would have strength of mind also to conceal how he had voted?—I think he would.

8225. Therefore the ballot would be a security for all those voters who would vote contrary to the priest?—But there are very few of that class of voters amongst the majority of the county voters, and indeed amongst the urban voters, in Ireland, who I think, if the question were asked, would not tell the priests.

8226. Sir George Grey.] You think that, although the ballot would secure freedom, as against the landlord, as against the priest, it would not be secret voting?—That is my statement.

8227. The O'Conor Don.] Did I understand you to state, that if a voter voted against the wish of the priest, the priest would still be able to find out how he voted?—I do believe so; but I may tell you that I scarcely suppose cases of that sort to exist among the lower orders in Ireland; it requires a very strong mind, indeed, to resist clerical influence in political affairs.

8228. What is the clerical influence which it is so difficult to withstand?—The clerical influence I have illustrated in the municipal elections, and I have illustrated it in the Parliamentary elections in Monaghan; and I will give another instance. In one case I was asked to get a booth cleared by some agent or other, and I went there; it was stated that a farmer had come up to vote for a particular candidate, and that when he was handing in his paper, a clergyman came in, and took the paper, or the card, out of his hand, and put another into it, and the man went up and voted; that appears to me to be an undue exercise of influence.

Mr. J. Norwood.

11 June 1869.

8229. You did not witness that yourself, did you?—No, I was told so; I was giving that by way of illustration.

8230. Sir George Grey.] When you spoke of clergymen, you meant, did you not, Roman Catholic clergymen? — Yes; the honourable Member was confining my attention, as I understood him, to the influence of the Roman Catholic clergymen.

8231. The O'Conor Don.] What I was directing your attention to was not the particular act of an individual clergyman, but to this influence which you have designated as clerical influence; that is, not the influence of an individual, but influence in connection with religion; I want to know what you mean by this clerical influence; is it that certain individuals who happen to be priests, acting as individuals, have influence over certain persons; or is it that the Catholic religion is brought in to influence the minds of the voters? — I think that a clergyman has a much more powerful influence with a Roman Catholic voter than any layman can have.

8232. You mean in inducing the mind of the voter to believe that a certain course is the right one?—Yes.

8233. Under the present system that influence exists?—Under any system I think it would exist.

8234. Supposing that through that influence a voter is convinced that a certain course is a right one to adopt, do you think that he ought not to follow that course?—If he be convinced, by argument and by reason, that a particular course is a right one to adopt, I think I would not call that undue influence.

8235. Did I understand you to state that among the lower classes of Catholic voters the priests have that power over the minds of Catholics as to make them believe that certain views are right even under the present system?—Yes, and under any system.

8236. Do you not believe that if the ballot were established, those men would vote more according to their convictions?—I think they would vote in the way in which they were directed. This clerical influence has been made the subject of Parliamentary inquiries in the case of the Sligo and Mayo and other elections; and it has been perfectly clearly defined in the books what undue clerical influence is, and elections have been set aside on that ground.

8237. Upon the ground of a clergyman persuading an individual that a certain course is the right one; is that what we are to understand?—No; on the ground of the exercise of undue clerical influence on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy.

8238. Could you state in what particulars this undue clerical influence was brought to bear?—I have read the reports in the books on elections; under the head of "Undue Influence," you will see, I think, in the case of the Sligo and Mayo elections, instances in which the elections were set aside, and Roman Catholic clergymen were, either in both or one of the instances, ordered to be prosecuted by the House of Commons.

8239. In those cases did not the Roman Catholic clergymen use personal violence as individuals, and threaten the voters with personal violence?—So I believe.

8240. But that is not at all what we have been speaking of before as clerical influence?—It may exhibit itself in other ways than by personal violence.

8241. But in those cases in which the elections have been set aside upon the ground of the undue influence of the priests, that undue influence was just the same, was it not, as might have been used by any other individual in the community?—Yes; but as I tell you, from the peculiar influence, and the unbounded influence derived, no doubt, from their religious position, and their sacred character in the eyes of their flocks, Roman Catholic clergymen exercise an unbounded influence over the minds of the people in the country.

8242. And they would persuade people to vote in a certain way in consequence of that?—Yes.

8243. And the people would then vote in accordance with their own convictions?—That I cannot say.

8244. Have you not just told me that the priests exercised such an unbounded influence over the minds of the people as to persuade them to do whatever they like?—I have known cases where a voter voted contrary to his convictions and contrary to his promise. I was told so, and I saw letters confirming that view.

8245. And would not the ballot have given that man perfect security against his priest?—I do not think it would.

8246. Why not?—Because if his clergyman asked him how he had voted, I think he would not have refused to tell him; that was my opinion.

8247. Although he would have voted contrary to the priests, or the clergyman's wishes?—Yes.

8248. Have you ever heard a Roman Catholic object to the ballot upon the ground that it would place him at the mercy of his priest?—I have heard a Roman Catholic gentleman say that he did not think it would afford any protection and for the reasons which I have given you.

8249. Have you ever heard a Roman Catholic either high or low, object to the ballot upon the ground that he himself would be placed at the mercy of his priest if the ballot existed?—I have never heard them say so.

8250. This objection against the ballot on the ground that the priestly influence would be unlimited if carried out, usually comes from Protestants, does it not?—Yes, but as I tell you, I asked some Roman Catholics, and they coincided with me.

8251. How many have you ever heard coincide with you in that view?—I took an opportunity when I was in Ireland of asking three or four, or say five; I think I asked five, and I think out of the five, two Roman Catholics coincided with me and three were in favour of the ballot. I may say generally that I think the Roman Catholics in Ireland would be more favourable to the ballot than the Protestants.

8252. Sir George Grey.] You said that there were only three polling places in the county of Monaghan at the election of which you have spoken; was that the utmost number that could then be provided by law?—Yes; I would have been very glad if I had had an opportunity to have had other polling places, but the only polling places were Monaghan, Castle-Blaney, and Carrickmacross.

8253. Was there not any power on the part of the sheriff to increase that number?—The sheriff could not increase their number at that time.

8254. Has

8254. Has there been any alteration of the law since allowing an increase of polling places?—There is a method by which, if the magistrates assemble and consider it necessary, they can, on a requisition to the Lord Lieutenant, get a number of additional polling places, and there was an attempt made, I think, to get a number of polling places for the county of Waterford after the last contested election in 1865, but it was negatived, and to the very great regret, I believe, of everybody, it was negatived, because subsequently there arose cases of violence.

8255. Was there a contest in the county of Monaghan in the last election of 1868?—There was not, and that arose from peculiar circumstances.

8256. The O'Conor Don.] Is it the fact that there was no contest at the last election in Monaghan?—I think there was not.

8257. Sir George Grey] Do you know whether there were more polling places at the last election than there had been at the election of which you have spoken?—No, there were just the same number.

8258. Had there been any application in the meantime on the part of the magistrates to the Government to increase the number of the polling places?—I believe not.

8259. Do you think that the advantage of having more polling places would be, not merely that the voter would not have to go so far, but that he would not find so great a crowd collected around each polling place?—That is so; there would not be so many mobs.

8260. Therefore the voter would be more free in the exercise of the franchise, in addition to shortening the distance he would have to go?—Certainly.

8261. You have recommended voting papers; have you considered whether the influence of the priest might not be very powerfully exercised over the voter at the time of his signing the paper, and the influence of the landlord and his agent also?—If proper arrangements were made to have those voting papers signed by officials, I think it might be done in such a way as to prevent, at the time of signing the paper, the influence either of the landlord or of the clergyman.

8262. Do not you think that the clergyman would, if he possessed the influence which you have described, be able to direct the voter for whom he was to vote, even by the voting paper?—I think he might.

8263. Then as to the freedom from influence; you do not think that the voting paper would give him any advantage?—I think it would have some advantage in that way.

8264. Do you think that a voter would be more likely to exercise his free choice in signing his name to the paper than he would in giving his vote at the poll?—I think he would.

8265. Why do you think so?—Because, in the first place, he would not be exposed at the moment to the direct personal presence of the Roman Catholic clergyman, as he is in the polling-place and also to the mob.

8266. Do you think that the presence of the priest influences a man to change his vote after he comes into the polling booth?—I cannot say that, but I believe that in the instance which I have mentioned it did do so.

8267. You have recommended the abolition of nomination days, and suggested that there should be a certain number of days between the issue of the writ and the election, within which nominations might be sent in; how many days would be sufficient for that purpose in a county, do you think?—I should say that after the writ has been received and the proclamation made by the sheriff, five days would be sufficient within which to allow all parties anxious to contest the county to send in their nomination papers to the sheriff.

8268. Supposing that a nomination paper were sent in late on the fifth day, how would it be published to all the county voters living at great distances?—At present there are greater facilities than there used to be for making proclamations and publications by means of the railways and otherwise; and if that were not long enough I would give an additional day or two. That is a matter of detail, and if five days were not sufficient for a large county, I would give, say, 10.

8269. Do you mean that you would give an additional day or two between the last day fixed for receiving nominations and the day of the election?—Supposing you gave five days from the proclamation that the election would be holden for nomination to be made to the sheriff, I would then give five days more from that to the election.

8270. Do you provide at all in your scheme for the withdrawal of a nomination, or would you make it necessary that there should be a poll if there were more candidates nominated than the number to be returned?—I would allow the sheriff to name two or three days within which a party might withdraw.

8271. Would not that necessarily involve a considerably greater delay than now takes place between the issue of the writ and the actual election?—Yes, I should say so; but I think that the advantages of getting rid of nomination days, and of the mob, and the turmoil and interruptions to the business of the town or city, would counterbalance any disadvantages of that character.

8272. Do not you think that it would be a great disadvantage to grant 10 days, within which all that tumult and confusion could go on, instead of giving four or five days?—The turmoil and confusion of the nomination day are confined to that day.

8273. Is not there a great deal of confusion and turmoil between the proclamation of holding an election and the actual holding of it in most places?—There is excitement, but I am not aware that there is so much turmoil.

8274. Mr. Villiers.] Have you been observing elections in Ireland for some years past?—I should say from 15 to 16, or 17 years.

8275. You have been watching the elections at the time of the general elections?—Yes.

8276. And you have also watched the municipal elections?—Yes.

8277. Do you see any improvement in the way in which they are conducted now, comparing the present period with the former one, in the irregularity, confusion, and tumults of every description that go on at those elections; did they go on to a greater extent formerly than they do now?—The tumult that I have described was in 1865, in Monaghan, and I believe that there was considerable violence in many of the elections last year.

Mr. J. Norwood.

11 June 1869.

8278. You are making certain suggestions, are you not, which are founded upon the hopelessness of improvement, if you leave the system as it is?—I think that the arrangement at present for having so few polling places, and so distant from a number of voters, ought to be at once got rid of.

8279. But you do not deny that a riot takes place, and that undue influence takes place?—That exists, I say, up to the present time.

8280. And you think it is high time that there should be some change of the law, or some change of the system?—Yes, I think so.

8281. You know of no remedy but the papers that you would give the voters for Members of Parliament?—Yes, that plan has worked well in the case of the universities.

8282. Where?—In Ireland; I have voted myself by voting paper for the university under the last Statute.

8283. Are there not different classes of persons that are admitted to vote for the universities from those that vote for counties and boroughs?—Yes, certainly; but the advantage to a poor man would be just as great as to a rich man; for he would be saved the trouble and expense, and loss of time, and danger of going a great distance, unless he were adequately protected.

8284. You do not think that it would make the man more free in his action, but that it would save him trouble and expense?—I think it would make him more free in his action, as I have already described.

8285. I do not quite understand what you mean by an official signing the papers; when a man sends in his paper he signs it himself, does he not?—The way in which we vote by papers in the university is this: you get a paper sent down to you; it was sent to me by post. I went to a magistrate of the borough of Belfast, and I said, "I wish to vote"; and I signed it before him, and I put it in an envelope, sent it up to an election of the university, and he signed his portion of it, and handed it in, and recorded my vote vivâ voce.

8286. How do you mean that he signed his portion of it; you sign it because it was your vote, and you sent it up?—Yes; but I can give you the form if you wish to see it.

8287. Mr. Hunt.] In the voting-paper for the university you name the person or persons to tender it to the poll?—Yes.

8288. And you send it to one of those persons?—Yes.

8289. And before tendering it to the poll, that person writes his name on the back, to authenticate the paper?—Yes.

8290. Then he hands it in, and it is read out as your vote?—Yes, he declares my vote aloud, and it is read by the returning officer aloud, and recorded.

8291. Mr. Locke.] It has to be signed, first of all, before you send it up, by a magistrate, has it not?—It is signed, first by myself and then by the magistrate; it is then countersigned by the voter at the poll, and initialled by the returning officer.

8292. Mr. Villiers.] There is no security, is there, against anybody standing over the voter, and guiding his hand, or influencing him to sign his paper?—There was no one present but the magistrate and myself.

8293. That does not secure the freedom of the man, because he signs it as he is told to sign it, or he may do so; all that you get by the officer signing it is that the vote is identified with the paper that is signed?—But I think it is a very great matter to remove the influences that surround a polling-booth as at present arranged, where you have the mob and where you may have the priests.

8294. It is a question, is it not, where the influence should be used, whether at the man's house or at the polling-booth?—Or at the magistrate's office or the official's office.

8295. I think you say that those papers are used in the election of guardians?—Yes, they are.

8296. And did you never hear of any abuse in Ireland, in signing the paper for the choice of guardians?—I have known a great many elections there, and very warmly contested ones, and there are a great number of voters; and I have heard of but very few instances indeed where those papers were tampered with or interfered with.

8297. But you have heard of their being tampered with?—I have heard so. In my own ward there are 2,000 voters, I believe, who voted at the last election; I was myself one of those nominated, and I heard of no instances at that election where a paper was unduly interfered with, or at all.

8298. I presume you did not enquire much into the matter?—I was very much interested in it.

8299. Sir George Grey.] You said that you thought the freedom of the voter, if I understood you rightly, would be secured by his signing before an official?—I did not say that it would be entirely secured, but that it would tend very much in that way.

8300. Do you mean that if he was alone in the presence of a magistrate to attest his signature, he would be comparatively free from the influence now exercised over him?—That is my opinion.

8301. Are not most of the landlords and land agents magistrates in Ireland?—Yes; where a landlord is not a resident it is usual to put his agent in the commission of the peace.

8302. Do not you think it possible that the land agent, who is also a magistrate, might require or induce a tenant of that estate to come and sign this paper before him, he being a magistrate?—In that case I should say he would act very wrongly.

8303. Do not you think it is a possible case?—I think it is a possible case.

8304. Supposing that the land agent did not himself act as a magistrate, might he not find the agent of some other landlord in the neighbourhood to attest?—I can conceive many instances in which there is a possibility of the magistrate and the agent influencing the signing of such paper, but I can conceive many instances also in which there would be no such interference, because there are a number of magistrates all over the country who would not be open to this objection.

8305. But you do not recommend this system of paper voting as one which absolulely secures the voter against the influence either of the priest or of the landlord?—It would not be an absolute security; but I should explain that I would not substitute it for vivâ voce voting at the poll as at present, but only in case the voter wished to do it; because at present you can vote in the University personally, and vivâ voce; it would only be a supplementary mode of voting, to be adopted according as the convenience or the wish of the voter might require.

8306. Would not that leave it open to the landlord and his agent on one hand, or the priest on the other, to require that the voter should vote openly, vivâ voce, and not by paper?—Yes.

8307. Mr. Hunt.] There was a Bill in Parliament last Session for multiplying the number of polling-places in Ireland, was there not?—Yes; so I believe.

8308. And if that Bill had been passed, it would have obviated some of the evils which you have mentioned with regard to mob intimidation, and the inconvenience of voters having to go a distance to vote?—It would have greatly obviated those difficulties.

8309. Sir Frederick Heygate.] You have been asked whether if the voter had to go before a magistrate it would not generally happen that the magistrate was either a proprietor or his agent?—I was asked whether there was not the possibility of such being the case; but there are resident or stipendiary magistrates as well as agents.

8310. Would not it be easy for the voter to go before a resident magistrate?—Yes, before any magistrate he chose.

8311. I mean a resident magistrate who is not a landlord nor an agent, but a stipendiary magistrate?—Yes.

8312. Mr. Gathorne Hardy.] You do not expect perfection from this scheme; but you think that it would be a great improvement?—A great improvement; but I mentioned that I do not believe that it would absolutely secure freedom, because all systems are imperfect.

8313. Sir Michael Hicks Beach.] If the voting paper were signed by the magistrate in open court, I presume that the magistrate could exercise no influence over the voter?—So I should say, with proper arrangement, no influence could be exerted. The magistrate before whom I signed my paper on that occasion merely filled it up according to my directions, and I bowed and went away.

8314. Mr. Locke.] There is no particular place where the magistrate attends for the purpose of certifying to the identity of the party, is there?—Not under the 31 & 32 Vict. c. 121.

8315. But he may be anywhere, may he not?—Yes, he may be anywhere.

8316. He may be at the committee-room of the candidate?—If it be at a distance he would not be at the committee-room.

8317. Do not you know, as a fact, that a magistrate, at all events in the elections for the universities in England, does go to the committee-room for convenience?—I have never known that, because the Act of Parliament is for the purpose of facilitating persons at a distance voting.

8318. Persons in London are at a distance from Oxford or Cambridge, are they not?—Yes, certainly.

8319. Are you aware that the magistrates are in the habit of going to the committee-room of either of the candidates that they may think fit, if they agree in politics, for the purpose of signing those papers?—I am not aware of that; but in Ireland I do not think that that could occur, because I am not aware of committee-rooms being established in a similar way with reference to the election for the University of Dublin.

8320. We will take an election for a county in Ireland; you have committee-rooms there, I presume?—Yes, there are committee-rooms.

8321. Is there anything to prevent a magistrate, who is a strong partisan in favour of a particular candidate, going to that committee-room for the purpose of certifying that the person who signs this paper is the right person?—There is nothing that I know of to prevent him.

8322. Do not you think that that being the case, the magistrate being provided at the committee-room, persons might be influenced and taken to that committee-room to vote for a particular party?—Persons might be brought thither, but they need not go there; if they wished to vote uninfluenced by anybody, they will go to a magistrate and not to the committee-room of a particular candidate.

8323. Supposing that they are particularly anxious to vote unbiassed by anybody else, still that does not prevent people from trying to bias them, does it?—Not at all.

8324. And from using their influence to induce them to vote for particular parties?—It does not prevent that.

8325. Therefore, any influence that persons might wish to exercise over them might be very easily exercised, might it not, through those voting papers?—I do not believe that the voting paper would entirely exclude the exercise of influence whether due or undue, but I think that it would go very much in that direction.

8326. Might not they induce them to come either to the committee-room, or to go before the magistrates and sign the paper?—Certainly; I can conceive their doing so.

Mr. William Scott, re-called; and further Examined.

8327. Mr. Hunt.] You read what you called a copy of a letter which you wrote on the 16th of December to the Marquis of Lothian?—Yes, what I thought was a correct copy; if it is not correct, I beg to be corrected.

8328. Did you wish the Committee to understand that it was an exact copy?—I thought it was; but of course in scrawling a letter, we very often score out pieces of one thing or another, and I might have done so. It was taken from this scrawl, and I may have made a mistake.

8329. I gathered from your evidence that it was copied at the time; here is the original letter, or part of it, and what you handed in as a copy; will you (handing the letters to the Witness) be so good as to look at the two together; I want to call your attention to the paper on which it is written, and to the colour of the ink, and so on; and having called your attention to that, do you wish to represent to the Committee that the copy was written at the same time; but first of all, what you hold in your hand is the original letter, is it not?—Yes.

8330. Will you now look at what you handed in as a copy; I want you to notice the different character of the paper both as regards the material of the paper, the one being black-edged, and the other not; and I wish to call your attention to the different colour of the ink, and I wish to ask you, was that copy written at the time?—It would be written immediately at the time; but it might be written from a scrawl, and not from the copy sent to Lord Lothian.

Mr. W. Scott.

11 June 1869.

8331. Do you now wish to represent to the Committee that that copy was written at the time when the original letter was written?—It was written the same day, I have no doubt of it.

8332. Just compare the faint character of the ink in the one case, and the bold character of the ink in the other?—I think the difference of the pen would make all the difference between the appearance of these two.

8333. Do you mean to say that the one letter was copied from the other?—I think they would be both copied from the draft, because I wanted to get away Lord Lothian's immediately.

8334. You do not mean to say that it is an exact transcript?—It is not exactly; there is an expression in Lord Lothian's that is not in this copy, which I at once admit.

8335. If you will look at the words, "I would take no part in the election against, beyond giving my vote," in the copy that you read to the Committee are these following words omitted: "and I would even go further, that I would get a voter who intended to support Sir William Scott to remain at home on the polling day, so that in reality my vote might not count"; are those words omitted in the copy which you handed in to the Committee?—They are omitted in that copy; I thought that they had been in the letter which Mr. Otto produced to the Committee referring to my breaking a pledge.

8336. Those words are omitted in what you read to the Committee?—Yes, they are omitted; I thought they had been in the other letter.

8337. Will you tell me whether that omission was made purposely or not?—No, decidedly not.

8338. It was an accident, was it?—Undoubtedly; I thought I had had an exact copy; I certainly did.
